After a century inflammable Europe burst into flames again in 1914, but it is not necessary to retell here the familiar story of how our policy of neutrality met with the same remorseless fate as before. Now, once more, we are facing this old problem. We are, it is true, fortified with the psychology of the burnt child. We are still under the great disillusionment of the World War, the mock peace, and the defaulted debts. Although we are far more "neutral against" Hitler and Stalin than we were against the Kaiser we are not so "neutral for" the Allies this time. Our crusading spirit, when we went forth to make the world safe for democracy, is a rueful memory.

The change in the national mood is reflected in what is going on in Washington. To save ourselves from fighting for the neutral rights which we unavailingly fought two wars to uphold we are ready this time to surrender them in advance. Whether our shipping interests, just as we have built up our merchant marine until it is second only to the British, will endure this embargo any more patiently than their forerunners bore Jefferson's embargo we shall presently see.

I am not debating the pending neutrality plans. I am only arguing that these do not meet the central question and that Washington is staging what is more or less a sham battle. This is the favorite sport of politics, which ever delights to sidetrack the stern realities of a main issue.

Keeping our ships at home will not avail in the long pull ahead unless we can find a way to keep our minds at home. Despite our unneutrality the people are agreed, as they never were in any other similar crisis, in a desire to stay out of this European war. But neutrality, at best and however framed, is a negation, and it takes an affirmative to win and hold the necessary support of this people.

LET'S MIND OUR OWN BUSINESS

Let's mind our own business. All right, let's. But many who repeat that wise commonplace do not appreciate what a big job it gives us to do. We cannot do it by merely refusing to mind other people's business in Europe. No policy of mere avoidance will do the trick in this any more than it did in the other European wars.

Only some positive and aggressive policy can engage or will deserve to enlist the loyalty of a great and vigorous people. We cannot expect year after year to do nothing but peep at a day of wrong through the little hole of discretion. Soon or late we would inevitably shinny over the fence and get into a game where something was doing.

NEUTRALITY NOT ENOUGH

No; neutrality is not enough. Armed preparedness is not enough, however necessary it may be when military force is rampant at our front and back doors in Europe and Asia. A still more imperative necessity is a social and economic preparedness.

The surest way to keep us out of war would be to mobilize our energies in what William James termed a moral equivalent for war. That means finding a man's-size job for the American people at home. It will be no use to keep our ships at home unless we keep also our emotions at home and diverted to a war on our own problems. Surely these are many and worthy the steel of our national courage and ambition.

President Roosevelt says that one-third of our people are ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed; ex-President Hoover makes a like estimate. The cancer of unemployment is a world-wide reproach to the richest, most-favored land under the sun. Share-cropping in the South and farm-tenancy in the West are mining and sapping the foundation on which we built a free Nation. These evils are storing up among us the grapes of wrath which produced Hitler and Stalin across the sea.

NO TIME TO ADJOURN POLITICS

Have we not a statesmanship with the imagination and daring to start America to building while Europe is destroying? Leave the New World to twiddle its thumbs and the devil that forever bedevils the Old World will find plenty of mischief for our idle hands to do. Give our people the glow of a far-reaching enterprise of construction and nothing, not all the propaganda of the belligerents, could drag us into a war of destruction.

When the democracy which we have come lightly to take for granted is menaced on all sides it is no time to talk of adjourning politics, which means suspending the democratic processes of government. Rather we should give those processes more gas. To be sure, as Webster said, "Our party divisions should cease at the water's edge." But we cannot stop them there by the merely negative action of adjourning all politics.

Mark the party alinement in the Senate on the question of neutrality. The same lines will cut across the approaching campaign of 1940 as they crossed the campaign of 1916. Our people will divide on European issues if they are not offered American issues instead.

THE GREEKS AT OUR OWN DOOR

We learned by bitter experience that we cannot make the world safe for democracy on foreign battlefields. But we can save democracy right here at home. James Bryce warned Americans that "upon the peaceful and orderly development of their democratic institutions the fortune of the world very largely depends." Confronting us anew is the ringing challenge of Lincoln when he said that "we shall nobly save or meanly lose the last, best hope of earth."

When our always unneutral people were wrought up over the saving of democracy in Greece at the time of her war of liberation from the Turks, a great lady in Virginia sat on her pillared portico, fervently discoursing on our moral duty to aid those far-off people in their gallant fight for freedom. With a sweeping glance at the slaves in the yard of his liberty-loving hostess, John Randolph brought the issue home to her with the remark, "Madam, the Greeks are at your own door."

Comment on Colonel Lindbergh's Radio Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY HERBERT AGAR

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal on October 18, 1939, in a column written by Herbert Agar, the article dealing with Colonel Lindbergh's second radio speech.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal of October 18, 1939]

TIME AND TIDE

(By Herbert Agar)

LINDBERGH'S LOGIC

Lindbergh's second radio speech was, as they say in the detective stories, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Putting aside the inflammatory foolishness about Canada, the speech boils down to a very bad piece of reasoning.

The colonel tells us that this is not a war for democracy. Of course it isn't a war for democracy. Among the people who disagree with Lindbergh on the arms embargo, nobody has been silly enough to pretend that it is a war for democracy. Yet Lindbergh seems to think he is bringing us news when he points out it is a war to prevent Germany from destroying the French and British Empires.

"This is a war," he tells us, "over the balance of power in Europe." But the whole world had grown accustomed to that idea even before the war began. The seediest politicians and the least informed journalists had caught up to that fact by the time of Munich.

Although the colonel's information is neither new nor startling, the conclusions which he draws from his information are original. After stating that this is not a war for democracy, and that it is a war for the balance of power, he ask that we continue the embargo on "offensive weapons and munitions."

He seems to be saying that since it isn't a war for democracy it doesn't make any difference to us who wins it—that we might just as well continue penalizing the Allies and giving a special advantage to the Germans.

Suppose the colonel found two men fighting in a barroom, and suppose he knew that neither man was a Democrat—would he at once assume that it made no difference which won? But suppose one man was a thief and the other man had just lost his watch? Or suppose one man had murdered the barkeep's daughter, and the other man was trying to hold him for the police?

There are lots of things to fight for, aside from democracy—and some of them make a great deal of difference. The colonel hasn't disposed of the war by saying it's a war over the balance of power.

The balance of power is what exists in Europe when no one nation dominates the entire show. There was no balance of power while Napoleon owned Europe. There would be no balance of power if Hitler owned Europe. It is better, for the selfish interests of the United States, that there should be a balance of power, rather than a Russian-German hegemony over Europe and Asia.

Furthermore, it is far better for the selfish interests of the United States that the French and British systems should not be destroyed by the German and Russian systems. This has nothing to do with sentiment. It has nothing to do with democracy. It has to do with the fundamental institutions of society.

France and England believe in private property. They believe in freedom of thought and of religion. They believe in what is vaguely called the capitalist system of production. The United States, also, believes in these institutions, and is making a serious effort to build a satisfactory way of life in terms of them.

This effort will never be interfered with by the French or the British. It is bound to be interfered with by the Germans and the Russians, if nazi-ism and communism becomes dominant in two continents.

For the Germans and Russians believe in state-controlled property, in slave labor, in the denial of free thought, and in the repression of Christianity. If they dominate half the world they will create conditions that will make the American effort more difficult than it is at present.

It is to our interest, therefore, that the Allies should win. It is to our interest to sell them the arms they need, if we can make them and they can pay for them. And nothing is more irrelevant than the obvious fact that this is not a war about democracy.

Technical Research

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY OF PENNSYLVANIA AT CORNERSTONE LAYING OF AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH LABORATORY, WYNDMOOR, PA.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] on the occasion of the laying of the cornerstone of the Agricultural Research Laboratory at Wyndmoor, Pa., on October 20, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

How easy it is to find the text for the dedication of this research laboratory. It fairly thrusts itself at us from every day's headlines. Great nations locked in a struggle for supremacy—and other nations great in area and population being speedily overrun and conquered. A world theme of latter-day power and what it means to have it or not to have it spelled out for us in every morning's newspapers.

The German conquest of Poland has opened the eyes even of military observers. How was it that that vast land with all its manpower could be overrun and completely reduced to subjection in 20 days' time? How is it, indeed, that Germany has risen in two decades from virtual collapse up to the remarkable strength that she shows today?

The answer to this question, not alone for Germany, but for England and France and Japan and Russia and the United States is the same. The countries that hold the real world power today did not get it by reason of their size alone nor their manpower nor their natural resources. I will tell you where that strength comes from. It comes, basically, right out of the workshops of the scientists and technical men. The mechanized armies, the floating fortresses, the incredibly swift airplanes and communications—all were born out of the test tubes and microscopes of technicians. They are run by men who also have had a good measure of technical training.

We abhor that such training and skill should be devoted to the pursuits of war. But in peace, no less than in war, the strength of a nation today lies in its technical advancement. That is so true that it is almost trite to say it. The same training and skill that build war machines also build the machines of peace. The things that have lifted the drudgery off the backs of working people, that have given us a standard of living such that the American workmen of today enjoys comforts that the prince of other days could not have, are products of the research laboratory.

My text, then, is that the wise peoples of today are those who are training many men in the fields of technical research and who are equipping good workshops for those men. It is those very men and those very workshops that are our real guaranty of survival just as they are our best hope of advancement in the arts of civilized living. It is a comforting thought to me that this great research laboratory and the three others like it now being dedicated elsewhere in the country are strong assets for national emergency as well as for our normal life of peace.

No institution ever was conceived in more peaceful and civilized objectives than these laboratories. Congress authorized their building as part of the broad program to utilize further the abundant products of our soil. To me that is one thing that puts them right in the American tradition. We have learned how to produce an abundance in this country. Now we propose to learn how to make still better use of it.

These last few years we have faced, in agriculture, what seemed like a formidable surplus problem. For many years before the World War this country was accustomed to sell abroad from 150 to 200 million bushels of wheat, 8 to 9 million bales of cotton, and well toward a billion pounds of pork, in addition to fairly large quantities of tobacco and fruit. In other words, our production of these important items was geared to a substantial foreign demand as well as to a rapidly expanding domestic market.

During the World War prices and production were further stimulated by financial inflation. Then after the war came the period of deflation with its accompanying crash in commodity prices. Farm products and other raw materials were especially hard hit. European buying was curtailed and huge unwanted stocks of American pork, wheat, and cotton piled up on the farms and in trade channels.

It was out of this eventual situation that the whole present agricultural program came into being. These research laboratories are one of the coordinated steps in that program and represent a further line of attack on a problem which already has been engaged upon a wide front.

In creating these research establishments Congress instructed the Secretary of Agriculture to divide the country into four major farm-producing areas. One regional laboratory was to be established in each area. Now, manifestly the agricultural map does not divide itself precisely into four such regions. Nevertheless, the Department of Agriculture did the best it could to follow the mandate of Congress. It didivded the country with rough equity into eastern, western, northern, and southern regions. The eastern region includes the Atlantic States from Maine through North Carolina, embracing also West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Before selecting the locations of these laboratories, the Department set up a committee of technical men which made a survey of the entire country. It spent months at its job, investigating more than 200 possible localities and sending inspectors to examine personally some 80 of these. Their criteria included a long list of essential qualifications, among them the accessibility of the location, housing and living conditions for a large staff, availability of a good site and such essential services as large water supply, sewer lines, gas lines, and electrical power. Without detracting in the least from the excellent qualifications of our sister States I think we in Pennsylvania may rejoice in the circumstances which found this location so well and favorably situated that it was chosen for the site of this eastern laboratory.

The primary purpose in creating these laboratories was to find new industrial uses for farm products. A lot of our overabundance of certain food crops in the last few years has gone to waste. If any of that waste could be diverted to the uses of industry it would seem to be clear gain for the farmers and the country.

Some striking work already has been done in this field. Take corn for instance. We think of corn as the great feed grain. Yet some 80,000,000 bushels a year is now processed for the manufacture of starch, oil, and other products. Cottonseed was at one time merely a waste, if not a nuisance. Then processing for the recovery of cottonseed oil began. Now the cash value of the seed equals about 16 percent of the total cotton crop value.

Synthetic fibers and other cellulose plastics are manufactured in large quantities from cotton linters. Such chemicals as acetone, butyl alcohol, and others are made by control fermentation of corn. The chemical furfural is made from waste oat hulls by processes which originated in the Department of Agriculture laboratories. The wide variety of industrial products that already have been made from products which were surpluses of agriculture is almost a guaranty of further progress that can be made, given the tools for keen research.

I am told that the program which has been up for this eastern laboratory embraces research work, in the beginning, on five important groups of products—tobacco, apples, Irish potatoes, milk products, and vegetables.

We grow an average crop in this country of about one and one-third billion pounds of tobacco, a lot of it, as I have said, formerly going to export. Now we are running into sharper and sharper foreign competition aided by tariffs and other controls. There has been a steady decline in our exports of fire-cured and dark air-cured types. But here, for example, comes along the use of nicotine as insecticides, which offers a broad field for the increased consumption of tobacco products. The laboratory also will explore the uses for other tobacco constituents than nicotine, of which over 30 are now known—some of them peculiar to tobacco.

The average crop of Irish potatoes is around 400,000,000 bushels and usually about 10 percent of the crop is culls. Another 10 percent is wasted by disease, freezing, and shrinkage in storage. So there would seem to exist a definite field for the profitable nonfood use of culls and second-grade potatoes and sometimes for first grade.

In the case of apples, out of an average commercial crop of 90 million bushels in recent years there have been a number of seasons when as many as four million bushels or more have been left unharvested because the market did not pay. In addition something like 120,000 tons of culls are graded out at packing plants in the average year and on top of this thousands of tons of processing wastes are lost at juice, drying, and packing plants, all of which represents a possible industrial resource of unknown possibilities.

The acreage of truck crops has trebled since 1920. An industrial outlet for vegetable products would greatly help that situation.

Our gigantic dairy industry turns out annually more than 100,000,000,000 pounds of milk containing 13,000,000,000 pounds of solids in the form of fats, proteins, carbohydrates, and salts. This enormous output represents roughly 20 percent of the total farm income and approaches the combined value of cotton and wheat and tobacco. The problems of the dairy industry are very complex. However, the economic effects of the seasonal surpluses which weigh down the entire milk business make it highly desirable to push the search for new and more efficient ways of utilization in the industrial field, particularly for casein and milk sugar.

None of us can conceive of the many directions which this research will take once the program is launched and develops itself as it naturally will. It is safe to say that other products will be studied and other fields explored which will take our farm surpluses into the useful channels of industry.

It has been emphasized all along by the Department of Agriculture that they are undertaking here what will be a long-time job. Just as the problem will be a continuing one so the attack on it will have to follow a continuing and broadening program. It is always possible that some of the aggravating causes of what we have come to think of as surpluses in recent years may diminish. A long war might pare down our seeming overabundance. Or the renewal of peace and of world trade might have some of the same effect. But we are reminded that within our own economy the underlying trends that have developed have brought permanent changes. The startling changes in our national pattern of agricultural production are permanent. It is in recognition of this aspect of the situation that the program of research has been formulated for these laboratories so that they may carry forward a logical continuing attack on a long-time problem.

This occasion should not pass without tribute to the Congress and the Roosevelt Administration which have sponsored it and made it possible. I question whether any other period of our history has seen more constructive legislation in behalf of agriculture than the last half-dozen years. In a time of profound economic disturbance and confusion a carefully thought out program has brought the farm business steadily out of its slough of despond and helped to put it back on its feet. It is fitting that at the launching of a scientific enterprise of this kind today recognition should go to Secretary Wallace, who is a scientist of renown in his own right and whose keen perception of research values splendidly fits him to head this work.

But above all, the credit for saving and advancing American agriculture should go to President Roosevelt, who saw that the lessons of conservation, diversification, and scientific farming developed here in the East must become the national farm practice. It was Roosevelt who brought about that political combination of the Southern and Western farming regions with the farms and industries of the East which made the New Deal a program for national recovery through national unity.

It was Roosevelt who took the risks and picked the men—men like Henry Wallace, of Iowa, and Rexford Guy Tugwell, of New York, and M. L. Wilson, of Montana—to administer the farm program. It was Roosevelt who sponsored and stood behind the A. A. A., the C. C. C., the Soil Conservation Service, the resettlement program, the Farm Security Administration, the farm-tenant program, the Rural Electrification, and all the other New Deal measures which saved the farm and the farmer.

And I think that the eastern farmers who have practiced prudent husbandry for generations as a matter of course can take special pride in the fact that President Roosevelt has applied the farming lessons learned in the East, for 300 years, to the newer lands of the South and West and thus saved American agriculture from the greatest social and economic catastrophe in our history.

The New Deal has shown that the eastern farmers were the pioneers who stayed at home and, instead of seeking new and easy lands to till, developed the scientific basis for a permanent farm civilization in the United States.

Naturally, I scarcely can let this occasion pass without indulging a little modest pride in the circumstances which make Pennsylvania the splendid background for a research establishment of this kind. Here we have a combination of industry and agriculture such as is not to be found everywhere. Pennsylvania is preeminent as an industrial and mining State. Her manufactures created a value of nearly $2,000,000,000 in 1935—the last year for which official statistics are published—and this was more than one-fifth the total value added by manufactures in the United States. In mining, Pennsylvania outranks all others, producing nearly one-third of the country's total value of products of mines and quarries.

The eminence of our State in these fields, however, has tended somewhat to obscure the actual size and quality of our agriculture. Pennsylvania has more cattle on farms than any of nine far-western so-called cattle States. We produce, in point of value, more eggs than any other State of the Union. Our gross income from milk production is exceeded only by New York and Wisconsin. We rank thirteenth among all States in size of farm population and in value of farms and eighth in value per acre.

In this brief review of the prominence of Pennsylvania agriculture, I have purposely deferred mention of that great asset of Pennsylvania's agriculture—the people who till our farms. Without in any way implying a lack of appreciation of the sturdy qualities of the farmers throughout the country, I wish to emphasize that the farmers of my State come from those virile strains of Swedes, English Quakers, Holland Dutch, early Germans, Irish and Scotch Irish, and early American farmers who generations ago settled upon our land. Every observing person traveling throughout the rural countryside of my State will note the splendid appearance of our fields, the attractiveness of our farm homes, barns, and other farm buildings—evidence on every hand of skill and care in farming. This is due only in part to our resources of soil and climate. Much is due to the qualities of the men and women on our farms who are the foundation of our rural life—a large source of our able citizenry.

This close meeting of agriculture and industry within our borders, however, is but typical of the whole eastern region which this institution will serve. We want to emphasize that we regard the location of this laboratory as a welcome responsibility which we shall bear toward all the other States in the region. This laboratory and its work belong to Maine and the Carolinas and the other States no less than to Pennsylvania.

It seems very fitting indeed that here in this eastern setting, where so large a segment of the Nation's industry rubs elbows with its agriculture, this laboratory should be dedicated to its job of finding new industrial uses for farm products. I think it altogether likely that the work of institutions such as this will bring us new appreciation of the interdependence of the people on the farms and those in the factories. The American economy is buttressed by a unique strength that is rooted alike in the soil and in the cities. It seems to me exceedingly important that we should all gain a full understanding of what this means. In those periods when we have been able to arrive at a nice economic balance between agriculture and industry, we have been exceedingly prosperous. Everything which adds to the common understanding between labor, agriculture, and industry is, it seems to me, a clear gain for the community. In a region like this with so large a number of factory workers and likewise with a large farm population, no institution could be more welcome than one that means what I think this laboratory will—that is, an added link tying the products of the soil always more closely into our superb industrial machine.

So, in the recognition that the world map today is being made and remade under the supremacy of technical genius, we dedicate this public institution to research in the art of making our civilization more civilized. May its staff show us how better to enjoy our abundance—or at least how better to survive in an age when the survival of a nation seems to depend mainly on its technicians.

Economic Effects of Cash-and-Carry Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, during the course of my remarks I asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by John T. Flynn dealing with the economic effects of the cash-and-carry policy, published in the Washington (D. C.) News of October 3, 1939, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of October 3, 1939]

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

MIAMI, FLA., October 3.—One question which must be cleared up is this one: Will a cash-and-carry provision in our neutrality law injure Britain and France? Have they the means of buying in this country for cash and without credit?

If the cash-and-carry rule is adopted—and it should be, plus the arms embargo—England and France will proceed in the United States precisely as they did in the last war. They will use their gold reserves and their credits here to buy what they need.

England and France have large gold reserves in this country and they have large bank balances. Britain and France together have about $600,000,000 in cash on balance in American banks. And in addition they own about $1,000,000,000 in securities. On paper they have about $6,000,000,000 in gold, bank deposits, and securities in this country.

This does not all belong to the British Government or the French Government. But the government can commandeer it—that is, require its citizens to turn over their American claims to the government. The government will give them British notes or bonds for their American holdings. Then the government could sell the securities and spend the proceeds, along with the gold and bank deposits in America to buy goods.

But in practice the government could not be too ruthless about this. There are many British firms doing business in America who require their deposits in their business, and the security holdings are equally essential to British trade in America. Also this trade is precious to England now, as she needs all the trade she can get to prevent the balance against her from becoming fatal.

Moreover, we would have to know the amount of the balances against England and France in this country before we could decide just how much of this five or six billions is available for actual spending. But apparently it is a large sum, several billions, and the two countries could buy a great deal with that.

But large as the sum is, if we go in for this war trade, the time will come when these credits in America will be exhausted. It might take 2 years or even a little more. If it be that the actual amount which these two governments can spend is three or four billion, that would surely be exhausted in 2 years.

We would not feel the effect of it the first 6 months so very much. But in the second year we most certainly would increase employment heavily and increase profits. By the end of the second year we might well have a boom—a war boom. Then what? Then would come the moment of danger. For then the balances of these nations in this country would become exhausted. At this point we would be confronted with two alternatives. Either we would have to start granting credits—abandon cash and carry—or see the boom collapse. What would we do then?

What we would do would depend on the kind of propaganda that had been worked on us and the kind of government we had in Washington. But if the propaganda of British and French agents and of our own Government in Washington during the coming months is effective, nothing can save us from abandoning the cash and carry when the critical hour arrives. Nothing can save us but calm, patient, stable, sure-footed statesmanship in Washington. Have we got it?

Discussion on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on October 8 the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], Representative VAN ZANDT, of Pennsylvania, and I participated in the program of the American Forum of the Air over the Mutual Broadcasting chain. The subject was American Neutrality. I ask unanimous consent that the discussion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Announcer MCCORMICK. WOL, in cooperation with WOR, presents the American Forum of the Air.

Tonight, listeners to the coast-to-coast Mutual Network will hear the second of this season's Sunday night broadcasts—emanating from the modern broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C.

The facilities of these studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization.

Tonight's American Forum of the Air will be presented identical to those which became such widely listened-to programs last year. Under the direction of Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion, you first will hear the presentation of both sides of tonight's topic of discussion by outstanding leaders on the subject. Following the formal presentation of opposing views, the issue will be heard in informal discussion by a panel board ready to treat the argument extemporaneously.

And now, our chairman, Mr. Theodore Granik:

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

The eyes of the Nation are focused on the Senate of the United States, where the country's distinguished legislators continue their debate on the neutrality bill. Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in a statement to the press last night, predicted that the administration's bill, which would repeal the arms embargo, and institute a system of cash-and-carry trade with belligerents, would be voted upon by the Senate within the week. Opponents of the bill, however, dispute this claim, contending that their fight to retain the embargo has just begun.

As the debate progresses, Americans watch with interest as Senators on both sides demand that the United States avoid involvement in war.

Those in opposition to the administration's bill are carrying out their battle on several points. First, is their belief that there is no conflict between the embargo provisions, now our national law, and the cash-and-carry provisions of the bill now before the Senate. Some have come forward with an alternative plan which would retain the arms embargo and institute a strict cash-and-carry system for all other supplies sold to belligerents. Many of them believe that the sinking of American ships was one leading reason for our entry into the last war, and they insist that rigid cash-and-carry legislation will limit this danger to a minimum.

And another reason motivating some of those against the bill is a firm opposition to giving the Executive superpower.

But administration forces contend that the adoption of the Pittman resolution, including repeal of the arms embargo, is the most complete and orderly retreat from war that any nation ever executed; that the American people, the Congress, and the President are determined that we shall stay out of this war. They maintain that the President's program for the revision of the Neutrality Act by repeal of the arms embargo, the substitution of a uniform cash-and-carry policy applying without discrimination to all belligerents, and the prohibition of American vessels and American citizens to enter zones of danger, is best calculated to safeguard the neutrality of the United States, to isolate the American people from the horrors of war, and to preserve intact our homes and our democratic traditions.

As we await further congressional debate, the American Forum of the Air is pleased to present a discussion on this vital problem. Our opening speaker will be Senator JOHN H. OVERTON, of Louisiana. He will be followed by Senator LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, of the State of Washington.

Immediately following we will present an informal panel discussion. Our panel members are:

Senators SHERMAN MINTON, of Indiana, CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia, and Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT—three times Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

And now our opening speaker, Senator OVERTON.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOHN H. OVERTON

The Congress of the United States is now considering a measure of the most vital importance to every man, woman, and child in America. Our decision on this question may lead us to war or it may keep us in the paths of peace. I submit that we should do everything within our power to keep the United States not only out of the present European conflict but also out of all foreign wars in the future. We should do not simply a few things to keep us out, but everything within reason. We should think first of America and not European or other foreign nations.

Our neutrality resolution should contain both the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry plan, and also, with perhaps some slight modifications, all the other safeguards proposed in the resolution now before Congress. There is no reason whatsoever why we cannot retain the present embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war and re-enact the cash-and-carry provision on all other commodities. Up until May of this year we had both the arms embargo and a cash-and-carry policy on all other articles of export. The arms embargo is still the law of the land, but the cash-and-carry requirement expired last May. Let us retain the one and reenact the other. The objection that I have to the neutrality resolution pending before Congress is not by reason of its carrying a cash-and-carry provision, but because it undertakes also to repeal the arms embargo, which is the cornerstone of our neutrality and our strongest legislative safeguard against involvement in foreign wars. Let us, therefore, understand this fact clearly: We do not have to repeal the arms embargo in order to have the cash and carry. We can and should have both.

We adopted the arms-embargo policy in 1935, 1936, and 1937, when our judgment was not warped by either friendships or animosities engendered by the present European conflict. That policy was adopted to meet just such a situation as now confronts us, and for the threefold purpose of keeping us out of war, of refusing to aid other nations with deadly weapons in carrying on war, and of maintaining a fair and just neutrality. The administration officials and spokesmen who approved this policy, declared that it was a "clear" policy, a "wise policy," a "powerful protection" for us. Now that the contingency against which we have been protecting ourselves has in fact occurred, should we now scrap one of the fundamental safeguards agreed upon all sides as a measure calculated to preserve our own peace? The neutrality legislation, with its continuing arms embargo, was American legislation deliberately enacted by the American Congress, not out of consideration for foreign nations, but solely in the interest of these United States.

To repeal the arms embargo would be to take sides officially by act of our Goverment. If the American people are being asked to take sides they shall be so asked frankly and openly—and not through the side-door of the arms embargo repeal. If we begin now to supply one side with arms in this mammoth conflict now just getting under way in Europe, we shall find, as we did in the World War, that gradually we shall be called upon to do more and more and to take step after step on the road that leads us to war. Soon the American dollar will be following our American arms, and then the American flag and the American soldier will be following both to the battlefields of Europe.

We have erected a few barriers against involvement in foreign wars. We should keep every one of them. I favor strengthening them, adding to them, but I am opposed to striking down a single one of them.

Personally, I am against the United States taking sides. Bitter experience teaches us that it is not to our national interest to do so. We took sides once before in the power politics of Europe. We came out of that war without having saved the world for democracy, without putting an end to all wars, without attaining any of the high ideals for which our soldiers fought and died in foreign lands. What we got out of this misadventure was a dishonored debt of over $13,000,000,000 owed us by European nations and a post-war depression from which we have not recovered. We spent for that war, including the default on the war debts, approximately $60,000,000,000. We sacrificed the lives of over 100,000 of our young men and have filled our veterans' hospitals with thousands upon thousands of others, maimed, diseased, bereft of reason. What a tragic reminder of the utter futility of our participating in the wars of European nations or of trying to adjust their racial, religious, territorial, and political differences.

Another World War will take infinitely more of our life, our wealth and resources, our democracy. So strongly do I feel about this that I am unwilling to take a single step toward participating again in the endless and ever-recurring quarrels of European nations, which neither we nor they can apparently ever hope to settle.

Our participation in another World War would bring us a virtual dictatorship in the United States during the course of the war. The nature of modern, totalitarian war makes that unavoidable. The only way to avoid it is to keep the country out of war. Another great war will jeopardize our democracy. You recall the extensive and unprecedented powers which had to be given to our Executive during the last war. They will seem mild compared to the complete controls that another war will put into the hands of any President, regardless of who he may be.

If we ever get into another major war—we may never regain the democracy we will be forced to give up while the war is on. I do not believe we can impose democracy upon all of Europe. But I do believe that we can and must preserve democracy in these United States, encourage its growth throughout this hemisphere, and be prepared to defend it here from all outside attack. I cannot understand how anybody who cherishes our free institutions, our democratic traditions and spirit, our very civilization—can contemplate taking sides now, even just a little, with anything but complete horror. We must perform our task in our own country, and on the hemisphere where we have great opportunities which coincide with our real national interest. We may—and do—have sympathy for certain nations in Europe but we must not allow such sympathies to blind us to what is good, what is possible, and what is practicable for the United States. Our own country, its strict neutrality and avoidance of war, should be our first and last thought.

The neutrality legislation adopted in 1935, 1936, and 1937 after careful study of our previous war experience has become an important part of our national policy. The barriers against easy involvement in foreign war, put up in legislation must not be broken down. The present law includes the arms embargo, the ban on loans and restriction on credits, the prohibition against our citizens traveling on belligerent ships. To these provisions should be added the cash-and-carry proposal and other safeguarding measures. Such action will best serve the interests of the United States. The notice we gave to the rest of the world over four years ago that we would not again become an arms arsenal for any set of belligerents, that we would not again supply in war-time the deadly weapons of mass murder and wholesale destruction was a sound decision and is still a sound and humane policy.

I take my stand for retention of the arms embargo together with the rest of the present law, and the addition of cash-and-carry provisions as the best insurance to our peace.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator OVERTON. You are listening to the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on American Neutrality. You have just heard Senator JOHN H. OVERTON, of Louisiana. And now we are pleased to present Senator LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, of the State of Washington—Senator SCHWELLENBACH.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

I don't know whether Mr. Granik will like what I am about to do or not. I was invited here and asked to use up my 12 minutes' portion of this program in making a speech. I am wondering if audiences, particularly radio audiences, are not getting a little tired of listening to speeches upon this question. There has been an average of two or three an evening during the last 2 weeks.

Like every other Senator, I have received a large volume of mail during this special session—so large that it is impossible to give specific answers to each letter. Many of the letters contain definite questions which are very pertinent. Therefore, I have decided to use my time in reading some of these questions and my answers to them. In other words, I am taking advantage of Mr. Granik's invitation to answer my mail by radio. There will not be time to read the whole context of any letter, so I am limiting myself to those portions of the letters which contain the questions, and those portions of the replies which contain the answers to the specific questions.

I had one letter last week from a man in Bellingham, Wash., which contained this question: "My understanding in 1937 was that the Congress had passed a completed neutrality bill. I thought that that bill was permanent, yet I saw by the papers in April of this year that hearings were being held in both the House and the Senate on new neutrality legislation. Then when the Congress decided not to adopt any legislation last session and the war came on, the President called you folks back in special session. What I would like to know is why there was any need for Congress considering neutrality at all this year."

My answer to that question was: "It is true that in 1935 and 1936 and 1937 we in Congress passed neutrality acts. The 1937 act had three main parts: First was the arms embargo; second, a provision requiring all goods shipped to a belligerent to be carried on ships not owned by Americans and with the title to the goods passing to the purchaser before the goods left our shores; the third provision was known as the financial section, and it rather indefinitely restricted financial transactions between our people and belligerent governments. Section 2 of this act, or the carry provisions, expired by the terms of the act on May 1 of this year. Under the law as it now stands, our goods and our people and our ships may travel between the United States and the belligerent countries. It was the fact that that expired which caused us last April to hold hearings on the whole question.

"In the opinion of most of us that was the most important part of the law. As a result of those hearings, everybody in the Senate concluded that it was necessary to restate and strengthen the carry provisions of section 2. Everybody concluded that it was necessary to strengthen the provisions of the financial section. Everybody concluded that it was necessary to prevent our ships, even though destined for neutral countries, to stay away from submarine zones and mine-infested zones, and that our citizens should be kept off belligerent ships.

"For those reasons, about which there is no particular difference of opinion, it became necessary to rewrite the neutrality legislation. In addition to that, a great number of us, and I think the majority, concluded that America's chances of staying out of the war would be much better if the so-called arms embargo were repealed. That is the question around which the present debate is raging, but I think you can see that, regardless of anyone's opinion upon that phase of the question, there must be agreement that some legislation is necessary. I don't think any Member of Congress will seriously disagree on that conclusion."

Another interesting question was posed to me by a writer living at Clarkston, Wash. Clarkston is right near the Idaho line. The letter came to me by air mail, having been written on Wednesday. It said: "Now, I am confused. We here next door to Idaho have always had great confidence in Senator BORAH and when he came out against the repeal of the arms embargo why I thought, of course, that I did agree with him. Then last night Senator NORRIS went on the air and took the opposite side. Personally, I look upon Senator NORRIS as my ideal statesman. Tell me how these two men, with all their experience and with their honesty, can violently disagree on this vital subject."

My answer to that letter was as follows: "I don't blame you for being confused. I agree with everything you have said about both Senator BORAH and Senator NORRIS. Does it not occur to you that what you have asked me is simply an illustration of what a fine thing it is to live under American democracy? There are very few places in the world today where a debate, such as we are now conducting, could be carried on. In many countries if Senator BORAH and Senator NORRIS made the speeches which they did over the radio, one of them would end up in a concentration camp. Here we still have room for differences of opinion. We still have the right to express those differences of opinion. That room and that right must not be destroyed. That's why it is so important that, regardless of the outcome of this legislation, we stick to our determination to stay out of this war. We can endanger American democracy by getting into it."

The next letter is interesting because it comes from a high-school student, and I will read all of it:

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I am a junior in high school and I want to get on my high-school debate team. The subject for the try-out is, 'Resolved, That the Congress should amend the Neutrality Act as requested by the President.' I have been studying this for the last 2 weeks and I would like to have you help me by explaining what the new bill will do. I have studied all about the arms embargo, and I have made up my mind about that, but what I want you to do is to tell me exactly what the bill will do if the arms embargo is repealed, if it is. Yours very truly * * *."

My answer was this: "MY DEAR RICHARD: I received your letter telling me about your debate try-out. I am sending you, under separate cover, copies of the present law and the proposed bill; also the Senate Committee hearings and six speeches, three on each side of the subject. I am glad to know that you have made up your mind about the arms embargo, and I hope that the speeches of the six Senators will not confuse you.

"You do ask me the specific question about what the proposed law will do, and I will answer that specifically as follows:

"It is a careful, painstaking effort to correct our past mistakes. It is a code of restrictions upon our citizens so as to prevent any one of us from so conducting ourselves as to endanger all of us. It prohibits our ships from traveling to belligerents or from making deliveries to belligerent ships. It prohibits goods owned by Americans being shipped to belligerents. It prohibits our ships and our citizens even though destined for neutral countries to travel through the dangerous submarine- and mine-infested areas. It prohibits our citizens from traveling on ships owned by belligerents. It prevents the arming of our merchant vessels. It prevents our Government and our people from loaning money or extending credit to belligerent governments. It so strengthens the duties of the Munitions Control Board as to give Congress such a check on munitions as to prevent our being dragged into war by munitions sales. It takes away from the President all of the important discretionary power granted in the 1937 act. There is not a word in it giving the President power to name aggressors. Since it treats both sides precisely alike, it is as truly neutral as any law that could be devised. Since it simply restrains our own citizens, neither side has a right to object to it. It tries to substitute a true peace plan for our present dangerous unneutral hodgepodge. If any law can keep us out of war this one will.

"With best of luck to you in your try-out for the debate * * *."

The next letter, from which I wish to read, came from Wenatchee, Wash. In part, it reads as follows:

"What are you fellows trying to do? For the last 5 years I have heard about cash and carry. I thought that meant real honest cash and now I see your bill provides for 90 days' credit. Why are you making that change and giving credit to these governments?"

I answered in this way: "You certainly are entitled to ask the question you submitted in your letter. If, as you say, this present bill would propose to loosen up credit, I would certainly vigorously oppose it. I think it extremely unfortunate that those who oppose the bill have attempted to represent to the people that the new bill does loosen up credits. The fact is, it definitely restricts them. I first ask you to remember that the present law, insofar as it relates to financial transactions, was very largely written by those who now oppose the new law. In 1935, 1936, and 1937 they wrote into the law the financial provisions which prohibit credits, the extension of credits, or the public sale or exchange of bonds or other obligations by any belligerent government. At the end of that section they use this language:

"'Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its citizens, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.'

"If you will read that carefully, you will see that it places almost no restriction upon the President. He can grant a 60-day, 90-day, 120-day, or even 6 months' credits under it. Those of us who wrote this new law felt that that was too much discretion to give to the President, and that it should be limited. Consequently, we inserted into the law three definite restrictions.

"We said that the President could not permit the extensions of credit by our citizens to belligerent governments for a period longer than 90 days. It isn't 90 days' credit. The 90 days is the outside limit. Then, we provided that the obligation or contract by which the belligerent government bought goods from our citizens would have to show upon its face that it was not renewable. Our third restriction was that if any government failed to pay within 90 days they then could get no more credit.

"In other words, we took the present law, which was written by the opponents to the proposed law and which was loose and indefinite, and tied it up in three important particulars. Now the opponents of this law, who in 1935, 1936, and 1937 were perfectly satisfied with the indefinite and loose provisions which I have quoted, are trying to make you and other people in the country believe that the Pittman bill opens up the field for extended credits. It not only does not open up the field, it tries to tie up the loopholes in the present act."

The next letter was very short. It just had two sentences. Let me read them.

"You said over the radio last night that the United States will stay out of this war. Do you really believe it?"

My answer was: "I most assuredly do believe the United States will stay out of this war. The chief reason I believe it is that the American people are so determined to stay out. We know the utter futility of getting into another European war. We tried it once, thinking we could help solve Europe's problems. It took them only a short 20 years to get back at each other's throat again. We don't intend to sacrifice the lives, the bodies, and the minds of our young men, nor the resources of our country making that same mistake again.

"Another reason is that the Members of Congress are so determined that we stay out. Since I have been in Washington the last 2 weeks, I have not heard a single Member of Congress express the fatalistic idea that we had to get in. We are all determined that we are not going to get in.

"The third reason is that the President is determined to stay out. I talked to him and I talked to many Members of the Senate who also had conversations with him on the subject. You probably read criticisms of the President in the last few years that when he makes up his mind about something he, to quote the articles, 'gets his Dutch up' and nothing can change him. The President has 'his Dutch up' on this question of staying out of war, and nobody is going to change him on it."

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator SCHWELLENBACH. And this concludes part I of tonight's forum presentation.

Announcer MCCORMICK. This is the American Forum of the Air, originating in the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C., and presented over the Mutual Network by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

We return you to the chairman of the program, Mr. Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. And now as part II of tonight's American Forum of the Air we present an informal panel discussion. Our panel members are: Senators SHERMAN MINTON, of Indiana; CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida; RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia; and Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, former commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

Congressman VAN ZANDT will open the discussion.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. There can be no disagreement in this group about the desire and determination of the American people to keep out of this European war. We all conceive that the big idea behind neutrality is to keep out of war, other people's wars. Remember, that was the sole purpose of the arms embargo. Remember, that law was enacted in peacetime, enacted to preserve neutrality, the security and the peace of the United States, no matter what nations went to war in the future. Now that war is raging in Europe, it is not a question of American people loving one or the other of the warring sides less; Americans simply love a peaceful America more. Is that not so, Senator PEPPER?

Mr. PEPPER. I don't know whether I would say that the people of America love peace less than they ever have before. We have always loved peace, and we have always struggled to preserve peace, and what we are trying to do is to determine the best way by which that peace may still be preserved. After all, the problem is not as complicated as at first it might seem. Back a few months ago in the last session of the Congress, the President proposed that there be a change in the existing neutrality law. He proposed that we might make this law more complete and comprehensive than it then was because all of us recognized that there was a danger of war in Europe, and we were trying to get our house in order before the war got here. We were trying to pass a neutrality law that would pass in peacetime, and the President and a good many Members of Congress did what they could in behalf of that proposal, but there were some who said, "No; let's not try now to legislate upon a set of facts with which we are not familiar. We can do better when a war is here, if it comes at all, in framing our legislation."

Now, unfortunately, some of those who made that statement say, "Well, it might have been all right for us to have corrected our law back in peacetime, but now that war is here, we mustn't tamper with our legislation, because they will say we are taking sides." As a matter of fact, we have all come to appreciate that there is a false distinction which some have tried to make between the repeal of the arms embargo and the adoption of the cash-and-carry proposal. Germany herself has taught us more eloquently than anyone else that in modern warfare there is no difference, for example, between timber production or wood pulp out of which explosives may be made, and the explosives themselves, because Germany in the last few days has sunk the ships of neutral countries, the country of Sweden, to be specific, merely because they were carrying pulp out of which perhaps Great Britain might eventually manufacture explosives, or they were carrying timber which might be used in a coal mine to produce the coal which in turn might be employed in the manufacture of munitions. That indicates, therefore, that this false distinction between an airplane, calling it an implement of war, and the gasoline that runs the airplane, and calling it not; and they will get mad with us for selling the airplanes, but they won't get mad with us for selling the gasoline, without which the airplane cannot run.

I might propose a question to my friend, Senator HOLT, here. I make the distinction between the United States getting into this war or the United States having an interest direct enough to make us want to get into the war, and the United States having any interest in the outcome of this war. And I ask you, therefore, if you will be good enough to suggest to us your opinion whether the next 25 years the United States might be as safe and secure if Germany and Hitlerism were dominant in Europe as we have been the last 25 years, with Great Britain and France dominant in Europe?

Mr. HOLT. Senator PEPPER, I do not feel that we have to worry about what is going to happen in Europe. We have got a number of problems here in the United States to solve, and I realize that the best way that you might appeal to the individuals of the country is that if Hitler wins the war, he is coming over here some dark night and wheel us back in wheelbarrows. I don't think that he is. I think we have a wonderful Army and a wonderful Navy and a wonderful air force, and I feel we should increase it to take care of any emergencies that might arise.

Now, as to the question as to whether we have an interest in the war, I want to say, if we do have an interest in the war, we are on the way to war. You can't have an interest and not be on the way there, and if we get into this war-profit game—and we are going to get into it, don't be fooled about that—we are in the war economically, and if our interest is, as you seem to suggest, to help England and France to beat Hitler, then are we going to limit our interest only to the amount of money that they can give us in the supplies they buy? When they run out of cash will that interest die, or will our interest be that we need a little money to help out, and then, we need some soldiers?

If we are going to stimulate interest in the matter, I think the best interest is not what is best for England and France; what is best is what is best for the United States of America on this side of the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. MINTON. Well, Senator HOLT, I see that you have the same kind of parade marching that Senator OVERTON had. It is the parade of munitions marching, followed by the march of the dollars, followed by the flag, and followed by the soldiers that takes us into war. I don't think that any more follows by the repeal of the embargo than keeping the embargo means that England and France get beat, Hitler takes their navy, Bermuda, Jamaica, and the Bahamas right at our door, and then tells us what to do. The premises of this kind of affirmation lie wholly within speculation, and therefore they don't lead to anything but a speculative or emotional conclusion. We want to stay out of the war, and as Senators have said here tonight, we are determined to stay out of the war. That is the obligation that we all have to the American people at the present time. But we have to consider what we shall do when we are out of the war, namely, what shall be our attitude as a neutral?

Now I want to ask my colleagues that are assembled here around the table with me tonight, what your attitude would be if you were approaching the thing originally? Suppose there was pending before the Congress of the United States today the question of whether or not in the face of the realities as you see them now, we should pass an embargo act, whether or not you would vote to pass that embargo act?

With the realities such as they are today, I certainly wouldn't vote for any such embargo. Now, then, I want my colleagues to tell me whether or not, as an original proposition, they would want to vote for the embargo today. What do you say, Senator PEPPER?

Mr. PEPPER. Well, I certainly would not. It becomes very obvious, of course, that the existing neutrality legislation, as it is so-called, is not neutrality at all. What it actually does is to make it possible for Germany to buy from the countries around about her, which are contiguous land countries, anything they want to buy, and which recognizes their right to buy those things upon any terms upon which the sellers propose to sell them to them, but Great Britain, which happens to be a nation which is an island, and has to buy all her supplies from countries over the water, is cut off from buying from those countries to which she might have access by her ships because somebody said that while Hitler may buy from all these countries round about him on land without Great Britain getting mad with them and going to war with those countries, yet if we sell to Great Britain, to take home in her ships what they may buy here in our ports, then somehow or other Hitler is going to get mad with us because we are doing something we mustn't do.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I take it that you are very strongly in favor of the repeal of the arms embargo, and I recall the remarks of our President when he addressed the combined session of Congress. You recall he made the statement he wanted to return to international law. International law, of course, is mighty vague to the average citizen, and as you know, once war starts, both sides begin making international law to suit their own purposes. After the World War started in 1914, when the United States proposed an embargo on arms, you will recall that Great Britain protested that she would regard such a law as an unneutral act. The President and Secretary Hull to the contrary notwithstanding, many eminent authorities on international law say the repeal of the arms embargo now would be a direct violation of international law.

One authority cites the established principle of international law that a neutral nation may not, after the outbreak of war, change its legislation for the purpose of assisting one of the belligerents. This authority insists that if we repeal the arms embargo Germany would have the right under international law to take steps of reprisal and retaliation against American ships. It even goes so far as to say that German reprisals might be taken against American ships even in coastwise trade, and even if they were not carrying contraband. Isn't that what the American people wish to avoid at this time?

Mr. PEPPER. What the American people wish to avoid, Mr. VAN ZANDT, is being drawn in any manner into participation in this war. Let's just look a little below the surface and try to answer your question. Looking at this question of international law, it means that any neutral nation has a perfect right to send its own ships to any belligerent country loaded with any goods which are not contraband goods. It may send contraband goods, but if it does and an effective embargo is being maintained by the enemy of that belligerent country which is the destination of that shipment, these goods may be sunk, or in certain other cases they may be taken into the possession of the enemy country.

We are foregoing all that, but we are doing it voluntarily by imposing a voluntary restriction upon our own nation, and our citizens. In other words, because a mother says to her son, "You can't go to the picture show today," that doesn't mean that forever and a day he can't go to the picture show. He has a right to go to the picture show any day in the week, and while the mother may forbid it one day, that doesn't mean that a permanent policy is adopted that he will always be forbidden to exercise a legitimate right, so certainly no other country has a right to tell us what our domestic law will be. We are merely saying, under this proposal that is now before the Congress, if you want to buy anything that we have to sell, you come over here and get it; you pay for it or make satisfactory terms here in our own ports, you take it home on your own ships. If it is sunk upon the high seas it is your own loss, and the American people are not to suffer any loss in money, they are not to suffer any danger of loss in prestige, and they are not to suffer the possibility of their indignation being aroused that might lead us into the war.

Mr. HOLT. Senator PEPPER, I think you really added two words that are very important in this argument. You said "cash or satisfactory terms." That is what a lot of us are afraid of, those satisfactory terms. Starting with 90 days, and then 900, I wouldn't be a bit surprised. I think the American people want cash on the barrel head. That is what they want. They want cash, if they are going to sell, but I can't believe that the American people want to get into this munitions racket. I do not believe that they want to become merchants of death.

Now there are two reasons for the passage of this repeal of the arms embargo, and let's get down to business. First, it is to help one side; and, second, it is to get the profits. Now, as to the latter, it is just like reaching into a trap. We may get the bait without having the trap close on our hands, but in the World War we didn't, and another thing is to help one side and let our emotions become worked up to the idea of how terrible Hitler is and how beautiful and angelic England is. The nation has been at war fifty-odd times in the last century and a half. They are supposed to be fighting for us and democracy. Oh, they loved democracy when they went to Munich and around a conference table and sat along with Hitler and the rest of the dictators and split up Czechoslovakia because that didn't bother England. And you notice that now they are going to fight to preserve Poland. Well, they have never declared war on Russia, and Russia got a pretty good hunk out of Poland so far as I was able to find out. But it is terrible you know, and that is our part of the question of getting into it. I have no use for Hitler, nor do I have any use for any of the dictators, and because I feel that war will bring dictatorship to America, I am certain that we must stay out, and I am also more interested in the lives of the American boys than I am in the profits of the munitions trade.

Mr. MINTON. Well, Senator HOLT, you say we don't want to get into this munitions trade. We have been in it.

Mr. HOLT. We shouldn't have.

Mr. MINTON. Then we should reverse the policy of this Government for 150 years, because we have always been in that business in peacetime and in wartime, and that is the advice of this law that we are discussing today. As Senator CONNALLY pointed out so clearly in his masterful speech in the Senate the other day, "In peacetime we are permitted to sell all the munitions and ammunition and war supplies that we want to to anybody and take them to them in our own ships if we want to." How does that result? It results in the aggressor arming himself against the day when he will attack the fellow that he wants to attack, and under existing law we have been permitting munitions, yes, not many, but all manner of supplies going to Hitler and the aggressors throughout the world, in order that they may supply themselves with the munitions of war and the machinery of war and the engines of destruction against the day that they will declare themselves, and when that day comes, the people that they are going to attack, who haven't been preparing themselves, will be denied the right to get out and get the weapons to defend themselves. And that is the vice of this law as I see it. In other words, it says to the aggressor, all the arms in the world for offense, but not a single arm for defense. And I am against that law because of that more than any other one thing. I don't want to take sides in this war; I don't want to take Hitler's side, I don't want to take France and England's side, but I don't want to prevent those people from helping themselves, and that is what this embargo does. It has the effect of presenting Hitler with a navy that is big enough to keep England and France from the shores of America, and I say that is not impartiality, and that is not neutrality.

Mr. HOLT. I hope my colleagues will pardon me if I might interject a statement here. Talking about arming the aggressor, history will prove that it was not the United States that armed Hitler. England armed Hitler when they thought they needed Hitler up against Russia, and as far as our arming Hitler, do you know how much arms we sold Hitler the month before the war? We sold him less than $500 worth of arms. We didn't arm the aggressor. The arming of the aggressor has been a gain to the munitions racketeers of the world, arming one country against the other and then going to the other country and saying, "Look at that country, it is arming. You had better buy more arms," and so the arms racket continues.

Mr. MINTON. Why, it isn't the sale of arms, Senator HOLT. It is the sale of supplies. Hitler doesn't need arms. He has the factories to manufacture his own arms. He had been tending to that in peacetime, too. He was setting up the machinery in Germany to manufacture the machinery of war. He doesn't need ammunition from this country. All he needed was steel and copper and brass and cotton, and wherever he could get it, from this country or any other country. But he could get from us under this law in peacetime all the supplies he needed to manufacture the engines of war against the day when he would need them.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I can see that we have a very definite division of opinion on the panel tonight. When cash and carry has been mentioned, I feel sure that Senator MINTON, especially, will recognize it as a misnomer. If we extend the proposed 90-day credit, cash goes out the window, and I wonder if it wouldn't be well to call it, instead of cash and carry, title and tote. There is a division of opinion in the country just the same as there is on this panel tonight, and, of course, the division prevails very strongly in Congress on two points of the arms embargo, and I wonder if the radio audience tonight just knows how many articles are listed under the arms embargo. First, rifles, machine guns, cannon of all sorts, projectiles, bombs, torpedoes, military armored vehicles, armored trains, tanks; second, war vessels of all kind; third, aircraft, assembled and unassembled, and the essential parts of airplanes; fourth, revolvers and automatics, and ammunition; fifth, aircraft, other than the ones specified in section 3; and, sixth, a number of items with unpronounceable names, which are for the most part for gas used in warfare, and for powders for high explosives. Then the other part is cash and carry. There is also a great deal of confusion on these two points. Let's remember we had the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry provision both in the same law until the cash-and-carry provision lapsed by limitation of law on May 1, 1939.

Inasmuch as four-fifths of the articles that Americans support are on the contraband list of both Germany and Great Britain, why can't we Members of Congress keep the arms embargo and reenact the cash-and-carry provisions of the old law on raw materials? Wouldn't that meet the approval of all the American people, and at the same time minimize the danger of the United States becoming involved in this Europeon war?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I wonder if I might get back in this debate a minute, because JIMMY VAN ZANDT has done just exactly what I said the opponents of this law were doing. He criticized the present law as not being cash and carry, and then he referred to that other law as being cash and carry. These people have been going around telling the people of this country for the last 4 years that they put over a cash-and-carry bill, and there wasn't a single word of cash in it. This bill which we propose tightens up the cash provision. Under the bill as I read from the bill itself, the President had complete discretion to grant credits as long as he used some standard of ordinary commercial transaction, and he could have granted those credits for 90 days, 120 days, 6 months, or a year, or even 2 years. But the law which we propose limits those credits to not more than 90 days, and says that they must show on their face that they are nonrenewable, and if they are not paid within 90 days, then that government cannot get any more credit, yet my friend, Congressman VAN ZANDT, persists in doing what every opposing speaker who attempts to tell the people about this portion of the bill, says that they had a cash-and-carry bill. It wasn't cash, there wasn't any cash involved in it. We have tried to put some cash into this one, and just because we happened to write this, then they say it is a credit bill and not a cash bill.

Mr. OVERTON. I would like to say something since Senator SCHWELLENBACH and I, who were on the first of the program have remained here very quietly, and since Senator SCHWELLENBACH has got back into the argument, I think I ought to be allowed to say something. I am not so much concerned about this cash and carry and the 90-day credit, but I am concerned with that question that Senator SCHWELLENBACH has answered, and that is that he takes the position that we ought to supply arms and ammunitions of war in order to be neutral and in order that we might not discriminate in favor of one nation and against another nation. But the proponents of the arms embargo, who are now opposing it, answered that argument in 1935, in 1936, and in 1937, and I think they answered it very effectively. What they said was this, that the United States can't undertake to put other nations on an equality, they can't undertake to arm weak nations and they can't undertake to increase their territorial boundaries or to undertake to say what form of government they should have, or anything like that. What we have got to do is to tend to our own affairs, and not be sticking our nose in the affairs of Europe. Why, we had the arms embargo when Italy was at war with Ethiopa, and there was a complaint on the part of Italy that she had a navy and Ethiopa had none, and we were denying her these arms and ammunitions, and that she ought to have them. But as has been heretofore contended, that is not our concern. We are not to undertake to say that we shall, in the course of war and in the midst of it, furnish the weak nation with arms in order that it may be able to contend with the strong nation.

Now, the other point made is this, and it leads us directly into the war. It makes us partisans in this controversy, and that is that we have got a dictator over yonder. We have a dictator that is on the warpath and wants to conquer everything that he can, and that we ought to stop him. Now, that is really what is back of this arms embargo. The first step to stop it is to furnish his opponents with as much ammunition of war as we can possibly get over there to them, in the belligerents' own ships, and then, if that isn't enough, we are going to take the next step as we did in the World War, and as I said, the dollars will follow the arms, and the American soldiers will follow the dollars.

Mr. PEPPER. I just want to say this: If it were possible by the repeal of this arms embargo to stop Hitler, I would say thank God we have that opportunity upon such a simple reason. I am glad Mr. VAN ZANDT brought out the question of what is involved in the embargo, because to hear this question stated, you would think there was a clear line of demarcation between these so-called arms, ammunition, and implements of war and all these other things which were totally harmless. You heard that list read out. Those are the embargoed things. What about steel, out of which shells are made? The opponents don't embargo that. And rubber, upon which these mechanized instruments roll, they don't stop that, nor the gasoline that makes all of Hitler's or any other army's motorized equipment move. They don't stop that. They don't stop the telephone wires that send the order that makes the cannon shoot. They don't stop the cotton out of which guncotton is made, they don't stop the nitrate, they don't stop the tin, and they don't stop the wheat, so they are willing for us to help, and they propose to make some false distinction which the belligerents themselves do not recognize.

Mr. HOLT. I can't see why, if we have a hole in the fence, we should tear down all of the fence in order to plug up that hole. The issue is, if all those things are going, why shouldn't we stop them, and also stop arms. And that is what the arms embargo does. We want to keep the arms embargo plus all of these other safeguards we have. We have nothing at stake except preservation of neutrality in the United States by stopping war profits.

Mr. PEPPER. Would you stop every export?

Mr. HOLT. I would if it would save the life of a single American boy.

Mr. PEPPER. So would we all.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you gentlemen. You have been listening to an informal panel discussion on American neutrality. Our panel members were: Senators SHERMAN MINTON, of Indiana; CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida; RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia; and Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT.

This discussion followed prepared remarks by Senators JOHN H. OVERTON and LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH.

And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Announcer MCCORMICK. So we have concluded the second broadcast in this season's series of the American Forum of the Air broadcasts emanating from the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C.

The facilities of these radio studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization. The Mutual network will bring you this forum broadcast every Sunday evening from 8 to 9 o'clock, eastern standard time, throughout the session of Congress. Tickets to this broadcast may be had by sending your request to station WOR, New York, or WOL, Washington. In the interest of education there is printed and distributed, free of charge, a limited number of copies of the entire proceedings of these broadcasts. Address your requests and comments to WOL.

The American Forum of the Air is directed by Theodore Granik, who presided as chairman tonight, and comes to you as a presentation of WOR in cooperation with WOL.

This is Stephen McCormick speaking.

Dedication of North Beach Airport, New York

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY COL. EDGAR S. GORRELL

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a little change from the tone of the phrases which have been heard during the last several weeks will do no harm. I may say that I seek to have inserted in the Record as a part of the Appendix something of which I am personally very proud. During the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 I sought to have enacted by the Congress of the United States a civil aviation authority measure giving to an independent commission the entire matter of civil aviation. That effort was successful, and the law was enacted in June 1938. I am happy that under an act which I was able to formulate the President of the United States appointed a very capable and competent commission, known as the Civil Aeronautics Authority, which now has absolute control, as an independent agency, over everything pertaining to civil aeronautics.

Mr. President, during the time this authority has had control of civil aviation in the United States the number of catastrophes in the air has been reduced to a minimum, so that today those who seek to travel across the continent from any direction may travel with an assurance of safety.

Col. Edgar S. Gorrell, the president of the Air Transport Association of America, in a speech delivered a few days ago bearing on the subject of aviation, and having to do with safety in the air dwelt on this matter at length. I ask unanimous consent that his speech, which is very short and very cogent, may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Heaven once met earth only on the far horizon, receding always beyond man's reach. Today that union is accomplished at hundreds of airports, available throughout the land. The greatest of all these portals where the airways dip to meet the highways is North Beach Airport, a monument to the eternal exploration of new frontiers which it is man's destiny to pursue in his struggle to break the bonds of time and space.

In how many ways is North Beach monumental?

Since organized society began, one of the Government's most proper functions has been the conversion into useful wealth of raw resources and sterile currency through public works. With characteristic realism our great President has stated bluntly this immutable principle. But never has that function been more faithfully discharged than in the airport program of the Work Projects Administration, launched at a time when airport construction has been crucial to the Nation's commerce, pleasure, postal service, and defense. In North Beach, Col. F. C. Harrington, our far-seeing W. P. A. leader, with the able cooperation of his distinguished assistant, Col. Brehon B. Somervell, has brought that program to a high point with the largest and most important project in any field which his fine Administration has undertaken.

Monumental, too, North Beach is of the vision which has inspired New York City to become the cynosure of the world's trade. Municipal wharves beckoning to the seven seas might have satisfied a less alert community. But under the leadership of a dynamic mayor, the Honorable Fiorello LaGuardia, America's first city has looked restlessly beyond the waves that lap its shores into the skies that provide a boundless avenue to every segment of the globe. New York has responded to the challenge of progress yet to be unrolled beneath the tireless spindle of the sun.

Monumental as well, this airport is of the foresight and accomplishment of the United States Post Office Department. If the Department were to claim the triumphs of civil aeronautics as the children of its dreams, no one could gainsay. In 21 years the route miles of its Air Mail Service have multiplied by 31,400 percent the miles flown by 360,000 percent. Notable in this advance has been the record made under the present Postmaster General, the Honorable James A. Farley, who, with the able support of men unsurpassed in devotion to their duty, has carried on in the best tradition of a matchless Postal Service.

Again, North Beach is monumental of the newest of our agencies of government, for its construction coincides with a period of splendid achievement in air transportation in which the new Civil Aeronautics Authority, now rounding out its first year of life, has played an important part. Some of us may remember days now long past when the traveler by air confronted risks such as those faced by the traveler by rail or water some decades ago. But so swiftly did the efforts of the air lines and of the regulating government achieve safety that we can today look back upon a record surpassing even that of our friends of the railroads, whose enviable record has certainly been the acme of safety. In approximately the past 6 months the domestic air lines flew 450,000,000 passenger-miles without a single fatality. This safety record is 63 percent better than the passenger-mile-per-passenger-fatality record of these great American railroads for the last calendar year.

But most of all, North Beach is monumental of the place assumed by aeronautics in the ordinary life of the American family and in the routine of American business, for your neighbor and mine have taken to the air for business and vacation travel, obtaining relief from the drab scenes of every day, restoring a vision of God's great universe, a vision all too frequently lost in the bustle of modern life.

It is not by caprice that the greatest block of hangars in the world is built here. For the fact is that public enthusiasm for the safe, dependable, swift, and comfortable air liner for travel and shipment has placed America's air transport ahead of all the world. The most recent monthly figures released by the Civil Aeronautics Authority show that in every one of the six significant items reported—passengers, passenger-miles, seat-miles, pounds of express, express-pound miles, and total miles flown—domestic air transport has reached a new all-time high. In 13 years our travelers by air have increased by 30,000 percent.

The dedication of North Beach Airport, then, is no casual event. Nor is pride in the excellence and the beauty of its construction confined to you who hold its title. The entire Nation recognizes the import of this undertaking and joins New York in acclaim of those who have built so well and wisely. In buckling land and sea and sky together, you have provided a symbol of the contribution which thousands of men have made to the growth of aeronautics and of the promise which aeronautics holds for the welfare and prosperity of America. You have provided for America's greatest city an air terminal, appropriate to that highway, bounded only by the far horizon, where the mind and soul of man can soar to new heights or fulfill childhood dreams. In the world of tomorrow travel by air to New York from all points of the universe will reach beyond your wildest dreams. Today's boasts will seem puny beside tomorrow's accomplishments.

Air transportation salutes you, citizens of New York, and your far-seeing mayor, whose vision and that of his associates have made possible this truly modern air terminal, contributing, as it does, to the enhancement of safety and efficiency in travel and trade by air—a terminal available to every man and his magic carpet—the modern airliner—on voyages of exploration denied to the earthbound.

Testimonial Dinner to Francis P. Matthews

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. PAUL V. McNUTT

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, on October 17, at Omaha, Nebr., a very able and interesting address was delivered by Hon. Paul V. McNutt, Federal Security Administrator. The occasion was a testimonial dinner honoring an outstanding Omaha citizen, Francis P. Matthews, who was recently elected Supreme Knight of the Knights of Columbus. Mr. McNutt also presented felicitations from President Roosevelt. I ask unanimous consent that the address by Mr. McNutt may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight I bring a twofold greeting to this distinguished gathering, and in particular to its most honored guest—the man whom you have unanimously chosen as the supreme knight of your order. First, in behalf of the President and at his request, let me repeat and reemphasize the message of congratulations he extended to your leader and to all your membership in the letter which Governor Cochran has just read. Second, I want to express my own very genuine pleasure in being here with you. It is a privilege to participate in this great occasion.

It is a privilege which I appreciate the more because, as a member of the American Legion, I count the Knights of Columbus as old and highly valued friends. Your organization made invaluable contributions to the courage, the morale, and the physical welfare of our soldiers and sailors during the war, and to the rehabilitation of our ex-service men after the war was over. I know that from 1917 on, for a period of something like 10 years, you gave, with unstinted generosity, of your time and money; something like $44,000,000 of your funds went into this common cause. The American Legion owes you a further debt of gratitude for the large sum—$85,000 as I recall it—which the Knights of Columbus turned over to it shortly after your own post-war activities had been brought to a close.

These services were of value not only for themselves but also for the spirit in which they were given. The canteens, the first aid, and medical services for men at the front; the hospital care, the training and educational provisions to fit returning soldiers for normal life again were offered in a spirit of true Christian fellowship, without regard to class or creed. This, too, we remember.

In the decade and more that has passed since this wartime chapter in your history closed, your order has been continuously concerned to promote, in peacetime also, the practice and the ideals of American patriotism. This again is in line with the thinking and the objectives of the Legion, and for this again we pay you our sincere respects. No better evidence of the relationship between our two organizations can be found than the numbers of men in all parts of the country who are members of both. To my fellow Legionnaires here present and to all Legionnaires in your local councils elsewhere, I extend my greetings.

But the enjoyment of meeting with friends, old and new, is, it seems to me, only one of the opportunities which this evening offers us. Installation in an office of high trust and leadership always marks a milestone in the life of the individual so chosen and of the group which has elected him to preside over it. For both it is a time to reweigh values and to renew faith. And for all of us who are privileged to share in this testimonial, it may well mark a moment of similar self-examination.

With this in mind, I have been reviewing, during the past week, some of the background for the event we are celebrating tonight. This background—the history of the Knights of Columbus and of its new supreme knight—is, no doubt, far better known to most of you than it is to me. But perhaps, for my present purposes, my somewhat less intimate perspective may give me a certain advantage; I can see in these two life histories—that of the organization and that of the man—a parallel line of growth which to your closer view may not be so apparent. But I am certain you will agree that the course both have taken is one of peculiar significance for us all. Let me trace it briefly:

I trust Mr. Matthews will not object to my pointing out, to begin with, that he and the order he now heads are contemporaries. The Knights of Columbus was founded in New Haven, Conn., only 5 years before Francis Matthews was born in Albion, Nebr. The early days of both—a brief 50 years ago—followed a then familiar pattern. The young organization got its start as a small fraternal group—it had only 11 members, I think—concerned to give each other mutual help in providing for the welfare of their own families. The boy got his start in the equally neighborly small-town setting of our great Middle West. The roots of both struck deep into the traditions of American community life. With passing years these roots have grown still deeper, but the branches have spread far. From its local nucleus, the Knights of Columbus grew from city to city and from State to State, until finally it spread beyond our national boundaries. In the same way, your leader grew from a small-town boy to a man whose interests reach from city to city, from State to State, and even beyond our national bounds.

My reason for reciting these facts is not merely to offer felicitations on these two parallel "success stories"; they speak for themselves. Rather my purpose is to cite them as outstanding examples of the line and the direction which we all must take, if we are to keep pace with the world today. In pushing back their early local horizons, in expanding the area of their responsibilities, this man and this group have been in the vanguard of a movement which has swept us far from the narrow outlook of the past. There are some people of less vision who have been reluctant to accept this changing outlook, who have tried to limit their world by putting on the blinders of local self-interest. Our personal welfare, the security of our families, the stability of the communities in which we live, and indeed the safety of the Nation itself depend not only on events near at hand but also on those that once, in the not-so-distant past, would have appeared remote.

Today, more truly even than ever before, no man can live unto himself. The phenomenal growth of our Nation in the past century has broken down all the old limits of opportunity—and of risk as well. As our life has grown both more complex and more closely interrelated, as the area of social and economic insecurity has expanded, we have been compelled also to expand the area of care, cure, and prevention. The recognition of national responsibility for Nation-wide protection against the widespread and impersonal hazards of modern industrial society, will, in my opinion, prove to be one of the most enduring achievements of our generation. Our private citizens have taken this Nation-wide view. Our organized civic and social groups have similarly expanded their interests. And, most significant of all, our Government has come to utilize all its machinery—Federal, as well as State and local, to promote the general welfare, or as we more often say today, to protect the security of the individual and of his family. What was once a local responsibility began, a quarter of a century ago, to be recognized as a State concern. In our own time it has been accepted also as a national obligation.

During the past 9 or 10 years this movement has been manifest in many directions; the Federal Government has undertaken activities which have appeared new only to those who have failed to see that we are simply employing broader means of attaining old ends, of assuring that the rights of a free people shall not be denied because of personal misfortune. There is nothing new about this; it simply reaffirms a time-honored principle. The Government of the United States was founded on this principle of equal opportunity for all; our history has repeatedly proved that it works. It is working today. But because today we are a vast and varied, yet closely knit Nation of 130,000,000, we must now apply this principle on an equally Nation-wide scale.

Two of our most important steps in this direction have occurred within the past few months—the establishment of the Federal Security Agency in July and the strengthening of the Social Security Act through the amendments passed in August. These steps, of course, were not sudden or unpremeditated occurrences; they followed as a logical sequence in the development of American social legislation. The history of this movement is as well known to you as it is to me, and I shall not review it here. The point I want to make is that through the great series of Government services that are now in operation, the American people are simply doing on the broadest possible scale—through their Government—what you have been doing for the past 50 years through your fraternal organization: They are uniting their forces for mutual service and joint protection on a Nation-wide base.

The establishment of the Federal Security Agency gave further evidence of and impetus to this trend. It brings together major Government services for the welfare of the family and its individual members—the Office of Education, the Public Health Service, the Civilian Conservation Corps, the National Youth Administration, and the Social Security Board, under which in turn come public assistance to the needy, job insurance, and old-age insurance, expanded by recent congressional amendment to provide insurance also for the worker's family. This reorganization of Federal security activities looks toward economy and efficiency, and much more. It unifies a policy; it sets an objective.

President Roosevelt himself has stated its purpose in the reorganization plan by which it was created: "To promote social and economic security, educational opportunity, and the health of the citizens of the Nation." This is a pledge to every man, woman, and child in the country. It rededicates our Government to its own time-honored ideals.

Security—a sound footing on which to build our individual lives—is a necessity common to us all. Some of us are rich and some poor. But rich or poor, we need today Nation-wide protection against sickness, ignorance, and economic hazards. We all know how one typhoid carrier can wreck the health of a community. We are beginning to recognize that unleashed ignorance is an equally menacing contagion. And we have learned from experience that the worst of all epidemics is economic instability. It has not been so long since we emerged from such an epidemic, and we know its cost not only in dollars and cents, but also in human hopes and happiness. We know that health and education alone will not forestall want—that threats to the people's pay envelopes can be equally devastating.

We recognize too that it takes many kinds of security to protect every group and every age. True, every living human soul needs shelter and food and clothing. But security limited to that alone is the security of a prison or a poorhouse. This is not the security that a free people will tolerate for its children, its youth, its working men and women, its aged. Each of these groups and each person in these groups has individual needs. And of all groups, that which most needs security and which contributes most to individual security, is the family. There—on family security—is where the greatest emphasis belongs; on the security a man builds up for himself and his wife and children during his working years; the security that goes on when he is too old to work; the security that doesn't vanish when he dies. For people with homes and families, however modest, these are the foundations of the kind of life we prize. Our privilege to call ourselves an enlightened democracy depends on how well we meet the needs both of the individual and of the family. That is what we are working toward in all the programs which now come under the Federal Security Agency—security for the individual and for the family.

Through public assistance we are providing for three groups who are already in need—for those who cannot support themselves because they are old, or because they are blind, for children in families that have lost their breadwinner. More than two and a half million men, women, and children are getting this aid from combined Federal, State, and local funds—aid that provides perhaps only for bare necessities, but does at least enable these people and these families to maintain themselves and their place in our social structure.

But we are no longer content to wait until want has already become a reality before we give through to security. Our further concern is to forestall want—to offer working people a means of assuring an income for the inevitable rainy day; to prevent, insofar as possible, conditions which lead to insecurity and destitution. To that end we have established systems of social insurance and we have built up a great series of constructive and preventive services.

More than forty-five and one-half million wage earners now have accounts under Federal old-age and survivors insurance. Broadened and strengthened by the recent amendments, this system now provides monthly benefits not only for aged workers but also for their wives or dependent children; and it provides a similar income for widows, young children, or in some cases, aged parents of workers who die. These benefits begin next year and it is estimated that by the end of 1940 something like 900,000 individuals—workers and their families—may be drawing payments.

Through the new Bureau of Employment Security, recently organized under the Social Security Board, we have brought together on the Federal level, as they already were in the States, two other essential services for wage earners. These are job insurance and employment service. Through this agency, the Federal Govgovernment is helping the States to bring men and jobs together and to provide out-of-work benefits to bridge the gap between the old job and the new. More than twenty-seven and one-half million wage earners now have this protection under laws in all the States.

Through the Public Health Service we are combatting the menace of contagion, epidemic, and other widespread hazards, which may undermine health and so lead to insecurity and want. Through the Office of Education we are stimulating the varied educational opportunities essential to a democratic people, and we are providing vocational rehabilitation so that handicapped workers can again become self-supporting. Through the Civilian Conservation Corps and the National Youth Administration we are giving youth a chance to build up their bodies and their morale; a chance to learn how to work and to get training for future work; a chance to provide for their own support and their families' support; and a chance to contribute to the wealth of the Nation by public work well done. On this front, youth has fought a winning battle against its twin enemies of want and idleness. We have seen across the seas what happens when youth refuses longer to be frustrated and responds to any summons that promises it a future—no matter if that future does turn out to be one of destruction.

The Federal Security Agency and its five member organizations are not the only branches of our National Government which are dedicated to this purpose. In its broader sense, social security embraces all the measures through which the American people are utilizing Government as a channel for joint action and cooperative self-protection—including those that safeguard the health and welfare of children, that deal with wages and hours of labor, that protect the people's savings, that promote agricultural rehabilitation, and that look to the development of decent, healthful housing. In all these fields, a beginning, and more than a beginning, has been made; and continued growth may be expected. In others, we are still only feeling our way—notably in the development of a comprehensive and effective national health program. But the line of progress is clear. In this country all our forces are geared to the conservation not only of our natural resources, but also to our human resources.

We have come a long way toward assuring this kind of security in the past few years. But there is much still to be done. The 1930's presented a problem of Nation-wide need, and we attacked it and solved it in the best and quickest way we knew. Looking back we can see where mistakes were made, where organizations and activities were duplicated. We are profiting by this experience. The 1940's should improve administration and consolidate the gains of the 1930's. The framework has been established. The task now is to simplify and perfect the human relationships involved—between the public servants who administer Government services on the one side, and the millions of our fellow citizens who stand to benefit from them on the other.

I emphasize this human element, this relationship between the men and women who serve and are served. For Government activities are nothing in themselves. The Government machine does not run unless it is manned—and manned by competent, well-equipped personnel. And it runs to no purpose unless it performs the task for which it is intended. In the case of social-security activities, that task is to provide a base upon which individuals may build their own lives, according to their own desires and their own capacities. Our objective is a security founded on self-respect and looking toward self-sufficiency. Its objective is independence, not regimentation.

No man, woman, or child is made a better individual through regimentation growing out of need. We have seen what regimentation has led to elsewhere. And the observation of what has happened to other peoples has made Americans more determined to preserve their time-honored rights and privileges as a democratic people. We believe that pooling widespread risks and providing cooperative protection is one means to that end. We believe that our established mechanisms of government offer an appropriate and effective method of taking democratic action for social security as for other common needs.

But today, as in the past, we expect every citizen to bear his share of this common responsibility and to undertake the individual responsibilities which no government should try to take from him—or can take from him without destroying the qualities of character which we prize most deeply. Individual initiative, individual thrift and industry, individual courage and independence in thought and in action are part and parcel of our heritage.

We do not have to go back to the founding fathers to find men who have stood as exemplars of these qualities. Here in this still young State of Nebraska—where the days of the open frontier are well within the memory of men yet living—you have given the Nation a full and varied quota of such leaders. Offhand, I call to mind William Jennings Bryan, the Creightons, whose contributions included the establishment of the university that bears their name, and among our own contemporaries such distinctive leaders as Senator George Norris, Willa Cather, Roscoe Pound, Edith and Grace Abbott, and though he is a native son of my own State of Indiana, I shall let you claim also for the time being my friend, the Right Reverend James H. Ryan, bishop of Omaha. This is only a scattering of distinguished Nebraska names—each of us can extend the list of those who could say with another earlier son of Nebraska: "I acquired almost by instinct a firm belief in the future. * * * My still youthful imagination had been fired by the limitless reaches of prairie; perhaps it was the pioneer blood in my veins * * * this faith in a new country * * * I had begun to see visions and dream dreams."

That statement, incidentally, was made by the Abbott sisters' father, Othman A. Abbott, in 1867.

This is the spiritual heritage, not only of your own State, but of all the States. It has never been more virile and vital—or more needed—than it is today. The preservation and the enrichment of our great democratic tradition is what we are striving for as individuals, as voluntary groups, and as citizens working throughout local, State, and Federal Governments. Let no one think this is an easy task. It is a challenge—but a challenge which we face with confidence born of our experience as a united Nation and our deep personal convictions as a democratic people.

In the words of the President: "If we fight with all our strength for the preservation of the ideal of liberty in which this Nation was conceived and the principle of equality on which it was founded; if we recognize and protect ourselves from the dangers that threaten from without and within; if all groups and all classes work together in a spirit of tolerance—then we can be sure that we will not come to the end of our dream."

Some of the steps we have taken in recent years to protect and foster this American way of life I have already outlined; we are well on the road toward safeguarding security within. But we all know that the President spoke truly when he said that dangers threaten us from without as well as from within. Today nations can no more live to themselves alone than can individuals. Our area of interest has indeed broadened; like that of your own organization, it has gone beyond the cities and the States within our own bounds and must look also to world conditions which may affect our own internal welfare.

The first duty of the United States, as indeed of any nation, is to itself. Rightly and properly, our Government has made as its first objective the preservation of our national security, our freedom, and our peace. Patriotism requires this; common sense exacts it. But our duty to ourselves and to the world does not stop there; it necessarily includes concern for the reestablishment and maintenance of peace among nations. Whenever the foundations for peace are threatened anywhere, we are in danger.

People talk of minding our own business, but everything depends on what is meant. It may mean only cowering in the precarious shelter of the narrow Atlantic, until we fly into a panic and plunge into war without knowing exactly who we are in the world or what kind of peace we want. Or it may mean a cool appraisal of world crisis and determined action to avoid being sunk.

The central fact is that America has to be prepared for unpredictable events, the shape and timing of which are beyond our power to control. A year from now, North America may be isolated in a ring of hostile air and naval bases. Or the war may be continuing as an endless progress of destruction. Or there may be a new peace followed by economic collapse, and by the certainty of future wars.

Our own business is not merely to strengthen our external defenses to meet the worst possible outcome of the present war. It is also to build up our internal physical condition and our morale so that no disaster can drive us to panic and internal collapse. Of these, morale is the most vital, as all recent wars have shown.

At the worst, North America may be left as the only remnant of civilization. At best, North America must be the sound nucleus for world recovery after the present fit is over. That is our business, and minding it successfully will be statesmanship that will color the history of the next thousand years.

We are preeminently a peaceful people, with a peaceful history. We have not used peace to organize for war; nor is war and conquest the ideal of national thinking or the goal of national policy. The result has been to release American energy for the greatest peace development known in the modern world. Our national objective remains, as it has always been, construction—not destruction. We like this way of life; and we propose to continue it.

But American life in a world at war, even though we stay out of that war—as we all believe and pray that we shall—is not the same as life in a world at peace. This is why those of us who are engaged in public affairs, and all of us who are here gathered must still pledge ourselves to an active concern for the cause of peace. Even now it is not, at least for us, by any means a lost cause. We are now engaged in an earnest search for the best means to preserve our neutrality—the spirit of neutrality, as well as the letter of the law. We continue to aline all our moral and spiritual forces on the side of enduring peace.

Speaking as a member of the American Legion to members of the Knights of Columbus in the person of your distinguished leader, I know that our thoughts follow the same road out of the past and on into the future. We have both experienced war; we know what it means. Because we have no illusions about war, to us the making and the keeping of the peace are more than words. Because we know what war means, we believe no effort is too great to keep our Nation from being put to this bitter test. May we continue the ways of peace in all our national and personal pursuits.

In today's tormented, confused, deluded, bewildered, and bedeviled world, it may well prove the supreme test of courage to stand firm on the side of peace. As individuals and as a Nation we have that courage. And we are prepared to take the position of leadership for which the United States is so eminently fitted by its material circumstances and by its spiritual ideals.

Peace at home and with all nations—that is our purpose and our prayer. With us, we know, in spite of war and the imminent threat of destruction, are joined all sane men the world over. Those in the warring nations know even better than we the truth of Pope Pius' recent words—"Nothing is lost through peace; all may be lost through war."

And our hearts, through these troubled times, will continue devoutly to echo the message he has given to all peoples and all creeds:

"May God appear and make shine a rainbow of calm peace and harmonious work among nations above this restless world, which is like a tempestuous sea. We should not cease to raise to Him the earnest plea, 'Give us peace, O Lord, in our time.'"

American Foreign Policy

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. BORAH

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY PROF. EDWIN BORCHARD

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of American foreign policy, delivered by Prof. Edwin Borchard, of Yale University, before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, at Philadelphia, Pa., October 14, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We may assume that the policy to be discussed is the one best calculated to protect the interests of the United States rather than the interests of foreign countries. At all events, I was informed by your President that we might assume that American public opinion is definitely in favor of American neutrality, but that the debate centers around the method by which neutrality can be maintained. On that assumption, the most vital issue of current discussion is whether the proposed lifting of the arms embargo will or will not aid in the preservation of American neutrality.

Perhaps a little recent background is justified. Whereas before 1914 there was hardly an American citizen who would not have insisted that neutrality of the United States in foreign wars was the only sensible policy for this country to pursue, the United States participation in the last European war and the Geneva theory of intervention to punish aggressors has loosened the moorings of American foreign policy. So far as concerns American neutrality, the United States is now a ship without much of a rudder, subject to the violent winds of interventionist propaganda both at home and abroad.

If that propaganda succeeds again, our participation in the last war will not only have been fraught with unadulterated evils to the United States, if not indeed to Europe, but will seem to have been merely a forerunner of our permanent association in the balance of power in Europe. One of the great purposes of the Revolutionary War will thus have been annulled. If the interventionists have their way, the United States will be firmly tied to that destiny; not in the avowed and frank name of power politics, but in the more subtle guise of defending the higher morality. In late years the interventionists, yielding lip service to popular demands, have employed the alluring words of "peace" and "neutrality" to justify their warlike thoughts and advocacy. Hence there is now the utmost confusion, born of the clash between those who want to maintain the peace of the United States by staying out of foreign wars and those who profess to wish to maintain its peace by taking sides in foreign wars. This is the underlying issue. And the confusion is reflected in the fact that the proposed neutrality bill embodies both interventionists and noninterventionist ideas simultaneously. Out of such confusion great danger arises. The function of a commentator is, if possible, to clarify the issue.

The arms embargo has become something of a battlefield for these conflicting views of national policy. But before tracing the legislative struggle, it may be well to point out that the Geneva theory of combined action to punish and coerce "aggressors" came into head-on collision with both the theory and the practice of neutrality. It contemplated that when any country revolted against the established system—and at that time the one of Versailles seemed the desirable one to maintain—it would be denounced by all its associates as an aggressor and the combined use or threat of force would restore the revolter to order. This was supposed to insure peace, and the device became known by the reassuring term "collective security" or "sanctions" to "enforce peace."

The idea rested upon certain assumptions, namely, that the nations had arrived at relative stability, that the world represented primarily a moral order, that the coercers would remain united, that their interests and desires for peace would remain uniform, that the recalcitrant, endowed with the somewhat scurrilous name of aggressor—a concept elusive and altogether subjective—would surrender before a show of force or in contrition would cease and desist. It was assumed that nations judge each other objectively and not in the light of their interests, their alliances, and their prior commitments; that a country can be guaranteed against the consequences of its own ineptitude and against deterioration of its resources, physical and spirtual.

Every one of these assumptions involved delusions of the first magnitude, both historical and psychological, and every attempt to apply the system produced disorders which have been a material factor in the world's disorganization. This false mechanistic view of a dynamic world of living beings produced the strange thesis that the 90 percent of the peace-loving peoples should quarantine the warlike 10 percent. It is no wonder that these illusions as to how to enforce stability, purveyed to a disordered and essentially unmaintainable post-war world, helped to bring about an astronomical increase in armaments. The theory of combined coercion against aggressors had no roots in human experience and had to meet the fate that usually awaits unsound experiments.

But the most dangerous effects of this false theory were reserved for the United States. Neutrality, a national tradition, became the object of violent and unreasoning attack. And this is not unnatural, for if under the theory of sanctions everyone must join the posse comitatus against an aggressor, neutrality is necessarily taboo. The wisdom, the propriety, and the possibility of America's staying out of foreign wars were derided. The American principle of nonintervention was denounced as cowardly and immoral.

One of the most prominent advocates of this startling theory has characterized neutrality as the negation of law and order:

"Neutrality," he said, "is a denial of the principle of collective responsibility upon which any system of international law must rest. * * * Neutrality must go as a legal conception."

It is quite consistent that this leader should wish the arms embargo lifted, not because it would help American neutrality but "to insure that the aggressor shall not succeed in his criminal act."

I will not stop now to explain the benefits which four centuries of experience with neutrality had given a precarious and harassed world. But in brief, that experience had taught that if war breaks out in this world of motley nations, it is better to limit the area of conflict, to regulate and humanize its conduct, to keep out of war as many nations and peoples as possible, to cultivate philosophic detachment and impartiality toward the struggle, to aid neither side, to permit nonparticipants to continue the processes of life and thus enable the warring nations the sooner to recover from their orgy and restore normal relations. Every addition to the number of belligerents makes more destructive the course of a war and more difficult the conclusion of a sane peace. Under this principle, in spite of frequent wars, a large part of the world before 1914 was usually at peace.

But Europe is older and more sophisticated than the United States. Well-informed men generally realized that the practice, if not the theory, of collective security was a mere device in the uninterrupted maneuvering of power politics. Its idealistic veil in Europe was dropped. Not so in the United States. Here its devotees have worked unceasingly to introduce interventionist ideas into the country, and more particularly into the several neutrality acts and resolutions proposed or enacted since 1928. And they have not labored in vain, for they have won support in the highest quarters. The result has been a continuous struggle between, on the one hand, genuine neutrality, which implies abstention from other people's wars and impartiality in the treatment of belligerents, and, on the other hand, discriminatory treatment against the so-called aggressor.

Before dealing with the statutory development, it may be well to allay a common misconception. It is said that "there is no such thing as neutrality." What is probably meant is that the equal operation of neutral duties upon the belligerents is difficult or impossible to achieve. But the law never conceived neutrality in any such sense. It merely requires that the neutral state must not intentionally hold the scales uneven or exhibit partisanship. It is not the neutral's duty or privilege to equalize the handicaps of a belligerent arising out of geographical and other considerations. Motive is a primary criterion of neutrality. So is candor.

Apparently inspired by the Kellogg Pact, the first arms-embargo resolutions, beginning with the Burton resolution of 1928, were designed to give the President power to discriminate against aggressors. This remained a principle down to the middle of 1933. So when there was added to the McReynolds resolution of 1933 a Senate amendment providing that the embargo was to be applied impartially to all parties to the dispute, the administration lost interest and the resolution was allowed to die.

The pressure of public opinion, however, and the findings of the Nye committee, brought about a reluctant Executive assent to the congressional demand for impartial treatment of belligerents and, finally, to the impartial application of the arms embargo, which by that time, both on humanitarian and practical grounds, had been identified as a means of preserving American neutrality and peace. The gathering tension in Europe fortified this demand for abstention from Europe's wars by means of an arms embargo and other safeguards. The act of August 1935, the fundamentals of which remained in the act of 1937, now in force, received almost unanimous support. There was then relative detachment and objectivity in the American Congress. The act of 1937 passed in the Senate by 63 to 6 and in the House by 376 to 13. In spite of the fact that specialists had in committee hearings expressed misgivings on the long-run effects of embargoes, spokesmen for the administration vied with each other in outdoing Senator NYE in their devotion to arms embargoes as a way to peace, and in support even of commodity embargoes. The Senate hearings on Senate Resolution 3474 in 1936 make instructive reading.

In his Chautauqua address of August 14, 1936, President Roosevelt lauded arms embargoes as a way to keep the country out of war, and he urged resistance against the pressure which in wartime would be directed toward lifting such embargoes. Senators have quoted at length from this speech, but I have not seen quoted one of the profound truths the President then uttered:

"The effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today as in the past on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State."

And speaking of the importance of correct Government decisions in maintaining American neutrality, he said, "Peace will depend on their day-to-day decisions." Informed persons are watching those day-to-day decisions.

It is interesting to note that the power to impose an arms embargo is reserved in the reciprocal-trade treaties, and that a mandatory arms embargo was proposed by the United States delegation for adoption by the countries on this continent at the Buenos Aires Conference of 1936. It is safe to add, however, that this devotion to arms embargoes was in part induced by the notion that it furnished a means to coerce "aggressors," a policy actually undertaken during the Ethiopian war to penalize Italy, but again under the guise of discouraging trade to both belligerents in fuel, copper, scrap iron, trucks, tractors, and other commodities. There was actually no trade to Ethiopia. One of the current dangers is that while paying lip service to the popular demand for neutrality and abstention, unneutral devices will be employed which will have precisely the effect of taking sides in a foreign struggle.

II

With this background we may examine the sudden proposal to lift the arms embargo. Why this great change in policy? Where did the demand for it originate? Surely it cannot be designed to protect and safeguard American neutrality, for the obvious and now increasingly avowed purpose is to help the Allies obtain arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Many Senators approve it on that very account, and some concede frankly that it cannot be deemed to strengthen neutrality. Others openly express the belief that an allied victory is in American interest. Perhaps so. But the lifting of the arms embargo is officially defended before the public as an aid to American neutrality.

If military help to the Allies is the motive—and the motive in these matters is all important—then the lifting of the embargo is an act of intervention, and it should be debated as such.

Many neutral countries have imposed arms embargoes during war. And it was always understood as a safeguard or insurance of its neutrality. To say that the lifting of an existing arms embargo is calculated to safeguard neutrality is unprecedented.

Moreover, the assumption that a neutral can change his law so as to help one side defeat the other and yet escape the consequences of war is hazardous. The gamble may be successful, but it is very speculative, for success depends on the inability or unwillingness of the disfavored belligerent to exert the reprisals which he would naturally wish to, and which he is privileged to exert. There may be good reasons why many Americans would like to help the Allies win this European war, but the public should not delude itself into the belief that a hostile act is a contribution to American neutrality.

The suggestion that the present act is unneutral, and hence must be corrected because Great Britain cannot legally secure the arms which Germany could not physically obtain is inaccurate and unsound. It would be more true to say that the naval position of the belligerents enables the United States to supply one side only with everything but arms. There is a practical embargo on Germany. This ought to satisfy the craving for discrimination, and it probably can be defended as legal. The lifting of the arms embargo, I fear, cannot be so defended.

It is proper to say that there are many arguments against an arms embargo. International law does not require a neutral to impose an arms embargo, although many neutrals in the course of history have done so. In the abstract, on historic evidence of the effects of general embargoes, I have been opposed to embargoes and boycotts in any form. And when applied discriminatorily, as so many Americans have been taught to believe was justified, they are particularly obnoxious. They constitute one of the most disturbing political instruments of an age that has been extraordinarily fertile in inventing new devices for provoking conflicts among people. But the arms embargo now under discussion is a special embargo enacted for a particular American purpose. To lift it now, after the outbreak of war, would be an illegal act of intervention.

The congressional demand for the nondiscriminatory arms embargo after 1935 was induced by the special circumstance that the United States had in 1914–17 been converted into an arsenal for one side, and that it was thought that this had an influence in propelling the United States into the war. It was desired to avert a repetition of that role, and the policy had wide support. The United States before September 3, 1939, could have adopted a different policy and maintained the right of American citizens to ship arms to all belligerents as international law permitted.

We find in the majority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations the following sentences:

"The committee is of the opinion that the United States cannot maintain its neutrality so long as such embargo provisions remain on our statute books. It is contrary to the accepted precepts of international law which prescribe that any belligerent may purchase any articles or materials in any neutral country. Belligerents, as well as neutrals, have relied from time immemorial upon this law. * * * It was a voluntary departure from international law by the United States Government * * *."

It would be hard to frame four short sentences containing more misconceptions than these. Apart from the fact that the distinguished chairman of the committee in 1937 made just as earnest an argument for the arms embargo as a preservative of neutrality as he now makes against it, and that never before has an arms embargo been deemed a danger to neutrality, a few legal facts may be stated. International law does not compel neutrals to supply arms to belligerents.

No belligerent has by international law a right to demand arms from a neutral country. But international law imposes no restrictions on neutral traders in selling arms. So far as international law is concerned, a government may permit or forbid its citizens to sell arms. But that is not the present issue. The proposed change in the law to permit an arms traffic now that was prohibited when the war broke out is not a return to international law but rather a defiance of international law.

For the peculiar defect in the proposed change is that it undertakes to lift the embargo during a foreign war with the knowledge, if not, indeed, the intention that it would help one set of belligerents only. This seems to me a clear violation of international law. Just as the United States Government as a neutral government may not legally furnish arms to either belligerent, so it may not at this time by deliberate change in its law help its citizens to furnish such arms, particularly when the effect is discriminatory. I shall read a passage from a commentary on a recent draft code on neutrality prepared under the auspices of some of the specialists of this country, Prof. Philip C. Jessup, of Columbia, being the reporter. That commentary states:

"The task confronting the neutral state (in changing its rules during war) is to make certain to itself and clear to other states that the motive inducing the adoption of a new rule or regulation during the course of a war is the product of its concern to act strictly in accordance with the law of neutrality, and not the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

In 1915, Secretary Bryan defended on this ground the refusal of the United States to impose an arms embargo, as requested by the Central Powers. He said:

"* * * This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions, and I respectfully submit that none of the circumstances urged in Your Excellency's memorandum alters the principle involved. The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States. It will, I feel assured, be clear to Your Excellency that, holding this view and considering itself in honor bound by it, it is out of the question for this Government to consider such a course." (Policy of the United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, vol. II, p. 299.)

Secretary Lansing made a similar statement on August 12, 1915, in a note to Austria.

It is not true to say that a neutral may not change the rules of law during war. It is during war that most of the rules of neutrality were made. But the rules may only be changed in the direction of insuring and tightening neutral duties, and not in the direction of relaxing them for the benefit of one set of belligerents. This is a hostile act, and its consequences must be carefully weighed. It is inconsistent with that neutrality which official groups profess to wish to maintain.

There has been some effort to meet this contention. It has been said that, as belligerents change their rules frequently during a war, neutrals should have the same right. But belligerents may not change their rules to violate international law, and if neutrals supinely permit such imposition by belligerents, the neutrals are largely to blame. Neutrals may also change their rules, but not so as to violate their neutral duties, and they cannot commit hostile acts while professing to remain neutral. The changes that are permitted to a neutral may be made only to safeguard its neutrality, not to relax it, and never consciously to discriminate in favor of one side. The law has not changed since the declarations of Secretaries Bryan and Lansing in 1915.

It is also said that the proceedings for lifting the embargo began last May. True, although the purpose then was not exactly to protect American neutrality but to impress or deter one prospective belligerent. But, however that may be, the outbreak of war and the United States declaration of neutrality limited the freedom of action of the United States; after that it could not legally undertake unneutral acts, except as an avowed participant in the war. The obligations of neutrality forbid acts of unneutrality. Before September 3, 1939, such obligations did not exist.

The further suggestion that Germany and Austria in 1915 requested the United States to embargo arms is no precedent for the present proposal to lift the embargo. Had the United States seen fit, it could have laid the embargo in 1915 to secure respect by Great Britain for its neutral rights and to insure its neutrality, as many countries had done. It declined to take the step on the ground that it would help Germany alone. Secretary Bryan's answer was legally correct and it is applicable now.

It is not altogether certain that even the substitution of "cash and carry" can escape the criticism that this is unneutral discrimination against one belligerent. If its purpose were to aid one belligerent only, it would be clearly illegal to introduce that innovation after the outbreak of war. But inasmuch as it is a restriction on American commerce, a restriction the practicality of which is open to grave doubts; inasmuch as the provision was embodied in the 1937 act as a peacetime policy and only went out of force on May 1, 1939; inasmuch as it is regarded by our people generally as a safeguard against American involvement, perhaps it may be defended as not unneutral. But the question is debatable, the issue depending, as in the case of the lifting of the arms embargo, on the motive and anticipated effects of the change.

There is, of course, a distinction, historical, psychological, and legal, between the lethal weapons now embargoed and the raw materials not embargoed. Had neutrals in 1914 adequately protected their interests against belligerents, only lethal weapons in principle would have been declared contraband, as a direct military aid to the belligerents. But even though they have not protected themselves against the unlawful extension of contraband lists, the Traffic in Arms Convention of 1925 is proof of the fact that the work makes a profound distinction between the two groups. Raw materials can be used for purposes other than arms manufacture; arms can only be used for war purposes. It is therefore no argument at all to suggest that because we embargo lethal weapons we must in logic embargo raw materials.

And is it not striking that while arms embargoes are decried for the east coast, they are insisted upon for the west coast against Japan? If the embargo would produce war on the east, why would it produce peace on the west? Or if the lifting of the embargo is to preserve our peace and neutrality on the east, why would free trade in arms not have that effect in the west? Is it not possible that in both cases intervention would be promoted by the proposed changes, intervention against the "aggressor," to be sure, but intervention just the same?

And if it is so important that American vessels be kept out of trade to belligerents and out of war zones, represented as a continuing daily danger to the United States, why was the motion of Senator TOBEY immediately to remove that danger defeated? Is it desired to expose American citizens to such further danger for a month, perhaps, in order that these relatively attractive and noncontroversial provisions shall carry on their backs the highly debatable and vulnerable lifting of the arms embargo? Is help to the Allies more important than the immediate protection of the United States against involvement?

If the policy is motivated by the desire to assist the Allies, as is now widely admitted, then the dangers Senator BORAH and others foresee are imminent. For it is natural that if the assistance of arms for cash or short-term credit does not suffice, more assistance will be requested and given. The cash is likely soon to run out. If the motive is assistance, is it possible that credit will be refused? And if that does not suffice, will men be refused? If the desire for Allied victory becomes not merely a personal wish but a national policy, how can neutrality be maintained? And how can we rely on limits to the aid that will be rendered? Thus, the first intervention becomes indicative of a policy and its proponents are likely to become slaves to their interventionist emotions. I venture to believe that it is directly contrary to the interests of the United States to intervene in the European struggle, even more so than the last intervention in 1917. On this issue I call attention to an important book by C. Hartley Grattan just published under the title "The Deadly Parallel."

If then candor is to control our judgment, it must be recognized that lifting of the arms embargo is distinctly unneutral; that it is an act of intervention, exceedingly likely to yield to further interventions. Statesmen of the European belligerents seem to understand this. We need not expatiate on the disastrous effects of war upon the United States. Every person with a stake in the community ought to oppose it, whether on economic, social, or political grounds.

The American experiment will have been made a failure by the men of this generation. They should shrink from such a responsibility.

There are many parts of the present bill which could be accepted. The prohibitions against taking passage on belligerent vessels, against loans to belligerents, against American vessels carrying arms and munitions, all now part of the law, are unobjectionable. More doubtful are the stringent provisions concerning cash and carry, which are likely to take a considerable part of the American merchant marine off the seas. This was designed in good faith to remove American ships and citizens from war risks and to remove temptations from the American people and the administration to regard the sinking even of carriers of contraband as an overt act likely to arouse passions for war. But if the American people could follow Kipling and "keep" their "head when all about" them "are losing theirs," it would be realized that such ships and persons assume the risks of their location, and under no circumstances should the Nation permit itself to be aroused to belligerent feeling. The Scandinavian countries seem to keep their balance. It is the function of the administration to allay unjustified indignation. Even if wrongful sinkings should occur there are other means of vindication than war.

Arbitrations and claims settlements are the indicated course. But if American self-control, following the inept conduct of American neutrality on the last great occasion, is so unreliable as to find causes for war in accidents or acts that are today an incident of maritime war, then it is better to remove temptations from belligerents and from ourselves and suffer the losses. But the proposed bill needs further study, for even under this theory of removing temptation, it exceeds the bounds of reasonableness in restricting American commerce. If the administration desires neutrality, it might make an effort to defend American neutral rights against all belligerents, a task made more difficult for this administration by the surrenders of the 1915–16 administration.

Moreover, the zeal for embargoes in 1935 was excessive. Why not confine the embargo to belligerent countries? Why include neutrals? The present act prohibits shipment not only to belligerents, but to "any neutral state for transshipment to or for the use of any such belligerent state." Apart from the administrative difficulty of enforcing such a prohibition, it is not the duty of a neutral exporting nation to enforce the doctrine of continuous voyage or transport. That is the belligerent's business. Such an amendment, retaining the embargo on belligerents, but lifting it for neutrals, would not I think be challengeable, for it could not be said to be calculated to help one set of belligerents only. If it were, however, the change would be illegal.

Still more doubtful is the administration policy of admitting armed merchant vessels to American ports, although the act gives the President power to prohibit such admission. The alleged distinction between defensive and offensive armament is specious, for a single shot from a 6-inch gun can undo a submarine. Secretary Lansing realized and admitted his mistake on the armed ship question on January 18, 1916, but by that time there was a vested belligerent interest in his error, and he was not allowed to withdraw from it. It ultimately laid the foundation for American intervention, for President Wilson maintained the strange proposition that it was a matter of "national honor" for American citizens to travel unmolested on armed belligerent merchant vessels. Holland knew better and refused to admit such vessels to its ports. The United States should follow this sound example, if it wishes to escape trouble.

Many of the changes in the proposed bill are designed to strengthen, not weaken, American neutrality. To these there can be no objection. Others, however, like the lifting of the arms embargo, are calculated to relax American neutrality to the advantage of one side in the war. These changes are not privileged and are not reconcilable with neutrality. They expose the country to possible reprisals. Even if it be assumed that the handicapped belligerent will not retaliate, he is privileged to do so, and the possibility of America's remaining at peace is transferred to alien decision. No country professing to desire neutrality should knowingly court such a risk.

An attractive argument has been made that, in view of the almost universal hope here for Allied victory, a refusal to lift the arms embargo will, if Germany seems to be winning, produce an avalanche of emotion in favor of intervention in the war, whereas the lifting of the embargo will be a safety valve for this emotion, and people will then be satisfied that everything has been done to aid the Allied cause short of open intervention.

Naturally, such an argument is debatable. Those who would retain the present embargo for the duration of the war doubtless believe that opening the door to intervention will not cause any diminution in the pressure to open the door still wider in the event that the Allies should seem not to be winning. In view of the Allied countries' capacity for manufacturing, in view of the fact that the arms traffic involves but 10 or 15 percent of the total commerce, in view of the fact that they could obtain American and other arms from neutral countries, it seems to me best not to violate the law to satisfy an emotion which many of us may share.

What I am now concerned about is to avoid the confusion, so common in recent years, that in the name of neutrality and peace hostile acts may safely be undertaken. It is a cause for apprehension that within 2 weeks of the outbreak of a European war discriminatory acts should be contemplated which indicate both a mood and a possibility of intervention. But the proposal should be debated on that platform, and not on the theory that a contribution is thereby made to keeping America out of war or toward preserving its neutrality.

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

THE AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a discussion before the American Forum of the Air between the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and a panel consisting of several other very distinguished Senators, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Announcer MCCORMICK. WOL—in cooperation with WOR—presents the American Forum of the Air.

Tonight listeners to the coast-to-coast Mutual Network will hear the third of this season's Sunday night broadcasts, emanating from the modern broadcasting studios of the New Department of Interior Building in Washington, D. C.

The facilities of these studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech, on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization.

Tonight's American Forum of the Air will be presented identical to those which became such widely listened-to programs last year. Under the direction of Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion, you first will hear the presentation of both sides of tonight's topic of discussion by outstanding leaders on the subject. Following the formal presentation of opposing views, the issue will be heard in an informal discussion by a panel board ready to treat the argument extemporaneously.

And now, our chairman, Mr. Theodore Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

As the spotlight of international attention centers on the Senate of the United States which continues its debate on embargo repeal, we bring to you another forum to weigh the pros and cons of the latest developments. High lighting a week of lively discussion was the radio address over this network of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, which resulted in a free-for-all discussion on the Senate floor, some praising and others criticizing the flyer's speech.

Following in part the proposals suggested by former President Hoover in New York this week, Colonel Lindbergh urged:

An embargo on offensive weapons and munitions.

Unrestricted sale by the United States of purely defensive armament.

Prohibition of American shipping to belligerent countries of Europe and their danger zones.

Refusal of credit to all warring nations or their agents.

Senator PITTMAN, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and leader of the administration forces, stated: "Colonel Lindbergh's statement is subject to the construction that he approves of the brutal conquest of democratic countries through war or threat of destruction through war."

However, Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, declared Lindbergh rendered a great patriotic service in making the speech, and supported the basic position of those who are opposed to the repeal of the arms embargo and who are determined that America shall not intervene in the European war.

But opposition leaders agree with administration spokesmen that it would be difficult to distinguish between offensive and defensive weapons and supply Europe with only the latter.

And capping a lively day of debate, the Senate heard Senator LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, propose armed United States seizure of British possessions in the West Indies in payment for war debts, evoking another storm of debate and criticism by administration supporters.

Thus the Senate enters another week of debate on this vital issue although administration leaders expect to start voting on important amendments before this week closes. They still claim 65 Senate votes for repeal and a safe margin to pass the bill without the embargo, while opposition forces contend that the fight is just beginning, basing much of their hopes for the embargo on a closer House division.

And so tonight we present six distinguished Members of the Senate in a forum discussion of the subject. We will hear first from Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, one of the outstanding administration leaders. He will be followed by Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, Republican minority leader of the Senate.

Immediately following, we will present an informal panel discussion. Our panel members are:

Senators EDWARD R. BURKE, of Nebraska; LYNN J. FRAZIER, of North Dakota; RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia, and ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah.

And now Senator PEPPER.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

The eyes of the world are upon America again. For, what we do in the next few days shall, in the judgment of most men, determine not only the course of our country, but the kind of world in which we and those who come after us, shall live.

A war has been thrust upon the world by a great international brigand:

By a man who himself has ordered men shot down without a trial, in his own presence, because they differed with him politically.

By a man who has repudiated religion and man's God, and turned the clock of time back before religion and Christ and the cross.

By a man who has adopted war—the killing of men, the widowing of wives, the orphaning of children, the maiming of men's bodies, the cruel, cold destruction of the finest artistry of man's mind and hands as the chief instrument of his international policy.

By a man who disdains human freedom, who scorns human rights, whose cynical mind ignores human aspirations, who derides the reach of human conscience into the ethereal realms of the spirit.

In the face of the prayers of the world, against the entreaty of men and women of good will everywhere, to satisfy his lust for power and greed for conquest, this man has engulfed the world in the carnage of war.

The whole world could see the terrible scourge of this war hanging over the head of mankind. No man tried harder to stop it; no man prayed and labored more untiringly to stay the unrelenting hand of Hitler than President Franklin D. Roosevelt. While he pleaded with this conscienceless man the world held its breath and prayed and hoped almost against hope that he might succeed. It was all in vain, because this man who aspires to be even more a man of blood and iron than his hero Bismarck was, neither heard nor cared for these appeals which reached to the mind or spirit, for being a man of blood and iron he knew only force for a master.

President Roosevelt knew, as you and I knew, that the safest and surest way to keep this Nation out of war and your son at home was for there to be no war in Europe. He, too, tried to stay the hand of Hitler by giving notice to Hitler and the world that this bloody dictator could not depend upon an unneutral, ill-conceived statute in the laws of America as an instrument to help him flood Europe in rivers of blood.

Everyone knew that the so-called Embargo Act was indefensible in logic, because in modern war there is no real difference between arms, munitions, and implements of war, and steel, gasoline, cotton, out of which the instruments of war are either made or by which alone they may be employed. Everybody knew that in reason there was no difference in morals between selling a truck or a tank, or an airplane, and selling the gasoline without which those instruments would be but monstrous obstructions to the waging of war.

I say, the people knew not only that the so-called embargo law was without basis in reason; they knew it was indefensible in principle, because it worked in actual practice only to the advantage of one like Hitler, who had prostituted a period of peace to prepare for war; who had laid in his store of arms, munitions, and implements of war, while the rest of the world "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks."

But opposition then as now developed in Congress.

Yes, they said, if we were sure there was going to be a war, we would be glad to enter upon a consideration of that question; but there is not going to be a war.

What poor prophets they were! Only an omniscient judge who knows not only what has been, but what might have been, can know whether this cruel war might have been averted; how many bright eyes might even now be burning with the light of life, which are now dark in death, if Congress, in accordance with the appeal of the President and the oft-expressed sentiment of the American people, had torn his vestige of encouragement to Hitler from the statute books of America in June, July, or even in the first days of August.

How many times we may repeat the lines, "Of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are, 'It might have been.'"

When this war came, the United States was faced with two primary problems: Should we exercise all of our accustomed rights under international law, send our ships upon the seven seas with our goods, and give our citizens free access to the highroads of the world? While tradition and law said, "Yes," the experiences of the last war and the heart of America said, "No."

Then should the alternative be that every vestige of commerce between this Nation and the warring powers, which constitutes at least four-fifths of all of our foreign trade, be destroyed? Should the American flag fade from the seas, where we were building her back to her ancient mastery? We knew that our foreign trade made the difference between good times and bad times; between fewer unemployed and more unemployed; and we did not feel, most of us, that we should give up the very essentials upon which the economic life of this Nation rest, and so we tried to find a reasonable middle ground. We would preserve what trade we could with the belligerents, but we would avoid every possible risk.

We would give up the freedom of the seas, abandon the highroads of the world, bring home every American ship which flew the American flag to a danger zone or a belligerent nation.

While no other nation in the world restrained its commerce or closed its border to any purchaser who came prepared to pay for its goods, we would not venture a single ship, a single sailor, or a single citizen even where war might be upon the high seas, let alone in a country where war was.

We would say to all the warring nations, "If you want our goods, come and get them; take the title to them here in our own harbors; take them home as your own goods, in your own ships, and at your own risk."

This is the neutrality law now pending.

Could any principle ever be fairer than that?

Although no doubt the bill will be amended so as to allow our ships to go to the areas where there is no danger of them being sunk, yet at best, many of our vessels will have to be laid up and we stand a chance to lose a very great commerce which we built up by sacrifice and diligence and governmental efforts. But we are willing to make those sacrifices, because not one of us but would give the whole commerce of America to be assured that the sons of American mothers should never again be forced to sail across the seas, to march under European battle flags, and die upon European battlefields.

But they say our law will be unneutral because Germany may not be able to buy our goods and take them home in their own ships because the British would interfere.

We say the British can't buy from Germany's neutral neighbors in Europe because Germany won't let the goods by.

They say we would bring down upon our heads the wrath of Hitler if we sold goods to all who would come and get them, but Great Britain and France have not declared war upon the neutral countries who sell to Hitler in Europe.

They say it is alright for a land power like Hitler's to buy from his neighbors upon the land, but it is all wrong for sea powers, like Great Britain and France, to buy from their neighbors upon the seas.

They say it is the first step toward war to adopt this neutrality legislation, putting everything in the same category and making those who would, what we have to sell, to come and get it.

They don't deny that we have a right under international law to sell anything here in our own harbors. Then do they mean that Hitler would attack us because we exercised our rights here at home under the laws of the world?

If he is that kind of a person, isn't it all the more imperative that we shall not either neglectively or affirmatively lend him our aid in his mad crusade to conquer the world.

They say if America sells her goods to any purchaser who comes and gets them, it would contribute to the carnage of war.

I say that if America does not sell her goods, the carnage of war will spread.

I say if American goods or guns are bought and taken home by any country who uses them in the defense of human freedom, for the preservation of the Christian religion, for the sanctity of human rights, the sacredness of human hope and aspirations, I thank God for it.

For well do I know and you know, that the battle being fought in Europe now, is for the mastery of Europe. To determine whether the swastika of Hitlerism shall fly upon the ramparts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, or whether the mastery of Europe shall remain in the hands of those who for more than 100 years have lived with us in peace and amity and good friendship. For more than 150 years, the flag of France has meant the flag of a friend to us.

For more than 100 years Great Britain and France have subscribed to our Monroe Doctrine and their territory has lain contiguous or proximate to ours and we have never even fortified one land against another.

Who in America believes that we or any other nation in the Western Hemisphere can be assured of living in that kind of a relationship with a Hitler, whose greedy eyes scan the horizon for mastery over all that he can survey.

I do not propose ever that America shall go to war in Europe again, but I am determined so far as I can prevent it, that no American law shall help to give to Hitler or to any European dictator the power to bring war to where it could prostitute from peace to war, the oceans that touch our shores, or the lands of our 21 American republics which have set in permanent foundations the sentiments and the institutions of freedom in this hemisphere.

They say America's destiny is isolation. I say, if they mean by isolation staying out of Europe's quarrels, not haggling over other peoples' territory, not seeking other nation's conquest, we are all isolationists, but if they mean by isolation that we are disinterested in whether civilization perishes from the earth, whether bloody Hitlerism baptizes the earth, whether dastardly dictatorship encompasses the earth, whether the iron feet of tyrants trample down the free peoples of the world, whether religion is and God is worshipped, whether we have no sense of right, no feeling of wrong, no sympathy for victims, no sentiment for the oppressed, no care for those who are maimed and mangled; if they mean that America is alike without a conscience or a cause; if they mean that America repudiates all her glorious past, that she forfeited all her noble destiny, that she has grown callous to every fine thing that moves the hearts of men and women, I say, "Thank God, I am not that kind of an isolationist."

Now, therefore, in this crucial hour, let America be prayerful, patriotic, calm, cool, solemn, for what we are about is the serious business of preserving all that good and brave men and women have saved out of the wreckage of the past. A united people, one from many, we stand forth before the world to find and to follow a course which is fair, which is right, and which our ancestors before us and the Providence which has guided us, would alike approve.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator PEPPER.

This is the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on Neutrality. You have just heard Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida.

And now we are pleased to present Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, minority leader of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR CHARLES L. M'NARY

In discussing proposals for revision of our neutrality legislation I believe that we should concede at the outset that all of us have a common objective, namely, to do that which will keep the United States out of war. I do not believe there is a man in Congress who again wants to see the blood of America's fine youth spilled on foreign battlefields. Each of us, whatever our views on particular questions, wishes to do that which will best protect our own country and its people.

This was the objective we all had in mind back in 1935, when Congress enacted the first Neutrality Act. In that legislation we believed that one of the most effective ways of staying out of war was to refuse to sell arms and munitions to countries that resorted to war. Most of us then felt—and many of us still feel—that our unrestricted sale of arms and munitions during the World War was a major reason why we became involved in that conflict. We felt that one practical method of avoiding war was to say to our people: "You must forego the profits from the sale of arms and munitions to countries at war in order that the peace of your own country might be preserved." Congress overwhelmingly adopted that resolution, and the President approved it. It became the national policy of our Government.

Some months later Congress again approved an embargo on the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. On that occasion the vote in the House was 353 to 27, and so unanimous was the support of the embargo in the Senate that a roll call was not demanded. In 1937 Congress again approved an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war in legislation containing other safeguards for our neutrality which are not now in serious dispute. The Senate passed the 1937 legislation by a vote of 63 to 6, while the vote in the House of Representatives was 376 to 13. The President likewise gave his approval to these measures, making them law. Indeed, the President, in the summer of 1936, enthusiastically endorsed such provisions as the arms embargo as "new weapons with which to maintain our neutrality" in time of war abroad. And on that occasion the President warned us to be on our guard against those, seeking "fool's gold," who would, when war came, attempt to "break down or evade our neutrality."

My only purpose in citing this brief bit of history is to indicate to you that the present arms embargo was adopted only after the most thoughtful deliberation, with the approval of the President, repeatedly expressed, and with virtually the unanimous support of all parties and factions in Congress. In this legislation we believed we had taken a practical step, with a minimum of damage to the American economic system, toward avoiding incidents that lead to war. None ever contended it was perfect legislation. You cannot have perfect legislation in regard to neutrality or any other very important subject. But we thought it was a practical and a sound way to safeguard our country from war.

Now we are asked to repeal the arms embargo which has been our national policy for more than 4 years. In view of the purpose for which this law was three times enacted so overwhelmingly, surely the burden of demonstrating why the embargo should be lifted rests on those who advocate such a course. Beyond all shadow of doubt they should prove to us that repeal of the embargo is in the best interests of this Nation. If they do not, then the arms embargo should be maintained.

Unless it can be shown that repeal of the arms embargo will better serve our domestic interests than its maintenance, then it should not be repealed. Reasons which spring out of the effect of the present embargo on other nations are beside the point. The American Congress has a duty to legislate for the best interests of the American people—not for the benefit of some foreign power.

In the several weeks since the Senate started debate on this issue I have not heard advanced a single argument which adequately demonstrates how repeal of the embargo would serve our domestic considerations. Surprisingly, I have heard it suggested that we should repeal the arms embargo in order to give assistance to one group of the nations at war against the other belligerent. This seems to be the real reason why repeal of the arms embargo has been proposed.

Yet I do not wonder at the timidity with which this reason is advanced. It is a shocking suggestion that we should repeal a domestic law, designed to keep us at peace, for the purpose of helping one group of belligerents. Clearly such action, for that reason, would be participation in the war. It would be an unneutral action and it would be an action that might cost us dearly. Indeed, it might be the very means of involving us in the war, which is the very thing we are seeking to avoid. Why should we take that risk?

Those of us who remember the years from 1914 to 1917 know the part which the American export of arms and munitions to the Allies played in arousing the hatred of the German Nation against us. So bitter did the Germans become as they learned that American guns and shells were killing their men that actually they attacked this country in the submarine warfare. They brought the war to our shores through sabotage of our munition plants. They sought to stir up one of our neighboring nations against us. In their desperation the Germans determined to stop the exports of American munitions at all costs. There was nothing for President Wilson to do but acknowledge these attacks on us and ask Congress formally to declare the war which already existed.

I now hear Members of Congress saying that they will never vote for the involvement of this country in war. But what else can they do if the events of 1914 to 1917 are repeated? The important thing is not to undo what we have done to prevent such a chain of events from beginning. The wise thing is to prevent the incidents which force on us the duty of making such a terrifying decision.

Yet it is now contended that there is no real distinction between the arms, ammunition, and implements of war now under embargo and other commodities useful in war. Of course there are distinctions, very real and practical distinctions, and there are psychological differences. There were very important differences 25 years ago. Export of American cotton and wheat and other raw materials would never enrage a people as American exports of arms and munitions to the Allies enraged the Germans in the years 1914 to 1917. It was the sale of arms and munitions in those years which contained the seeds of involvement in war for us.

And what do those who urge repeal of the arms embargo have to say to the proposition that munitions which we would now export may be used a year or two hence against our own boys, should we, and may God forbid it, become involved in this terrible conflict? Who knows the course this war may take? Who knows what alliances may be made if it continues for a year or two? Already we have seen such unexpected developments as the alliance of the Russian Bear and the Nazi swastika. Is it not wiser to keep our arms and munitions out of the hands of the fighting countries? Is it not wiser to keep them at home to build up our national-defense needs? Let us take every precaution possible to keep out of war, but we should do nothing to impair, even in the slightest degree, our own Nation's defense forces.

Entirely aside from repeal of the arms embargo, I am opposed to the pending bill in the Senate because it does impair our national defenses, as I shall demonstrate to you. Advocates of repeal of the arms embargo apparently are aware that if that safeguard is wiped out it will leave a gaping hole in the ramparts of our neutrality. I say they apparently are aware of this because they have made in the Pittman bill, desperate efforts to plug up this hole by drastic and stringent provisions in other directions.

For instance, they have undertaken to make it unlawful for an American ship "to carry any passengers or any articles or materials" to any nation at war. This means that American ships cannot carry passengers or cargoes from the port of Seattle to Vancouver or Victoria in Canada. It means an end, for the duration of the war, of any ocean-born commerce in American ships from Baltimore, New York, or Boston to Canadian ports. It means that American ships must surrender their peacetime business in the Pacific with such places as Australia, New Zealand, and Indo-China and in the Atlantic with Bermuda, the Bahamas, Nassau, Jamaica, and French Martinique. To make it clear, let me repeat that this provision in the Pittman bill forbids American vessels to carry passengers and cargoes to any of these places—not just war material but any kind of cargo.

Now it is obvious that this is an unnecessary and burdensome restriction on American shipping. Our purpose in placing restrictions on our citizens in connection with neutrality legislation is to avoid dangerous contacts which might involve the Nation in war. What danger can there be to American vessels engaged in their ordinary peacetime trade between Portland or Seattle and the Canadian ports of the British Northwest? Does anyone seriously suppose that these ships will be subjected to submarine hazards from nations involved in war in Europe? Of course not. In this restriction we are needlessly harassing our own citizens.

Yet while that restriction has been made too drastic, the sponsors of the pending bill have left in it a loophole large enough to drive an armored car through, as one correspondent has described it. I refer to the omission from this bill of any provision making it unlawful for American ships to carry arms, ammunition, and implements of war to neutral countries for transshipment to nations at war. Under the present law that is forbidden. But if the arms embargo is repealed American ships lawfully could carry bombs and shells and poison gas to certain neutral countries in Europe from whence they could be transshipped to the belligerents. They could do this under the proposed substitute unless the President exercised the discretion granted him to declare combat zones. It may be said that, of course, the President would prevent such shipments by exercising that discretion. Very well, but if the President prescribes combat areas sufficiently extensive to close up this loophole, then he will take American flagships completely out of European and Mediterranean waters. Indeed, American ships will have to confine their foreign activities to the Latin-American and Asiatic trade. Now I am not particularly concerned about the profits which shipowners would lose under such restrictions.

My concern is over what would happen to our merchant marine under such drastic restrictions, particularly if this war should go on for a few years, as some observers think possible. Obviously, we shall not go on building merchant ships if there is no need for them. Obviously, under such restrictions a part of the merchant marine we now have will have to be laid up and will deteriorate. When that happens we have impaired our national defense.

The first line of our national defense has been our Navy and our merchant marine. The theory underlying the hundreds of millions of dollars which the Government has spent in subsidies for shipping has been that we were in reality contributing to our national defense. We have long recognized the American merchant marine as an auxiliary in time of war to our Navy and an integral part of our national defense. Yet in the Pittman bill we undertake to undermine much of the progress made toward an adequate American merchant marine.

What is the more bewildering, there is no real need for such action. If the arms embargo is left in our law many of the problems sought to be reached by such drastic restrictions against shipping will disappear. Let us by every means seek to protect our neutrality, but let us be practical and realistic and let us not do irreparable damage to ourselves. We should keep the arms embargo, and see to it that our national defense is unimpaired and adequate.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator MCNARY. This concludes part I of tonight's forum presentation.

Announcer MCCORMICK. Immediately following station identification, we will continue with the panel discussion.

This is the Mutual Broadcasting System.

This is the American Forum of the Air, originating in the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C., and presented over the Mutual Network by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

We return you to the chairman of the program, Mr. Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. And now as part II of tonight's forum on neutrality, we present an informal panel discussion. Our panel members are:

Senators EDWARD R. BURKE, of Nebraska; LYNN J. FRAZIER, of North Dakota; RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia, and ELBERT D. THOMAS of Utah. Senator BURKE will open the discussion.

Senator BURKE. The arguments for and against repeal of the arms embargo have been ably and eloquently presented by our colleagues Senator MCNARY and Senator PEPPER, but there are some phases of the matter that need a little further exploration. Senator MCNARY says we only passed this neutrality law containing the arms embargo 4 years ago, and we ought not to think about amending it now. Senator MCNARY has been on the Hill a long time, and he knows that there never has been an important piece of legislation passed that we didn't have to start in amending it almost at the next session of Congress. I can say of banking legislation, and every other important piece of legislation in the few short years I have been in Washington, that they have been amended, most of them, at every session of Congress. We have to change the laws to meet conditions as they exist at a given time.

But Senator MCNARY pushes the point a little further and says, "Why should we repeal the arms embargo when we know that by so doing we will be benefiting one of the belligerents, one side in this contest, Britain and France?" The answer to that is perfectly clear. The law as it stands confers an immense and immeasurable benefit upon the other belligerent, Germany, upon Hitler, if you will, and therefore we must amend the law, repeal the embargo, to take away that benefit. And we do it for the reason so eloquently stated by Senator PEPPER, because in this country we do not approve of Hitler and Hitlerism.

This afternoon over the air the Right Reverend Monsignor John A. Ryan, of Washington, declared that in view of the conditions that exist on the other side of the world today it is the moral duty of the United States to do all that it can, short of war, to defeat Hitler and destroy Hitlerism. And why? For the very reasons that Senator PEPPER brought out, because the success of Hitler means the end of Christian civilization in Europe and eventually everywhere in the world. And so why leave upon our statute books a law which may make it possible for him to win in that contest?

But I want to pass this discussion on to another member of the panel. There is one phase of the matter that hasn't been very fully discussed tonight. I think, in the minds of most of us, there is the thought that there is something immoral about selling instruments of death to other people, that may be used to kill someone. On the floor of the Senate the other day Senator WHEELER said: "We surely do not want to see German boys killed." Certainly not one of us wants that; neither do we want, I take it, to see the youth of Czechoslovakia, or Polish youth, along with women and children, killed, and there is this point to remember, that if the German youth had stayed in their own country, there wouldn't have been any killing going on at all. The Polish youth and the other youth had no such chance. They stayed at home, willing to go about their own business and their own affairs, and the other youth came, if you will, with instruments of death. And so, is it immoral to place in the hands of an oppressed and beleaguered people like the Poles the opportunity to defend themselves? I say there is nothing immoral about that, that it is the most moral thing that this country could do, to sell arms and munitions and implements of war to those people who are defending themselves against the attack of a madman bent upon ruling Europe.

I know that my very able colleague from North Dakota feels differently on this question, and I would say this, that in my judgment, there is not, in public life, any man who has a greater abhorrence of war, and the evil that war brings than Senator FRAZIER, of North Dakota, and I am always glad to hear his views. Senator FRAZIER!

Senator FRAZIER. Senator BURKE, I just can't agree with your philosophy about this selling of arms to foreign countries. It does seem to me that there is a moral question involved, and that if we believe that we should have no war, if we believe in world peace and disarmament, as we claim to believe—and we were instrumental, you know, in enacting and getting other nations to agree to the so-called Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact—that we should practice what we preached at that time. It seems to me that there is something just morally wrong in selling arms to other countries, or selling war materials to kill people, and I can't feel that there is any justification in it.

Personally, I believe that we should have an arms embargo or a law against the sale of arms to any foreign country at any time, whether it is in peace or wartime, and especially in war times I would be willing to go the limit and have an embargo against shipments of any kind of products, food or anything else, to countries in war.

In this day and age, after 2,000 years of Christian civilization, if any supposedly civilized countries are selfish and greedy enough to go to war, I don't believe they are entitled to any kind of assistance from a neutral nation.

Now, at the beginning of the World War we had no arms embargo and they were selling arms, of course, to the belligerent nations, and there was a movement started to have a law enacted by Congress to provide for an embargo on arms to the belligerent nations. At that time, of course, France and England were opposed to that change and Germany favored it. The proposition was put up to Mr. Bryan, Secretary of State, and he said, in substance, that change of the neutrality regulations after war had started would be unfair to one side or the other of the belligerent nations and against international law, and it shouldn't be done.

Then a joint resolution was introduced in Congress at that time and advocated and debated, but it was decided after debate to turn it down. They didn't approve of it, apparently, taking the side of Secretary Bryan.

Now the situation is the other way; we have an embargo against the sale of arms to belligerent nations. The war has started just the same as it was at the beginning of the World War when this other question came up. Now Germany is opposed to our lifting the arms embargo, while France and England would favor it. Senator THOMAS, I know you are well posted on these subjects and I would like to know, if that was good philosophy at that time, if there was good reason for Bryan's opinion—and we all know he was opposed to war—and if the Congress was justified in turning down that resolution then at that time, why aren't we now, why isn't the Senate justified in turning down this request to repeal the arms embargo? I would like to hear your opinion on that, Senator THOMAS.

Senator THOMAS. Senator FRAZIER, of course, you will admit that the factors in 1939 are very different from the factors in 1915 and 1916. For example, right after the last war the nations of the world tried to think of substitutes for war. They tried to think of emphasizing neutral duties instead of standing on neutral rights. They tried by various international agreements to bring about situations and conditions which would make it hard to go to war, and our three neutrality acts are consistent with what the whole world has done in that regard.

But in regard to your question, in regard to the changed situation, in 1925 forty-two-odd nations met together and they entered into what is known as the International Traffic in Arms Pact, and that pact just happens to bring us right down to the present situation. That pact made it incumbent upon the nations of the world who became adherents to it—and the United States adhered to it in 1935—to set up licensing commissions to control international traffic in arms, the idea being that if international traffic in arms could be controlled during peacetime, no nation which has conquest in its soul would be able to build up during the period that other nations were trying to disarm and reduce armaments, great supplies.

That treaty found itself wrecked upon one little rock, exactly this same rock that the United States now finds itself on as the result of experience, when the President of the United States, as the result of experience of the United States, suggests that we repeal the arms embargo. Now let me repeat that: 42 nations agreed to put an embargo on arms and retain that embargo during peacetimes, but when it came to embargoing arms during wartimes not a single nation would agree to that proposition because of the changed situation and the need under international arrangements and international covenants that during war nations should come to the rescue of those nations which are being attacked and improperly attacked. Therefore, in this very treaty, it says that the embargo provisions will not hold when war is in the world.

Another thing has been suggested tonight that is new and extremely interesting, the suggestion that Germany got mad at us because we shipped arms. Undoubtedly Germany got mad at us because we shipped arms, but let me cite you just a little bit of history, and the arms shipment had nothing to do with the anger of Germany during this time. It was on June 31, in 1917, after Germany had made a promise to the President of the United States in regard to submarine warfare, which promise came after the sinking of the Sussex, that Germany started in her unrestricted submarine warfare, sinking anything that came in sight, and during the month of February 1916, the month that the President of the United States sent back the Ambassador from Germany and when we broke off relations, we broke them off because Germany broke a promise, and during the month Germany wasn't angry at arms shipments; she was just angry at the whole world, and she sank 200 merchant vessels during the single month of February. That is 8 a day.

Now, of these vessels—and remember these facts because Americans have ideas about why we went into the war—there were only 2 American ships out of the 200 sunk, and there were less than 25 American lives lost in those ships. But of the 200 ships sunk, 150 of them, or three-quarters of them, were neutral ships, carrying anything in accordance with the rights of international law. There was where the American wrath arose, there was where an outrageous justice came into being, and that is what took us into the World War. Germany, in establishing unlimited submarine warfare as we know from the very acts that brought it into existence, attempted to make war on England by starving England out. Those are the facts.

Now, one more fact about our national defense, and it is well when we go into these things to remember this. Of course, if we put restrictions upon our American ships, we are going to reduce the amount of traffic carried by American ships; but even as drastic as the present law is, if you will go into the statistics you will find that it affects only 40 percent of our merchant marine.

While I would love to talk on and on, I know that Senator HOLT is just dying to get a chance to get on this program and I give way to him.

Senator HOLT. Senator THOMAS, as I listened to these speeches and many more about the neutrality program, I was just a youngster and my mind goes back to the time in 1914 and 1917, and since this debate has arisen I have gone back to read the papers, and if you just change the names, I could pick the same words now being used about our duty to go across the ocean and those in 1914 and 1917. As I listened to the attack on Hitler, despicable and terrible as he is, my mind went back to the terrible Kaiser—if we could just get rid of the Kaiser, we would correct all the conditions of the world.

And then also I heard the question of democracy in the world and my mind went back to the slogan, "Make the world safe for democracy," and how the boys went across the sea, fighting and dying for an ideal, feeling they were dying to make the world safe for democracy in a war to end all wars.

Then I also saw another slogan, "A war to preserve civilization." Yes, a war to preserve civilization—thousands of our boys died for that ideal but what happened? Oh, those wonderful ideas were cast aside, those countries in Europe were not interested in ideals. No, England was fighting for democracy in the last World War, they told us, for a durable peace, but they got 994,500 square miles of territory. They say they love Poland but they don't tell you that out of the Versailles Treaty they got territory 6 times as large as Poland, 25 times as large as Czechoslovakia in their quest for democracy and in their quest for civilization and in their quest to stop the Kaiser.

Everybody knows what we all think of Hitler, but Hitler is a symbol of an unfair, impossible condition in Europe that was the result of the Versailles Treaty. You can't starve a nation to death any more than you can starve an individual to death, and if we would get rid of Hitler tomorrow—and remember it is going to take thousands and hundreds of thousands of deaths to do it—that wouldn't stop the conditions that caused Hitler. It is a bad blood condition in Europe. It has been going on for thousands of years and it will continue to go on for thousands of years.

Oh, yes, war will not correct the condition. War doesn't correct it at all, and war brings an army, not for help, not to save civilization, but for the destruction of civilization itself. And when you think about that, I think it is time that we look at our foreign policy that has kept us at peace, and now they say we should be the policemen of the world, that it is our duty as American citizens to go over and stop this madman. Oh, yes. Why? Why should we be the policemen of the world? Because that is a part of the parallel policy Eden spoke of in 1937, in which he said that the United States and England had a parallel policy, and the President of the United States said we should do everything short of war. Yes, short of war, just like the current of Niagara, we may swim it but that current may take us over the falls to our destruction and to our death.

I feel that the greatest opportunity to help democracy in the world today is to continue to make democracy work here in America, and I feel that we are contributing to the destruction of democracy by our entrance into that.

It is said that a long time ago George Washington gave us the very danger that we are now facing about the sympathy with and the hatred of nations. He said in his Farewell Address, and I want to ask you if it is not important today to realize this very same thing is happening. Here is what President Washington said:

"Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into the one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels of the latter, without adequate inducements or justification."

What I am interested in above everything else is neutrality and peace and keeping American boys alive on the American side of the ocean, and we can do it if we stay out of the war. Of course they say we are just going to step one foot in the door, we are just going to take part economically, but the very evidence is that when we take part in an economic way, the next step is men and munitions and money.

Senator BURKE. Senator HOLT suggests this thought. "They say," he says, "that we should start in to police the world and make the world safe for democracy." I doubt if anyone said that here tonight. If they did, I was taking a nap because I didn't hear any of those arguing for the repeal of the arms embargo talk at all about sending any boys to Europe or policing the world or making the world safe for democracy. We merely say this, that inadvisedly we put upon our statute books a law which is working unequally now. It is taking away, as Senator PEPPER so well brought out, the one great advantage to the sea powers of going to their markets to buy things in time of war, and of course operating very greatly to the benefit of land powers. So Hitler has built up his great land and air force and he didn't care if England went ahead building up its navy as long as there was an embargo placed by the most important country in the world, that as soon as he forced them into a war, would be clamped down hard and Britain couldn't come here and buy a thing. That was all that Hitler wanted.

All that we propose to do now is to take off our own statute books a law that is working very unequally and improperly, and we say, incidentally, of course, it confers a benefit upon the other belligerent by taking away an unfair advantage that one belligerent has now. Personally, I welcome that, because I want every advantage possible taken away from that belligerent. When I say that, I don't mean that I am starting out to help Britain maintain its world empire or police the world for democracy, or do anything else, but I would say this in answer to Senator HOLT's question. He says if we were able to put an end to Hitler tomorrow, that wouldn't settle these problems. I agree with him fully on that; these problems probably will never be settled; but I would suggest this question for him and others to think over, that if Hitler isn't checked tomorrow, or the day after tomorrow, or some other day pretty soon, I do not like to contemplate what this world faces.

Senator FRAZIER. Well, Senator BURKE, there may be some danger of Hitler's conquering the world, but I am not alarmed about it at all. Hitler is not going to last forever, any more than we are, and there will be a lot of other folks, you know, that won't last forever, too, along with us. I don't think that Hitler is going to be so dangerous. I don't like his style at all; I don't agree with his philosophy of being a dictator; I don't like dictatorship; I don't like to be told myself what I have got to do and what I must do; it always went against my grain, and I think it always will.

The Senator from Florida made the statement that this present law benefited men like Hitler because he had been arming as fast as he could, and the other nations—I suppose referring to France and Great Britain—had been making pruning hooks of their swords and beating something else into plowshares; but if England and France have been doing anything like that, I haven't heard of it. Why, they have been arming so fast the last few years that they couldn't pay their debt to the United States, the money they had borrowed after the war was over to help put them on their feet; they just couldn't pay that, but they have gone on building navies and arming their men, and building a big army and everything. So I don't think there is much choice between the two; and as far as democracy is concerned, there is mighty little democracy left over there, and we certainly can't benefit any of them or save democracy by going to war. War and democracy just don't go together, and I believe Senator THOMAS will agree with me.

Senator THOMAS. We have agreed on many things and I think we agree on many things tonight, and one of them I am sure we agree on is that if we try to settle the question that is before the Senate of the United States about the repeal of the arms embargo upon the merits of England's stand and the demerits of Germany's stand, or the merits of France's stand and the demerits of Hitler's stand, it is likely that we will talk about those four things and not about the task that is in front of us.

It is a pretty general practice to get away from the real subject. The President of the United States called us into session to do a particular thing because, in the light of experience, that thing should be done, and he suggested that we get back, as far as the arms embargo was concerned, to the practices of the law of nations, but he didn't suggest that we go entirely all the way because he recommended seven points in addition to the ordinary law of nations, which were to be restrictions upon American citizens and American trade.

Now, we must stay in this realm. That means that we are discussing domestic law, that the whole act must be considered as a unit, and that these seven restrictions which are put upon the American citizens must be used to temper the nonrestriction in regard to the shipment of arms; and when we do that we will find that we are keeping entirely within the realm of those measures short of war.

Senator HOLT, you have 3 more minutes to finish us off.

Senator HOLT. There are just two points that came to my mind. When we discussed the question of arming the world, I have heard a lot said that we have armed Hitler up to the hilt, and then when Hitler strikes we step in and say, "You can't buy any more." Of course that creates the impression that we have been arming Hitler in the United States. Well, the facts of history will show that England helped arm Hitler. England helped develop Hitler when they didn't think Hitler would be a great power, but now as his domestic power and his foreign policy reach out, then, of course, Hitler becomes a terrible individual.

But getting back to our arming, do you realize that in the first 8 months of this year, up to the time of the declaration of war, we had arms export licenses to all the countries of the world amounting to $58,500,000 worth of arms being sold, and how much of that went to Hitler in Germany? Only $22,664 worth; and of that $58,000,000, not counting any of their colonial possessions, England and France bought approximately fifty million; so we didn't arm Hitler; we had nothing to do with it.

The second point, and I must hurry, is the fact that it is being changed, it is an evident fact, it is a known fact, that the reason we are being called into session is to change the law so as to help one side in the controversy. We passed the other law in time of peace, we passed it without any question of the sides to be drawn, because at that time the administration was very fond of Russia, and it was then changed and they put the whiskers back on Russia, and so we had no question about sides at that particular time of peace, and a peaceful situation and a peaceful approach was that the United States should not enter the sale of arms and ammunition in order that we would stay out of war, because we had seen the effect of so doing in 1914 and 1917. I know that if two men are fighting, if I start handing a club to one or both, I am going to get in the fight, and that is what I am afraid we are going to do if we don't watch curselves in this particular piece of legislation.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to an informal panel discussion on neutrality. Our panel members were Senators EDWARD R. BURKE, of Nebraska; LYNN J. FRAZIER, of North Dakota; RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia; and ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah.

This followed opening remarks by Senators CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, and CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon.

And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Announcer McCORMICK. So we have concluded the third broadcast in this season's series of the American Forum of the Air, programs emanating from the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C. The facilities of these radio studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of the national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization. The Mutual Network will bring you this forum broadcast every Sunday evening from 8 to 9 o'clock, eastern standard time, throughout the session of Congress. Tickets to this broadcast may be had by sending your request to station WOR, New York, or WOL, Washington.

In the interest of education there is printed and distributed free of charge a limited number of copies of the entire proceedings of these broadcasts. Address your requests and comments to WOL.

The American Forum of the Air is directed by Theodore Granik, who presided as chairman tonight, and comes to you as a presentation of WOR in cooperation with WOL. This is Stephen McCormick speaking.

This is the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Our Middle-Class Statesman

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, on yesterday the New York Herald Tribune printed a very fine tribute, written by William Allen White, in the form of a review of a book called Democracy's Norris. I do not agree with everything that is said in the article, but I do heartily agree with most of it, and particularly one paragraph of it which I shall read:

Mr. Lief, in his biography, is chary of eulogy. But he might well have closed his story by declaring that GEORGE NORRIS, as a constructive statesman, has to his credit as large an amount of work achieved as any other senatorial leader in American history.

I ask unanimous consent that the book review be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of October 22, 1939]

OUR MIDDLE-CLASS STATESMAN—DEMOCRACY'S NORRIS

(Reviewed by William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette and of a biography of Coolidge)

Alfred Lief has written a long and interesting biography of Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska. Mr. Lief's book is not brilliant. In it GEORGE NORRIS does not walk through the pages a living image. Characterization is only incidentally pulled out of the bag of tricks of Mr. NORRIS' biographer. But the thing that does emerge is, perhaps, for purposes of recorded history, more important than personal characteristics—a connected, authentic, intelligent, truthful story of the man who, more than anyone now living, represents middle-class liberalism. President Roosevelt has added considerably more than a jigger of proletarian radicalism to his leadership. But GEORGE NORRIS was middle class and his program was and is still a middle-class program. Industrial legislation has interested him but casually. His biographer here makes this obvious without declaring it. Indeed, most of the value of the Lief story of GEORGE NORRIS is that it expounds by implication rather than by declaration. Mr. Lief does not place GEORGE NORRIS anywhere in a political catalog. NORRIS was, in 40 years of public life, first a regular Republican; second, in the first decade of the century, an insurgent Republican fighting Joe Cannon, and later Senator Aldrich; third, a Roosevelt Progressive Republican with his fingers slightly crossed; fourth, a co-worker of the elder La Follette; fifth, a lone warrior in the administrations of Coolidge, Hoover, and Franklin Roosevelt.

The sum of his activities has been tremendous. But for NORRIS and his leadership in Congress most of the legislation of the Theodore Roosevelt era from 1905 to 1915 would have been lost. We should not have had the constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators. We should not have had the income tax. Later, we should not have had the constitutional amendment requiring the inauguration and the opening of Congress after a Presidential election in the January following the November election. We should not have had the T. V. A. and its kind scattered over the Rocky Mountain areas. We should not have had much of the farm legislation, good or bad, which has distinguished the last dozen years. NORRIS was in all these fights, and his presence often was decisive.

Senator NORRIS' activities, which are meticulously described in Mr. Lief's biography, may be cross-indexed thus: Most of them are political and not economic reforms. And those that are political place political power not in the proletariat but in the middle class. His life has been devoted to giving the middle-class man more political power. Incidentally, those measures that are not purely political and have an economic phase are for the protection of the middle class. There is but a narrow proletarian angle in the NORRIS career. He has been a champion of the middle class. He has been a definite foe of a class-conscious money aristocracy. But he has not been deeply interested, nor for long, in problems that concern a class-conscious labor group. Two or three times he has made detours in his career to help labor. But chiefly the reader will find that these detours in the industrial direction are to help labor get out of the proletariat into the middle class. They are only incidentally labor laws.

The reader will learn here that while GEORGE NORRIS risked his political life to support Roosevelt against Hoover and against Landon, he has been rather aloof from the Roosevelt administration. He disagreed definitely with Roosevelt about the Court-packing plan and tried to head off the President in his insistence upon that issue. He has had doubts about most of the proletarian Presidential issues. He has supported Roosevelt in his farm program, but there, also, often with reservation. He has been as independent in the Roosevelt administration as he was in the regimes of Coolidge and Hoover. He has been his own man, a free lance.

Mr. Lief, in his biography, is chary of eulogy. But he might well have closed his story by declaring that GEORGE NORRIS, as a constructive statesman, has to his credit as large an amount of work achieved as any other senatorial leader in American history.

Another biography of NORRIS should be written to disclose more clearly the man, his defeatist temperament, his deep integrity, and his curious, moody aloofness from the social life around him. He has been almost a hermit leader with a sad and terrible sincerity which gave him somehow tremendous power both in his home State and in the United States Senate.

Libraries in the Contemporary Crisis

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY ARCHIBALD MacLEISH AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Librarian of Congress, Archibald MacLeish, on Founders' Day, at Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, Pa., October 19, 1939. The address is entitled "Libraries in the Contemporary Crisis."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have known for some months that I was going to have the honor of speaking to you this evening. But it was not until 5 days ago that I learned what I was expected to say. Five days ago I was sitting more or less comfortably at a luncheon table in an Annapolis hotel, with my attention wholly given to the ice cream, when the learned and distinguished gentleman on my left informed me that the new Librarian of Congress was on the point of rising and delivering a speech. When I asked him what the new Librarian of Congress was on the point of rising and delivering a speech about, he said, "That's easy. There is only one thing these people want to know about you. They want to know why on earth you did it."

It is an interesting question. Or rather, it is two interesting questions. The first is a question interesting to that minority—an excessively small minority if the sales of my books are correctly reported—which likes to read my verse. To these rare people—rare in every sense of the term—the question means "Why on earth did you take a job as librarian which will leave you little or no time for your own work?" The second question is a question interesting apparently to a very much larger number of my fellow citizens, but interesting in a somewhat different way. When the New York Herald Tribune asked the new Librarian of Congress why on earth he did it, the New York Herald Tribune was not concerned for the unwritten verse of A. MacLeish. The question as the Herald Tribune asked it meant, "Why on earth did you take a job for which you are so patently unfitted?"

But interesting though the question is, I doubt if I shall attempt to answer it. There are two persuasive reasons. As asked by the Herald Tribune the question is not answerable—and is not meant to be. As asked by the readers of my books it is answerable only at the cost of a personal history which you would find both long and dull.

There is, however, a question under this question, or within this question, or behind this question, which I should like to try to answer. It is a question addressed not to me but to all men of responsibility. And it is a question which concerns not a particular librarian but the librarians of the Nation.

If you object that I have been a librarian for 2 weeks only and that I know nothing about libraries and that I should therefore not attempt to talk about libraries, I can only reply that the first statement is true, and that the second statement is true, but that the third statement is not true. For some months the librarians of the country have been talking quite freely about me without knowing anything about me. It is only fair that I should reciprocate.

Moreover, ignorance has never stopped the mouths of lecturers. On the contrary, American notions of American poetry are almost wholly formed by people who, if they spoke only out of knowledge, would not speak at all. For one Louis Untermeyer who will patiently present to his audiences the important poetry of our generation in this country—the poetry of Pound and Eliot and Sandburg and Frost and Cummings and Crane—there are a hundred enlighteners of the people who not only do not understand the greater part of the work of these poets but are not even certain, of their own knowledge, that it exists.

There is no doubt that I am ignorant of American libraries. American writers generally are unaware of American libraries except as imposing frontages on important streets, and the fault, I may add, is not altogether with the writers. But ignorant though I am, I have several precedents for speech. And I have also a compelling reason—the reason more compelling than any other—the reason of time.

Our age, as many men have noticed, is an age characterized by the tyranny of time. Never more than at this moment was that tyranny evident. Those of us who are concerned, for whatever reason, with the preservation of the civilization and the inherited culture of this Nation find ourselves in a situation in which time is running out not like the sand in a glass but like the blood in an opened artery. There is still time left to us. But we can foresee and foresee clearly the moment when there will be none.

I do not like epigrammatic condensations of history. I do not like analyses of life which present its situations on the brutal balance of an "either" and an "or." But it seems to me no less than exact to say that the situation which now confronts us in this country is a situation which must be expressed in just these terms.

We face a situation which has an "either" and which has an "or," and we will choose to fail or to choose between them. Whichever we do, we will have chosen. For the failure to choose in the world we live in is itself a choice.

The "either," as I see it, is the education of the people of this country. The "or" is fascism. We will either educate the people of this Republic to know, and, therefore, to value and, therefore, to preserve their own democratic culture, or we will watch the people of this Republic trade their democratic culture for the nonculture the obscurantism, the superstitution, the brutality, the tyranny which is overrunning eastern and central and southern Europe.

Others, I will admit, see the alternatives in different terms. Six and seven years ago at the bottom of the depression, American intellectuals saw the American progress as a race between economic reform and violent revolution. Economics, as you will recall, was then the one, the true religion which explained everything. If you made the economic machine operate, you made everything operate; if you didn't make the economic machine operate everything collapsed. The "either" in those days was economic salvation; the "or" was social ruin. That, however, was before Herr Hitler had demonstrated that men could be led against their economic interests as well as against their spiritual interests if the propaganda was good enough.

Another, and a still popular definition of the American alternatives was, and is, the definition which puts Americanism on one side and a conspiracy of evil on the other. The nature of the conspiracy depends on the angle of observation. To certain good Americans the conspirators are the Communists. There was, and there still is, some disagreement as to what a Communist is (and some of the disagreement is honest), but there is no disagreement as to the general theory. The theory is that America is all right and the Americans are all right and everything else would be all right if only the Communists could be prevented from spreading their insidious propaganda and wrecking the country. It is not, I think you will agree, a very flattering picture of America despite the fact that it is a picture offered by those who are loudest in their protestations of love for the country. It implies that the Americanism of the rest of the Americans is so shaky and insecure, and the appeal to them of Communist dogma is so seductive that only by stopping American ears with legal wax and strapping American arms with legal thongs can American democracy be preserved. I for one have never been impressed by the sincerity of those whose eagerness to save American democracy is so great that they would gladly destroy all the American guaranties of freedom to ask, freedom to answer, freedom to think, and freedom to speak, which make American democracy democratic. I more than half suspect that it is not America but some other institution, something very different, something very much smaller, very much less admirable, these people really wish to save.

But the self-appointed guardians of America have not been the only ones to see the American situation as a conspiracy of the forces of evil. The people they hate most, the Communists themselves, take exactly the same position. They take it, however, with this difference: That the conspiracy as the Communists see it is a conspiracy of evil persons from the other end of the political rainbow. The Communist conspirators are conspirators who meet in bankers' dens furnished with black-leather armchairs and boxes of Habana stogies to plot the ruin of the people.

The shallowness and romanticism of both these pictures of the contemporary crisis are obvious. No one of 12-year intelligence who really thinks about it believes for one moment that American democracy is endangered by conspiracies—least of all by conspiracies like these. If there is any danger in this direction, it is the danger introduced by those who talk about these alleged conspiracies; not by those who theoretically take part. For the only effect of such romantic talk is to distract the attention of the citizens from the actual situation. Those who shout that America is threatened by the "reds" prevent a certain number of their fellow citizens from considering soberly and quietly what it is that really threatens America And those, on the other side, who attribute all our dangers to a Wall Street conspiracy to corrupt the Army and take over the Government, divert the minds of their listeners from the much less romantic but much more disturbing truth.

For the truth is that the threat to free culture and democratic civilization in the United States is the threat not of any person and not of any group of persons but of a condition. Those who, like myself, assert that the threat to a free culture and a democratic civilization in this country is the threat of fascism do not mean by that word what the Communist Party meant by it, or pretended to mean by it, before the Russo-German pact. Those who, like myself, assert that the threat to democratic civilization in this country is the threat of fascism mean that the culture of the Republic is threatened by the existence in the United States of the kind of situation which has produced fascism elsewhere, and that that situation in the United States has already given indications, human and other, of developing in the known direction. In the same way those who say that the alternative to fascism is education do not mean that democracy can be saved by educating the people to see conspirators under the bed, but that democracy can be saved by educating the people to value the kind of life democracy makes possible.

The situation which has produced fascism elsewhere, and which threatens to produce fascism here, is a situation with which education can deal, because it is a situation which failure of education has created. The situation which produced fascism in Germany and in Italy, and which threatens to produce fascism here, is a situation the historical background of which is clear enough. The industrial revolution, with its need for specialized labor, created a new economic class, the so-called lower middle class, above and distinct from the masses of the people who labor with their hands. The capitalist money system, with its tendency to squeeze society into pyramidal forms, froze this new-made class into the social order. The result was to suspend a great mass of people in a kind of limbo just above brute labor, just below comfort and decency and self-respect. Freed on the one side from the discipline of labor by the hand, they were excluded on the other from the discipline of labor by the head. Deprived on the one side of the realism, the hard-headedness, the piety, the traditional human wisdom, the salt sense, the kindness of those who labor the earth and the earth's metals with their bodies, they were equally deprived on the other of that different kindness, that different knowledge, that different wisdom of those whose life is in the mind.

They were, in other words, a class for which the old education of habit and custom had been broken, and for which a new education of intelligence and reason had not been supplied. Fascism is the image of that fact. When this class, driven to revolt by the failures of the economic system which had created it, put forward its leaders—its Mussolinis and its Hitlers—it conducted itself precisely as a class so deserted by the culture of its society might be expected to conduct itself.

The reason why fascism is so brutal, so vulgar, so envious, so superstitious, so childish, so shrewd, is that these are the characteristics of a social class excluded from the moral and emotional and intellectual traditions of its society. The reason why fascism makes flags and parades its symbols is that no other symbols are moving to those who have not been allowed to inherit the culture of their past. The reason why fascism makes war and hate its aim is that those out of whose misery fascism is created are men incapable of imagining any other ends except the ends of hate and war.

But the fact, the evident fact, the fact which must at all times be held in view in the United States, is the fact that fascism is the image of a condition, not the invention of a man, and that the condition which has created fascism in Europe may very easily create fascism here, unless we act, and act now, to prevent it. And the question, the always asking question, the question which history presents to us, and will continue to present to us, no matter how we close our eyes or turn our minds away, is the question how we shall act? Shall we turn our attention to the war in Europe and do what we can to encourage those who are fighting fascism there? Shall we organize patriotic displays at home and punish those who preach fascism directly or indirectly here? Or shall we, as honestly as we can and as directly as we can and as effectively as we can, attempt to change by education the condition from which fascism results?

To my mind, there is no doubt as to the answer we should give. I am aware, I think, of some, at least, of the difficulties. I am aware that the immediate forces which drive the intellectually and culturally dispossessed into fascism are economic forces and that education is not an altogether adequate answer to those who ask for a chance to work usefully and creatively and to fulfill their lives. I am aware also that there are people in the United States who do not wish to admit that there are large numbers of their fellow citizens who have been excluded from the American tradition and the American culture. But I think, notwithstanding these difficulties and objections and many others, that we have no choice but to make use of the one effective weapon we know ourselves to possess. If we respect prejudice because it calls itself patriotism, we are poor patriots. If we wait for the economic restoration of a world at war, we will wait too long. As things are, in the world as it is, we can either attempt to educate the people of this country—all the people of this country—to the value of the democratic tradition they have inherited, and so admit them to its enjoyment, or we can watch some of the people of this country destroy that tradition for all the rest.

It is this issue, as I see it, which is presented to American libraries, for it is upon American libraries that the burden of this education must fall. It cannot fall upon the schools. There is no longer time to await the education of a new generation which will come in due course to a more enlightened maturity. It cannot be left to the newspapers or the magazines, however earnest their protestations of honesty and disinterestedness. There are honest publishers, but there are no disinterested publishers and there never will be.

It cannot, even more obviously, be left to the moving pictures or the radio. The radio's notion of disinterestedness is equal time to both sides, regardless of the sides; the moving picture's notion of disinterestedness is silence. But this burden can be entrusted to The libraries. The libraries and the libraries alone can carry it. The libraries alone are capable of acting directly upon the present adult generation. The libraries alone are staffed by people whose disinterestedness is beyond suspicion. And though there are occasional directors of libraries and boards of library trustees who will stoop to the exclusion of books which offend their social or political or economic preconceptions—books, let us say, like The Grapes of Wrath—the directors and trustees of libraries are in general men with the highest sense of their duties to their institutions and their country. The libraries, in brief, are the only institutions in the United States capable of dealing with the contemporary crisis in American life in terms and under conditions which give promise of success. They are the only institutions in American life capable of opening to the citizens of the Republic a knowledge of the wealth and richness of the culture which a century and a half of democratic life has produced.

That fact is a fact which should properly fill the librarians of this country with a sense of pride. But it is a fact also which should fill them with a sense of responsibility. For at the present moment, as librarians themselves have been the first to admit, they are not opening that knowledge and that understanding to the citizens of the Republic. The American Library Association has this year published a small but most important, as well as most readable, study of American librarianship by Wilhelm Munthe, director of the University Library at Oslo, in which the achievements of American libraries in this direction are analyzed. According to such studies and surveys as he found available, Dr. Munthe concludes that in "an ordinary good library town" the library card holders comprise some 25 to 30 percent of the population; that half of these are school children; that of the remaining adult card holders "a large portion never use their cards"; that of the remainder of that remainder 50 percent are high-school students, 21 percent are housewives, 2½ percent are businessmen, 5 percent are clerks, 5 percent are skilled labor, and 5 percent are unskilled labor. In other words, clerks, businessmen, and laborers using the library in an "ordinary good library town" amount altogether to less than a fifth of an undetermined portion of 15 percent of the population. This figure, says Dr. Munthe, "is amazingly low." One admires his restraint.

The truth seems to be that American libraries have executed magnificently the first half of their assignment, as that assignment was defined some 50 years ago by my distinguished predecessor in the Library of Congress. They have solved with great brilliance the problem of getting books for readers. They have developed practices of accession, of cataloging, of classification, which enable them to secure books intelligently and to make them readily available to inquirers. But they have not executed the second half of their assignment. They have not learned how to get readers for books. The typical American library borrower can still be described by a friendly but informed and intelligent European in Dr. Munthe's words: "A woman, of 23½ years, with 3 years of high school, who borrows in the course of a month four modern novels of no particular worth, one really good novel, and one popular biography or entertaining travel account." And who are her authors? As Dr. Munthe tells us: "We can safely say that they are not the ones whose names will some day be cut in marble on the face of library buildings. They are people like Berta Ruck, Zane Grey, and Kathleen Norris. * * * Authors with troublesome or radical ideas are definitely avoided."

If the learned doctor is right, the libraries of America have a tremendous distance to go before they can feel that they have found the readers their books deserve. But it is not a journey they must make alone. Behind them, far back but still livingly there, are the men who created the American library system—men like the man in whose memory this day is celebrated. Besides them are the many still alive—writers, teachers, lovers of American liberty—to whom the education of the people for the preservation of their culture is the best and most hopeful undertaking open to our time: The many who believe as I do that we can either educate the people of this Republic to know and therefore to value and therefore to preserve their own democratic culture, or we can watch the people of this Republic trade their democratic culture for the ignorance and the prejudice and the hate of which the just and proper name is fascism.

These are the alternatives our time presents us. They are not alternatives which will remain forever open. We may accept them now or lose them now. "History," says Wystan Auden—

> "History to the defeated
> "Can say Alas, but cannot help or pardon."

History can say Alas to this American civilization of ours as well as to any other. Unless we save it. Unless we act, not only with our words but with our minds, to save it.

Lessons from Poland

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. LOUIS JOHNSON

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, during the course of the debate today I asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War, before the joint convention of the International Association of Casualty and Surety Underwriters and the National Association of Casualty and Surety Agents, at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., on the subject "Lessons from Poland."

The address is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, fortunate, indeed, are we who meet here in good fellowship, in a blessed land remote from the war, the strife, the chaos, and the destruction that sweep over Europe and Asia. I doubt whether a meeting of this kind would be possible today anywhere but in America.

We drove to the hotel by automobile without concern about the oil supply of our country. We dared lift our eyes to the heavens without dread of a shower of deadly bombs. We walked calmly into the lobby without gas masks slung over our shoulders. We partook abundantly of food without the presentation of any ration card. We exchanged freely of our ideas without fear of snooping informers. We turned on our lights without fear of a possible blackout. On our way out, we may buy a newspaper without a feeling that it deliberately distorts the truth. We will listen to our radio without risk of concentration camp or firing squad. We will go to sleep secure in our faith in our neighbors, in our Government, and in our institutions.

From the war and the strife that tear Europe and Asia to bits, we still are far removed, not as far as we were before the advent of the long-range bomber and of the protracted cruising submarine, but still far enough for some sense of security. From the causes of such conflagration, we are even further separated. We are not a land-locked nation. We are not hungry for territory. We do not covet others' riches. We have no imperialistic designs. We have no minorities. We have no ambition to foist an ideology on any other people. We have no desire to quarrel with anyone. War, we hate and abhor.

Despite our relative isolation from the wars overseas and their causes, we enjoy no insulation against their portents. We have not forgotten the repercussions that followed a shot in an obscure corner of Europe in 1914 and we must do all in our power to prevent Danzig from becoming another Sarajevo in the history of our country.

We must recognize that affairs in Europe do have a tremendous influence on life in America. From Munich we learned the significance of air power as a threat to world peace and set out to put our own air defenses in order. Let us now analyze the recent success of German arms in Poland and try to learn therefrom some valuable lessons toward keeping our own territory inviolate and our own rights secure.

Polish territory was overrun in the first place because Polish M day troops were not ready. If the Poles could have had 60 days they would have been able to complete their mobilization and to make a decent showing against their enemy, but Herr Hitler gave no time. Sixty days and a blitzkrieg were inconsistent with each other. Germany was ready for immediate action. She threw her well-prepared battalions into battle at once and the Poles, brave, but outnumbered, suffered defeat in the early stages of the campaign from which they never were able to recover.

We, too, have M day troops and in an emergency they, too, would not be ready. They are our minutemen, our present Regulars and National Guard men, approximately 400,000 in number. If called out today, they would find themselves faced with shortages of combat cars, tanks, machine guns, gas masks, fire-control instruments, and other necessities.

Thanks to the leadership of the President and to the patriotic response of the last Congress, steps have been taken to remedy many of these defects. We have been given money for munitions. We have received appropriations to educate industry in the manufacture of some of the critical items that are not in ordinary use. Despite these constructive steps, we still lack a full supply for our M day troops. Industry is not yet educated to manufacture all of our needs. There is a wide gap between the contract for an item and its actual delivery. There is a long time lag between the placing of an educational order and the readiness of a plant to go into mass production. Besides, when the last Congress was in session, we spoke of M day troops to the number of 400,000 but in the light of present conditions, even the most conservative estimate a need for 600,000.

Based on the experience of Poland, we, therefore, should resolve that our M day forces, once their number is determined, be wholly equipped with all necessary weapons and supplies ready to respond to call at a moment's notice.

The second reason for Poland's debacle is found in the extent of her frontier, which spread over hundreds of miles. To protect herself against invasion she felt that all of her boundaries had to be guarded. On the north she was threatened from East Prussia and the sea; on the west, by Germany; on the south, by Slovakia; and on the east, by Russia; and she lacked the men and the munitions to make a stand on such a far-flung frontier.

The responsibilities of our Army and our Navy in the Western Hemisphere are widely flung. Years ago the Monroe Doctrine pledged us to protect America from Point Barrow to Tierra del Fuego against invasion by any foreign power. The cooperative agreement of today, reached at Lima and at Panama, requires us to be ready to do our part in the defense of the institutions of the Western Hemisphere. Voluntarily, we have assumed this duty. If need be, we must be ready to exercise it. To do so effectively, we need military and naval forces commensurate with our grave responsibilities. In the world of today words and threats, if not backed by force, may have little or no effect upon the conduct of nations. We dare not bluff and have someone "call" us.

We should take steps, therefore, to build up our Army and our Navy so that they may be strong enough to maintain and give reality to our hemisphere policy. We must stand ready to join in protecting the hemisphere should occasion arise.

The Polish campaign has its lessons in tactics and strategy. It shows the extreme danger of permitting an enemy to carry out flanking operations. It emphasizes the need of echeloning forces in depth, adherence to these sound doctrines might have checked the surge of the German hordes.

As for our own tactics and strategy and our own officers, I doubt whether any army in the world has a more intelligent and better trained staff in the theory of warfare than we have today. Note I said theory. As to practice, most of them are untried. Those of World War experience are but few. Peacetime maneuvers until recently had been sadly neglected. In the exercises of this year the lack of training in command in the field made itself conspicuously felt.

This defect we must correct. We must provide for adequate training and annual maneuvers involving full strength units. Our officers and our noncommissioned officers, who are trained under the finest military school system in the world, must get the necessary drill in the field to augment their classroom training.

The principal cause of Poland's defeat, it is fair to say, lay in the complete supremacy of Germany in the modern weapons of war. In aviation Poland was hopelessly outclassed. At the opening of hostilities, German planes set out to achieve two objectives: First, to clear the sky of enemy planes; and, second, to destroy its airdromes. The very first day 11 towns in Poland where airdromes were located were severely bombarded. The second day, pressure on Polish planes decreased, and on airdromes it increased. At the end of 3 days, the Polish air force, for practical purposes, had disappeared. When not attacking airdromes, the German planes were busy destroying depots, railheads, bridges, and interrupting communications, practices which they continued throughout the campaign.

Germany's pre-war estimate of her air capabilities had proved correct. Her threat had proved itself no mere bluff. When Poland called, Germany had a handful of aces and plenty to spare for possible use in other theaters of operations. Air power has become as dominant a factor in warfare as even its most enthusiastic proponents had prophesied.

The lesson to us already had come home. We sensed the full significance of airplanes at the time of Munich, and we received appropriations from Congress to expand our Army Air Corps to reach a balanced force of 5,500 planes by June 1941.

When Congress adjourned, 5,500 planes seemed a satisfactory number and June 1941 appeared a safe interval; but history was made last month and we must keep abreast of developments. Our Air Corps must become an M day force, ready at the outbreak of hostilities to thwart any attack against us from the skies.

We must have skilled operators to fly the planes, trained combat crews to man them, experienced mechanics to maintain them, efficient equipment to protect them, ample bases to support them, experimental facilities to improve them, and men of outstanding leadership to command them. Toward the achievement of these objectives the Army must now give its full attention.

Returning to the campaign in Poland, we find that in mechanization, Germany held the same degree of supremacy as in aviation. Her heavy mechanized forces rolled across the roads and the fields, outflanking and out-maneuvering the Poles at every turn. When the forces met head-on, the Poles, without adequate antitank weapons, were helpless.

How about our own tanks, our combat cars, and our antitank weapons? Had our mechanized units met the German Panzers we would have been outnumbered in combat cars, in light tanks, and in medium tanks. Against them, we could raise but a few antitank guns. We have not even one full-strength mechanized brigade. In Poland alone, Germany used 10 Panzer divisions.

Our mechanization program has only gotten under way in the last few months but we must exert every effort to hasten its realization. Our Army must be manned, trained, and equipped to face any modern mechanized force.

Finally, Poland failed because she placed too much faith in others. She put her trust in Jupiter Pluvius because he always arrived in torrents in early fall, but this year he failed to keep his appointment. She was confident that her strength lay largely in her Allies but their ground forces were stymied by concrete and steel walls and their planes by the total destruction of the Polish airdromes.

In our country, too, there are men and women who look upon the oceans as allies and upon another's navy as our first line of defense. But the oceans are shrinking. The long-range bomber is a growing threat. The far-cruising submarine lurks in our very waters. The navies of other nations are too busy with their own problems.

No, we should depend on no one but ourselves. We should make ourselves so strong on land, on sea, and in the air that potential enemies will stop, look, and listen before trying to invade our territory or to violate our rights as a nation or as individuals.

Long before the Germans invaded Poland, President Roosevelt had sensed the impending course of world events. From history and experience, he had learned that nations heading for war always attack where they expect the least resistance.

To minimize the dangers of attack against America, he proposed, therefore, that we build a navy second to none and of sufficient strength to meet our duties and our obligations. He called for an air corps, expanded to meet our present-day requirements. He demanded an army equipped for modern battle. He asked for cooperation between our armed forces and industry so that the full economic reserves of our country could be used to best advantage in times of emergency.

Behind the President's national defense plans, conceived before the present European conflagration, there has stood a united people. Today, in his efforts to keep us out of war, we must continue to give him our wholehearted support. America calls for united efforts in every phase of our national life. United, we can go a long way to keep out of war. United, we can resist and defeat any foe that would dare trespass against us.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL BY PETER MOLYNEAUX

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Texas Weekly, by Mr. Peter Molyneaux, editor and publisher. Mr. Molyneaux is a very distinguished and outstanding editor, and this is a very able article from his pen.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Texas Weekly of October 14, 1939]

If Finland must fight to maintain its independence and freedom, if this valiant little nation is compelled to defend itself against Russia, and thus becomes a "belligerent" in the war, the President of the United States, under the provisions of the Embargo Act, must immediately issue a proclamation forbidding any American from selling it any of the arms, ammunition, or instruments of war enumerated in that act. And the United States Government must impose heavy penalties on any of its citizens who violate the terms of that proclamation in any way. Finland has a population of about 3,800,000, a little more than half as much as Texas. Sweden, the only country that is in a position to give Finland effective aid promptly, has a population of about 6,300,000, slightly more than Texas. Norway has about 3,000,000 population, and Denmark has about 3,750,000. If these three Scandinavian countries should support Finland, their combined population, added to Finland's, would be about 16,850,000, or about half as much as the population of Poland at the time Hitler sent his ruthless armies across her borders. Russia has 10 times as much population as Finland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark together. Finland will fight rather than surrender its independence and freedom, and it is practically certain that the three other Scandinavian countries will support Finland in such a fight. But their resources are limited, and England and France are engaged in a death struggle with Germany, supported by Russia and possibly by Italy. A war between these Scandinavian countries and Russia would be an unequal one at best. They would be outnumbered by more than 10 to 1, and their combined resources would be very small compared to those of Russia. Under international law, neutral countries have an unquestioned right to permit any belligerent country, to say nothing of a little country like Finland, fighting for its life, to purchase within their borders such arms and instruments of war as it may need. But the American people have forbidden the United States Government to permit anything of the kind. The American people, in this way, have made the world less safe for small, self-governing peoples. They have thus helped to make the world less safe for democracy. In this way they have abandoned completely, absolutely repudiated, the cause for which Americans died in a foreign land in 1917 and 1918. To be sure, the United States Government has had its representative at Moscow to say to the dictatorial Government of Soviet Russia that it hopes nothing will happen to disturb the peaceful relations existing between Russia and Finland. But the Russian dictator knows that this is merely a pious hope; that if it is ignored, nothing will happen.

The United States will do nothing to help Finland. On the contrary, while so long as Finland is not attacked it will permit Americans to sell it all the arms it can pay for (and it pays for what it buys); the moment it is attacked and its need for such things becomes greater, the United States will deny Finland even this small right. Nothing could illustrate more strikingly the unanswerable argument made by Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, on the floor of the Senate that the Embargo Act favors the strong aggressor against the weak country it attacks. The cases of Estonia, of Latvia, and of Lithuania had already illustrated it—the helplessness of the weak in a world in which strong nations like the United States care nothing at all about what happens to them. But Finland, a country which Americans profess to admire, illustrates it more strikingly. It may be, to be sure, that Russia, for its own reasons and for altogether different considerations, may decide not to attack Finland. It may be that Finland, knowing its weakness in the kind of a world that exists today, will make sufficient concessions to postpone Russian aggression for the time being. It may be that Russia may fear an active war with England and France, in spite of the fact that those two countries already have their hands full in their struggle with Germany, and will not press demands upon Finland. But the fact will remain that the independence of Finland has been menaced by a ruthless power, and that if it should be attacked, the United States would refuse to sell it the necessary instruments of defense, even if Finland sent its own ships or the ships of other countries to transport them.

Another point, illustrating the advantage which the arms embargo gives to the strong aggressor country against the weak victim, is the fact that it permits the strong country to buy from the United States all the raw materials of all kinds that it may wish, and to use its superior manpower to manufacture such materials into munitions and instruments of war. If Finland is attacked by Russia, the Russian Government will be permitted to buy here all the materials it may need to manufacture arms and ammunition, airplanes, war tanks, and the like, and to put its teeming millions to work turning these materials into the finished products.

Finland, on the other hand, will need every able-bodied man, whatever his age, to take a place in the ranks. Every man who is set to work manufacturing the instruments of defense will be one man less in its small army. This situation will exist in the case of every small country that is menaced by a stronger and larger one. In such a world no small country can be free. It has no choice but either to submit to any demand made upon it by the strong country or to be overrun and destroyed as Czechoslovakia and Poland were overrun and destroyed. If the Arms Embargo Act protected the United States against the danger of war, there might be some justification for it, in spite of such consequences as these. But it does nothing of the kind. Germany, for example, in prosecuting its submarine warfare, draws no distinction between arms and the materials out of which arms may be manufactured. Whatever danger may be involved in selling airplanes or armored trucks to belligerents is equally involved in selling gasoline and fuel oil and even cotton to belligerents. This danger can be mitigated by restricting the rights of our merchant vessels to deliver such goods to belligerents and the rights of our citizens to travel the seas. Such restrictions would be of much greater economic disadvantage to the American people than the prohibition of the sale of arms. But it would minimize the danger of involving us in the war, and on that ground would be justified. But the prohibition of the sale of arms does not minimize this danger, and it has no such justification. But it does give the aggressor country, with immense manpower to spare to manufacture the implements of war from American materials, a great advantage over its weak victim. And it does this without increasing the security of the United States in the slightest degree. On the contrary, because it does this it increases the danger of our involvement in war, because of its effect upon public sentiment in the United States. Nothing can get the United States into war but the indignant sentiment of the American people, and to place them in the position of helping the aggressor against its victim in this way is to generate such indignant sentiment.

Falsified history is the infirm foundation on which the whole argument of the supporters of the arms embargo is reared. Take away this foundation and the argument collapses. This false version of history sets forth that the United States went into the last war to protect its trade in arms and munitions. That is simply an unmitigated lie. A man died the other day who knew as only few men knew that it is a lie. That man was Count von Bernstorff, German Ambassador to the United States from 1914 to 1917, who devoted all his time, day and night, during those years to untiring efforts to keep the United States out of the World War. Here is what he said about why the United States went into the war: "My task was done when the Lusitania incident was disposed of without America's entry into the war. After that the question of peace or war depended not on me but upon the Wilhelmstrasse and the great army headquarters. They knew exactly that a repetition of the Lusitania incident or the unlimited extension of submarine warfare would automatically mean war with the United States. But they would not listen." And what was the Lusitania incident? It was the sinking of a British passenger steamer by a German submarine without warning, causing the death of 1,198 persons, including 124 Americans. Those 124 Americans and others like them had taken passage on the Lusitania, in spite of advertisements in American newspapers in which the German Embassy warned them not to do so. They had a perfect right, under international law, to travel on that ship, but because they exercised this right, the German Government drowned them on the high seas. That incident caused such a wave of indignation to sweep over America that it was almost a miracle that the United States did not enter the war at once. But the American Government did not want to plunge its people into war if it could help it. So when the Imperial German Government solemnly promised that such a thing would not be repeated, the American Government accepted that pledge, with the notice to the German Government that its violation would mean war.

Well, on January 31, 1917, the German Government caused Count von Bernstorff to notify the Government of the United States that, beginning the next day, unrestricted submarine warfare would be resumed, and that even American ships entering a specified zone would be sunk. The United States immediately broke off diplomatic relations with Germany, and when American ships were sunk, the United States declared a state of war to exist with Germany in response to the demand of an overwhelming public sentiment. This is true history and it contrasts sharply with the falsified history on which supporters of the arms embargo base their argument.

Why did we go to war? Because the German Government denied to our ships and our citizens the right to travel on the seas in zones prescribed by that Government, and enforced that edict by sinking our ships and drowning our citizens. We went to war because public sentiment among the American people insisted that we should not surrender this right and because of public indignation over the sinking of our ships and the drowning of our citizens. In going to war, the American Government obeyed the overwhelming will of the American people. The action had nothing to do with our war trade. But even if it did, our war trade prior to 1917 consisted chiefly of the sale to the belligerents of things that are not now included in the embargo. We can still sell most of the things that we sold to belligerents prior to 1917 without violating even the spirit of the embargo proclamation. We didn't sell much arms and ammunition, because we were not large manufacturers of arms and ammunition when the war broke out, and were only beginning to expand such manufacture when we went into the war. We didn't sell many airplanes or armored motor trucks for the same reason. But aside from this, the bulk of our trade was in other things, particularly in foodstuffs, cotton, and the like. If it was our war trade that got us into the war, if we went in to protect it, there is nothing in the Arms Embargo Act to prevent this from happening again. Because we can have quite as much war trade, and even more today, under the arms embargo as we had between 1914 and 1917. And German submarines will sink ships carrying wheat and cotton to England quite as quickly as they will sink ships carrying munitions.

The Nazi Government has already announced that anything that can be converted into munitions or instruments of war is included in its definition of munitions. It has sunk neutral ships carrying lumber and wood pulp on that ground within the past few weeks. And the arms embargo does not prohibit the sale of such things to belligerents. As a matter of fact, as the law stands today, such things can be delivered to belligerent countries on American ships manned by American citizens without violating the law. What got us into the war in 1917 can get us into this war without violating the arms embargo. It was the sinking of American ships and the drowning of American citizens that aroused public sentiment in the United States sufficiently to cause them to enter the war. It was not our trade in anything, our sale of anything to belligerents, whether prohibited by the arms embargo or not, that aroused the American people in this way. And let it be repeated over and over again that only the aroused sentiment of the American people can get us into the present war.

We will go in again if an overwhelming sentiment of the American people demands that we go in. That is the thing we must concern ourselves about if we really want to stay out of this war. No law of any kind can keep us out of it if the American people demand that we get into it. And that is why the Embargo Act, while not increasing our security a bit, is a dangerous act. We have pointed out before that the sentiment of the American people is overwhelmingly in favor of England and France and against Hitler in this war. And we have said, and we repeat it now, that if the Embargo Act is not repealed at this session, it will be repealed later in response to the demand of an angry and indignant public sentiment. Well, what shall be said of the situation that will arise if Russia attacks Finland, and Finland becomes a belligerent? How long will the American people stand for a measure that favors Russia against Finland? And if this measure is not repealed in time, might it not generate an increasing degree of indignation and resentment and therefore increase the danger of our getting into the war? We think so. And that's why we think the cash-and-carry measure should be substituted for the embargo without delay.

Drafting Money in Time of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOSH LEE, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] during a radio debate held on October 22, 1939, over the Mutual Broadcasting System, sponsored by the American Forum of the Air on the subject, Should the Government Draft Money as Well as Men in Case of War?"

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, this bill does not propose to deal with war profiteering in the field of commerce and industry. It has to do only with the financing of war, and the prevention of profits in that field.

EXPLANATION OF BILL

In the first place, bear in mind that this proposal does not provide for the seizure of property. It provides for raising money by a series of bond issues. Money would be raised only as it would be needed.

How did we finance the last war? It was by the sale of Government bonds. This plan for financing war is just like the plan we used in the World War, with three major exceptions. First, the purchase of bonds is mandatory; second, each individual must buy according to his ability to buy; and third, there can be no profits.

It is important to realize at this point that there is not enough ready cash in the United States today to finance a major war. Consequently, we must utilize credit. When we think of the wealth of America, we must think in terms of land, buildings, factories, and goods. Therefore, any proposal to draft the wealth of the United States must provide the means of translating that wealth into credit, and borrowing that credit and then provide the means of translating that credit into cash. The proposal we are debating tonight does just that.

Let us see how this plan would work. Suppose a man worth $100,000 has a factory. Suppose he has no cash, or what little he has he needs for operating his business. Now, because he has no available cash, would anyone argue that he should not buy any war bonds at all, although he is worth $100,000? I believe all will agree that he should buy some war bonds. Then should we leave the amount he is to buy to his patriotism, or to a high-pressure committee, or to his desire for profits on the bonds? You will agree with me that none of these are fair criteria for the amount of credit that he should lend to the Government.

But under the proposed plan we establish a definite schedule very similar to the graduated income-tax schedule which would determine exactly the amount that he should lend as his proportionate share of the money to be raised. For example, a bond issue that would require a man worth $10,000 to lend $90 would require a man worth $100,000 to lend $1,890.

In case the individual has difficulty in raising ready cash, the bill provides that the Government may accept his note, bearing a commercial rate of interest and secured by his property, in return for the bonds. The Government may then convert this note into cash either by selling it or by issuing money against it. Since the note would be amply secured, the money would be sound.

In this manner the Government could make liquid the nonliquid wealth of America without placing undue strain upon any individual and without issuing one single dollar that was not backed by a dollar's worth of property.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED

Now I wish to answer some objections to this. The War Department said in effect that a war, to be successful, must have the support of the people, and if it has the support of the people it would not be necessary to draft money. But why wouldn't that argument be just as good against drafting men? But the War Department is not depending upon the voluntary system of enlistment. On the contrary, it has a carefully worked out plan for drafting men.

The Navy Department's objection is that a system for drafting capital might cause a delay in raising money. Why couldn't that same argument be made against the selective draft of men? It takes time to set in motion the machinery for raising an army of men by the selective-draft system, but when you get it operating you have system instead of chaos. It would take no longer to file the reports and classify the people according to their net wealth than to classify the boys according to their availability and fitness for service.

The Treasury Department objects to the bill because of the difficulty of defining wealth. But we know there is wealth and we know what it is without splitting hairs over the definition of it. It is true that some property might have a sentimental value to the owner, but such values are determined every day by the courts.

It is easier to define wealth than it is for the local boards to determine which boys must go in the first call and which ones must go in the second call and the third and the fourth and fifth calls. If we can determine these human values it is idle to argue that we cannot determine a matter of dollars and cents.

Every person must define wealth before he can get a loan at a bank. He has to submit a financial statement listing his assets and liabilities, and no one raises the question of defining net wealth.

These form-letter objections present no valid arguments against this legislation. Then why don't those who are opposed to this measure have the courage to come out boldly and say, that to them, money is more sacred than men?

REMOVES PROFIT INCENTIVE

The passage of this measure would remove the profit incentive from the financing of war. Mr. Pearson, of the Treasury Department, informed me that up to 1934 we had paid over $12,000,000,000 in interest on the war bonds alone. But we cannot reach this war profit by taxation because the bonds are tax exempt.

But under the proposed plan, instead of holding out the tempting incentive of tax exemption and high interest rates for the use of money, it would say to the Wall Street bankers, "If the United States goes to war, you will be compelled to finance it, and that not at a profit." This would exert a tremendous influence against war.

STRENGTHEN OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

But if war were forced upon us, this measure would strengthen our national defense by mobilizing our financial resources.

When the voluntary system of financing war breaks down, as it always does when the war lasts long enough, governments turn to the printing presses for money with the disastrous results that always follow the issuance of fiat money.

Germany completely destroyed her monetary system by issuing unsecured paper money. The worthless Confederate currency of the South and the depreciated "greenbacks" of the North remind us of the desperate efforts of those two governments to continue fighting after the voluntary system of financing had broken down.

Financial resources have been referred to as the "sinews of war." At least, we know that two things are essential to win a war. They are men and money. If we are able to supply the one but not the other we are still defenseless. In case of war, the United States should be able to supply these two essentials in a constant stream.

But during the World War it became increasingly more difficult to raise money, as the committees who put on the Liberty bond drives will testify. Yet we are told by those who oppose this plan that the bond issues were all oversubscribed, which statement is true but very misleading, because in your imagination, perhaps, you see a man at a desk handing out the bonds just as fast as he and his helpers can hand them out, and perhaps you imagine men tiptoeing and waving check books and shouting bids for so many dollars' worth of bonds. And then, perhaps, you see the Secretary of the Treasury close the door while these patriotic millionaires are still begging for a chance to buy more bonds.

But that was not the case. The true picture is that in every nook and corner of the United States we had high-pressure committees going to people's places of business, going to their homes, going to theaters and other public meetings and using all of the modern methods of salesmanship in order to sell their quota of war bonds. At the same time the Government was spending thousands of dollars on colorful billboards, newspaper advertising, and propaganda in order to sell these war bonds.

Naturally the committees in one part of the country did not know how many dollars worth of bonds the committees in the other part of the country had sold until they all came in and totaled up the results of the campaign. Then they discovered they had an oversubscription for these bonds.

Now, let us look at the amount of oversubscription. I think it will tell a story within itself. The first Liberty Loan was oversubscribed 52 percent, the third Liberty Loan was oversubscribed 39 percent, and the last Liberty Loan was oversubscribed only 16½ percent. In other words, with all of the pressure that the Liberty Loan committees could bring to bear, the oversubscription slumped from 52 percent to 16½ percent.

But that's only half of the story. Now let us look at the rising interest rates which it was necessary for the Government to pay in order to coax enough money out of hiding to continue the war. While the enthusiasm for buying bonds was going down, the interest rate to make bonds more attractive was going up. The first bond issue bore 3½-percent interest, the next 4 percent, the next 4¼ percent, and the last 4¾ percent. And if the war had continued long enough, judging from history, we would have reached the point where the Government could not have borrowed money at any rate of interest. Then we would have turned to the printing presses and destroyed ourselves, all for the lack of an efficient system for reaching the wealth in this country.

The War Department already has a plan worked out in detail for drafting the manpower of the United States. The War Industry Board has a plan already worked out for mobilizing the industrial and material resources of the United States. But there is, as yet, no plan for mobilizing the financial resources of this Nation. Apparently the Treasury Department would depend upon this same, clumsy, voluntary method of financing war. The World War showed us that that method is inefficient. It is extravagant, it is unjust, and it breaks down when we need it the most. Therefore, I believe that we should replace this hodgepodge, hit-and-miss, high-pressure method of financing war with a systematic, just, and effective method of mobilizing our financial resources.

Is money more sacred than men? The same people who are now objecting to drafting the millionaires' wealth in case of war were perfectly willing to draft the boys and send thousands of them to their death. But now that we are considering a measure that would draft dollars as well as men, we are running into opposition, because their precious dollars are too sacred to be drafted.

During the darkest days of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln went to New York to raise more money to feed and clothe and arm the soldiers. He saw that the bankers were holding out for better terms. He stood up with fire flashing from his eyes. He said, "I can draft a widow's only son. I can take her only means of support from between the plow handles and place him at the front of the battle where his life will not last 6 minutes, but I cannot lay my hands on enough money to pay for the food he eats before he is shot."

It was true in the Civil War; it was true in the World War; and unless we do something about it now, it would be true in case of another war.

Labor and Neutrality

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY SENATOR McCARRAN BEFORE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to introduce in the RECORD a speech delivered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] before the American Federation of Labor on October 11, 1939.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, my friends, workers of America, it is an honor for any Member of the National Congress to come before this great representative body. Especially do I consider it an honor because I have never had the privilege of being affiliated with one of your great branches nor with your great organization. I am only one who looks on from an individual, independent standpoint; I am only one in whose blood there flows the everlasting spirit of Americanism, the determination to keep my country uppermost, so that when the time may come that a torn world will require an arbiter of their disputes, my country, your country, may serve in that great capacity.

Mr. President, I am reminded as I address your group here today of a little incident that occurred in the city of New York not so long ago. I was present when they sought to organize a new society in a given community in that great city, and they invited to this particular gathering everyone whom they thought would be at all susceptible, at all encouraged to join. So after dinner they called on those who were there, many of them, and in the course of the call an elderly Irishman was questioned as to whether or not he would consider favorably becoming a member of this new organization.

Standing in his place, the Irishman said, "Well, Mr. Chairman, I have never been very much of a joiner, I have never joined much of anything. I joined St. Patrick's parish for the good of me soul, I joined the New York Athletic Club for the good of me body, and then I joined Tammany Hall just to keep body and soul together."

Mr. President, I use this story, this incident, which I think is apropos from a Nation-wide standpoint, because I feel that in the great body of labor today we are keeping body and soul of nationalism and Americanism together.

My friends, may I impose upon your time for only a few minutes that I may recite to you something perhaps that you know, but having known it, you might have overlooked it for the time being; namely, that today as we face the future America, with all of her traditions built into the past, with all of her glory promised for the future, we must listen to the voice of humanity. There is no group in all this country today, there is no power in governmental lines that can transcend the voice of the people, and that voice is today represented in your labor organizations as they assemble here by their duly constituted representatives.

Let us go back and look at the past within our own lives. There is scarcely a man or woman among you who do me the honor to listen to me today who has not passed through the last 25 years, and during that time you have seen what conditions were as regard the awfulness of war. You have seen what it has meant to the toilers of this country and the toilers abroad. Today we are confronted with the expression, coming broadcast over the land by way of propaganda, that if we lend ourselves to foreign troubles and to foreign turmoil we may thereby augment employment in this country; we may thereby bring better wages to the toilers of this country; we may thereby build profits in this country. I will deal with those items one by one.

Let me go into the history of your own organization. Mr. President, when we entered the World War your membership was far greater than it was when we closed the World War. When the armistice was signed your membership was looking to a much less number than it enjoyed in 1917, when this country entered the World War. More than that, from the time we entered the World War until the present day shop unionism grew by leaps and bounds. I am grateful—and when I say that I am grateful it is because I believe in your individual organizations—I am grateful for the fact that you are overcoming that fallacy that has taken so much from the strength of your organization throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Better a thousand times that you have your craft unions extending over the Americas, if you please, than that any organization should be controlled by one particular group or by one particular crowd that controls the lives and the labors and the hearts of those who serve in that particular plant. Because labor is world-wide, individual human liberty is world-wide, and labor represents individual human liberty, and whenever labor loses sight of individual human liberty, then labor will have lost its greatest ally in the battle we must make in the centuries yet to come. Yes, they say that during the World War there was an augmentation of the earnings of the toilers. Yes, between 1914 and 1917, before we entered the World War, wages increased in this country 24 percent; but the cost of living in this country, the cost for the wage workers, if you please, the cost at his tableside, the cost at his hearthside, the cost of maintaining his wife and children went up to 42 percent. Further, when we closed the World War, we found ourselves with a great increase in the number of toilers, but the earning power of each was immediately cut down, thus his scale of living was gradually forced downward until the present day. And so war has never lent anything to labor except a false idea that a monetary increase in the earning power of the individual might bridge over an unhappy hour.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say that it has been suggested that our country participate—when I say participate I do not mean that we send our boys abroad—it has been suggested that we participate by way of letting down the embargo, and that this participation would lend to decrease the number of the unemployed, would lend to the building of homes. Yes, it may build homes, Mr. President, but history has taught us that into those homes may come the dying, the maimed, and the insane. This is the effect of a blind participation in war.

Would it not be better a thousand times that your great organization could carry on in the battle of decreasing hours of labor and increasing wage earnings, to encourage individualism in industry? Would it not be better a thousand times that the homes created in America should be the hearthside of young men fitted to become better Americans in body and soul than that those homes should be filled with returned soldiers, young men with sick minds and wrecked bodies dying by inches?

I am only reciting to you thoughts that you may take home with you as you go back to your places; that you may give the message to those who will listen to you, because what I express in my homely way here today are thoughts running through the minds of the 95 men with whom I sit from day to day. I draw no lines. I don't believe there is a man of the 95, even though he may differ from me as to the course to pursue, there isn't a man in the United States Senate today who isn't resolved that this country, born under God, this democracy where mothers live in homely homes and rejoice in growing sons—that in this country we shall resolve to keep young manhood at home and at peace. And when I say democracy, I mean the democracy that grew out of the inspiration of the patriots that assembled in Philadelphia and wrote the Constitution under which you and I live, the democracy that has been coveted and imitated the world over, the democracy that has made other countries say that they are democratic, and I refer to our good friends the British and the French. Democracy in the Western Hemisphere, where labor is permitted to assemble as it does assemble here and as it does not dare assemble abroad, where labor is permitted to go back to individual home assemblies and meet there with their brothers—that democracy living in the lowly homes of the toilers of this country shall be a beacon light to the torn and bleeding countries of the world.

Oh, a thousand times better would it be if those who speak of profits coming out of war, if those who speak of profits coming out of the letting down of the embargo, if those who say that we let down this embargo and sell munitions of war we will set our factories to work; oh, better a thousand times would it be if those would say instead, "We will keep our homes happy, we will make it possible for American boys to look into the future where their bodies will be as God ordained they should be, physically fit. We shall look forward to the hour and the time when the great mass of the red-blooded of the toilers of this country, looking to the toilers across the sea, will say to them, 'Take precept and example from what we did in 1939; take precept and example from what we will do in 1940.'"

We are going to keep our country from taking the first step that might lead us into war; we are going to keep this country neutral—and when I say neutral I mean neutral. We have no enemies to punish abroad, no friends to favor so far as our national existence goes. You may have your individual likes and dislikes. I may despise the totalitarian form of government, as I do, because in my heart of hearts I am a Democrat. Democracy is the biggest thing in all the world to me, and so I despise any form of totalitarian government that would use the rank and file as mere puppets in their desire to carry on a balance of power.

You may have your individual views, but remember that that is individual. As a nation we stand neutral today, and as a nation we propose by our neutrality to carry on so that labor, the toiler in the ditch and in the field, in the forest, and in your plants, if you please, may realize the value of the freedom that makes this assembly possible, the value of the right that each individual may stand shoulder to shoulder with his fellow in his particular walk of life. That is the greatest thing that the individual American can have—the consort, the comfort, and the joy of joining with his individual fellow, his colleagues, so that they together, as they walk down the avenue of life, may know—realizing each other's troubles, realizing each other's burdens, realizing each other's toils—that they share together those burdens and they understand their respective sympathies.

And why do I deal with this subject at the outset? What have I behind me of glory in the way of history? At the hazard of repetition, because you have all read it and you have all heard it, may I bring to your attention the words of a great leader in a great democracy. It seems almost prophetic as we read his words today, almost 150 years from the hour in which they were uttered; it seems as though he saw the very scenes that present themselves to you as American citizens and as American citizenry today. May I read the words of a great Democrat, a great American, a great leader of civilization, a great guide to the sons of mankind. He said:

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

"But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, and excessive dislike of another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other."

May I pause to talk to those who talk to the millions as they walk and as they toil. May I pause to bring back to your attention the propaganda that led us into a conflict where and out of which we left behind white crosses row on row in foreign fields. May I pause there to dwell upon propaganda that led us into a conflict. You would realize the insidiousness of the propaganda of which I speak if you were to come with me into the hospitals of America today, if you were to go out to Fort Whipple, which is close to my home, and see there the boys suffering the tortures of a living death. They look out onto the western hills without a single hope, save that they look to heaven high and fear lest the next hour may close life for them. They stood on the firing line in France and they are dying today. And here we are today, before they die, thinking of entering into another such conflict. Oh, was not Washington wise when he counseled us not to allow ourselves to become partial to one and hateful to another. Did he not mean that by giving ourselves to "entangling alliances" we destroy the very thing that is fundamental to our great Americanism, whereby and out of which we propose to lead the civilized world when there is no leadership save ours?

Let us go on:

"Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious."

May I develop that thought: "Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected." We lent ourselves to the intrigues of the favorite, and today we resist the intrigues of any favorite. We resist it with everything within our power—not but that we may have our individual favoritism, that is for us as individuals, but as a Nation we resist the intrigues of the favorite because we are liable to be suspected. Because we are liable to be suspected of what? Of lending ourselves to that phase of the cause, "while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests."

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is to have as little political connection as possible." Listen to the prophetic lines that I will now read, and apply them to the hour. One would think that he who uttered these lines had already passed in spirit through the age in which we live. I wonder if he did? Sometimes I think it might be possible:

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the cause of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships and enemies."

Mr. President, in reciting these lines today I do not say that I may not have my individual views, that every man and woman here today may not have their respective individual views. I recite them to prove that there was but one uppermost thought in the mind of the great Washington when he left that farewell address with his people, and it was that as a Nation we need surrender none of our individual views, but as a Nation we must keep aloof from foreign entanglements.

Mr. President, if I were to hold this convention longer, which I would not deign to do, I might go at length into these things. I only use that great impartial, nonpolitical voice because he was nonpolitical. He was retiring then from the greatest position in all the world.

But they tell us that if Washington were to live today, because of our proximity with Europe, he would change his mind. They recite to us that we are only a few seconds remote from Europe, because of aerial facilities. They say we are only a few moments remote from Europe because of wire facilities; that we are only 5 days remote from Europe because of our water facilities.

But may I bring to the attention of labor that when Washington uttered those lines the flag of France was flying where you and I now sit. The flag of Great Britain was flying and her guns were pointed across the line that we afterwards established as our northern boundary. The flag of Spain was flying where I was born in the great State of Nevada. And I want to tell you something that you may not know. Your President knows it. I was born in Reno, Nev. You have heard many things about my native State. Everyone has heard many things about it, but there is one thing, I take it, that you have never heard. Perhaps you have not studied your geography quite closely enough. Reno is the only inland city in the world—I hope the press gets this—where the "tieds" come in and the "untieds" go out.

To return, Mr. President, when Washington uttered these expressions, the great Golden State of California, the great States of Nevada, Idaho, Utah, Montana, Arizona, and New Mexico were flying the Spanish flag and the Mexican flag. When Washington uttered these expressions every country in South America, save Brazil, which was then under the Portuguese Government, was under the Spanish Government. European interests were closer to Washington than they are today. But with that courageous Americanism he felt that we should remain aloof then, and I feel that we must remain aloof today. Why? Because I know what is in the offing if we take the first step to go into this war. Federal regimentation is in the offing. It has been written. It has been printed. It is today in the hands of some of your Members—a Federal regimentation that will take from labor everything that labor has won in the last half century. They will subject you to the domination of a military power in which the Army and the Navy have already collaborated in writing the lines, and if anyone doubts it, I have the 1933, the 1936, and the 1939 Federal regimentation, known as the M plan, in my possession, and you are welcome to it. It will take from you everything that you have won by the blood of your brothers. You talk about fascism. Why, fascism will blush if this plan goes into effect.

And so, toilers of America, workers, representatives of the red blood of this country, let us resolve upon the course that we shall pursue. Although my ideas may not be the same as yours, I do not propose to let down on the embargo; but I will vote to keep American citizens off of belligerent ships; I will vote to keep American ships out of combat zones; I will vote to let the world at large have our commodities for the essentials of life, provided we receive cash and they take possession here. I will not vote to allow the accumulation of debt ever to be the asserted agent, whether true or not, of leading us into a foreign conflict.

Men and women of America, your sons and daughters are the ones who will be called. They will be the first in and the last out. Some of them will not come out. Oh, I have heard it repeated time after time, "We will not vote to send our boys into war."

I could have recited lines that came out over 20 years ago to the same effect, but when the hour comes, when the flame of individual national integrity is aroused, then sometimes we forget our resolution. We forgot it in 1917.

Let us never get to the point where we might, perchance, forget it again because, labor of America, it is you who will pay the penalty. In time of war you give the most and gain the least. It is your sons who fight the war and it is you who pay for it. It is your sons and daughters who will go into the firing line, and then when the conflict is over, you will see only the depths of financial chaos. Let me give you this thought in the words of your wonderful President, recited in my presence before the Appropriations Committee of the United States Senate: "Every dollar that is paid in taxes comes from the sweat of the brow of labor." And that is as true as gospel. Whenever labor ceases there is no source to tax.

And so, laborers of America, you who are bearing the burden of the last war, into which you should not have entered, for God's sake let the cry go up by way of a demand, not a resolution, that we will not by selling instrumentalities of death and destruction, take the first step toward a course that might mean for our boys the ghastliness of war, the ghastliness of bodies found hanging over barbed wire entanglements while vultures tear their flesh apart. Let us make a demand now, America, that while we sympathize with those who are in conflict, while we are downcast that there is being spilled the blood of the German people, the blood of the French people, and the blood of the English people, if those people could but express themselves today there wouldn't be any war. Even though they may be living in the hollow of peasant Germany, even though they may be living on the hillsides of the "Heelands" of Scotland, even though they may be living in the lowlands and the highlands of the far away places of Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, even though they may be in the heart of old historic France, they are breathing up a prayer today that this war may end. And God grant that it may end.

Otherwise, I am in favor of keeping the Congress of the United States in session. I am in favor of sitting every day with my 95 colleagues in the Senate, all 95 of them splendid American citizens, resolved to keep this country out of war. I am of the mind that we should remain where we belong, in Washington, and aid by our influence and by our word to the end that this country shall not become a participant in this world struggle.

To that end may we have the voice of the toilers of this country. May we have the encouragement of the homes of this country, represented here by this splendid group.

Mr. President, I have gone a little further in my thought than I should have. I hope nothing I have said transgresses the rules of this great nonpolitical organization. I hope that your great organization, representing the rank and file of America, will always remain nonpolitical. Your greatest power is when you remain aloof from party lines. When you, independently speaking for the toilers of this country, say: "We belong to no party, we speak only for the red blood of the toilers, and we advise you as a representative of the people to look to the virtue in our argument"; as long as you remain in that position, then you will have the greatest power in your hands. Then men will listen to you, and respect you, and then you will hold aloft on high the torch that labor must assume, that labor must carry so that when the bleeding and torn peoples of the world are looking for a leadership, surrounded by darkness, let the light of labor lead, let the glory of the toilers come forward to hold that torch.

Then civilization will send down through the avenue of the ages a resolution of gratitude for the fact that in this great American organization of labor there was a resolve, there was an independence of spirit, there was a studious foresight, if you please, that said, "America, with all your past, with all your future, with all your present, America on whose shoulders rests the civilization of the world, we will be the accepted arbiter of the world's disputes, but we will never send a boy in uniform to die in a foreign land."

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

POLL BY WHEELING INTELLIGENCER

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a tabulation from the Wheeling Intelligencer of a poll taken by them on the neutrality issue. This paper, one of the outstanding newspapers of my State, favors the cash-and-carry policy.

We have heard much about the preponderant sentiment of the people for repeal of the arms embargo. The result of polls in my State shows that the people do not favor lifting the embargo. Furthermore, the overwhelming majority of the letters I have received are for the retention of the embargo. Some may try to cast that aside by saying the letters are the result of mass propaganda but they cannot successfully substantiate such an unfair indictment. I personally know hundreds and hundreds of those who have written me, and I know they have been influenced by their sincere motive of keeping out of war.

A very interesting thing will be found in these letters, in that the hand-written letters are overwhelmingly for keeping the arms embargo. The veterans who have written to me from my State are, by actual count, more than 4 to 1 for the embargo.

Time after time I have heard Senators say that no one in America wants war. My letters show that the great majority of our people do not want war, but they also show that some do. This poll shows that 24 of the 1,557 do want war. Our task is to see that the sides are not reversed.

There being no objection, the poll was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The result of the Intelligencer poll

I want America to keep out of war	1,533
I favor going to war	24
I favor the present neutrality law	1,112
I favor sale of munitions (to combatants, cash and carry)	321

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Manchester Boddy, published in the Los Angeles Daily News and Evening News.

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BODDY: American industry's attitude on war and peace is not only a matter of first importance to the Nation but is also the subject of much public misunderstanding.

In view of this, I am taking the liberty of sending to you, personally, a copy of a statement by Howard Coonley, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. As you know, the N. A. M. is representative of a large cross-section of American industry, and I am sure you will agree that its statement on war is not only timely but, as well, is nationally important.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM V. LAWSON,
Director of Public Relations.

Following is the statement of the National Association of Manufacturers issued by its president, Howard Coonley, to which Mr. Lawson refers:

"American industry hates war.

"War destroys lives. War wrecks homes. Economic chaos and years of crushing depression are its inevitable aftermath. It imperils representative democracy. Free institutions are among its early victims. Ultimately no one can escape the ruin of war.

"American industry wants peace. Peace is the lifeblood of progress. Peace must be the national objective.

"Industry's position on this matter has been stated repeatedly and there must be no misunderstanding about it.

"The United States can stay out of war.

"Emotionalism can betray us into war.

"A public will to peace, coupled with wise public policies and affirmative action to this end by our Government will keep us out of war. A fatalistic attitude that war is inevitable for us is absurd. It presupposes that America cannot conduct itself intelligently to preserve peace and its own interests.

"Europe's problems do affect us, but our domestic problems still must come first.

"If yesterday industry was the only source of prosperity and reemployment, today it is as well the keystone of preparedness and peace. Under any conditions America must depend on a smoothly functioning, efficient industrial system.

"Manufacturers will not relax their efforts to achieve and maintain sound improvement in our domestic economy.

"Industry opposes profiteering—the utilization of war psychology to boost prices for the purpose of making excessive profits.

"As manufacturers we recognize it to be our responsibility and moral obligation to conduct our businesses so that the prices of the products we produce and sell are related equitably to production costs.

"We pledge our energetic support to this policy.

"The N. A. M. calls upon all its members to exercise vigilance against any price or profit policies not justified by actual cost and anticipated cost of replacement.

"Months ago this association said: 'No sensible person believes that profit can come out of the wreckage of human life and economic dislocation.'

"The use of this crisis as an excuse either to extort unjustifiable profits or to pursue partisan political objectives is not only indefensible and dangerous but reprehensible morally. Nor should pleas of 'emergency' be utilized as an excuse for reaching objectives which the American people would not otherwise sanction.

"The present situation calls for agreement on common objectives, but the democratic process of consultation and criticism must never be abandoned. Otherwise we shall be following in the footsteps of those who believe in government by coercion.

"In a world distraught by force the best way to preserve representative democracy is to practice it."

DEAR MR. LAWSON: I quite agree that American industry's attitude on war and peace is not only a matter of first importance to the Nation but that it is also the subject of much public misunderstanding.

This misunderstanding exists, I think, because the words that proclaim your attitude are not loud enough to overcome the impact of events. Observe I do not say events of your ordering. What I mean to imply is that your attitude becomes unimportant in the midst of the very events that have made the issuance of your statement necessary.

There is no need to elaborate or catalog these events. I interrupt my writing to select these representative headlines from the exchange desk:

"Gains Run to Four Points on Strong N. Y. Market."

"Business Makes Best Strides in 2 Years—American Prices Stimulated by War Outbreak; Inquiries Indicate Pace Will Be Quickened."

"Fight Food Price Rise."

"Metal Markets Join in Upswing."

"Grain Futures Mount Sharply."

It isn't enough that you add to a list of generally accepted platitudes your statement:

"The N. A. M. calls upon all its members to exercise vigilance against any price or profit policies not justified by actual cost and anticipated cost of replacement."

Even it cannot confidently be said (as you do say): "American industry's attitude * * * is a matter of first importance to the Nation" if all of the calamities that you say may befall our national economy as a result of war, befall it regardless of your attitude.

I am particularly intrigued with the statesmanship evidenced in these concluding paragraphs of Mr. Coonley's statement:

"The present situation calls for agreement on common objectives, but the democratic process of consultation and criticism must never be abandoned. Otherwise we shall be following in the footsteps of those who believe in government by coercion.

"In a world distraught by force the best way to preserve representative democracy is to practice it."

In this spirit may I presume to suggest how the N. A. M. can translate its attitude into action?

(September 27, 1939)

(This is the second installment of our letter to the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States of America.)

It is generally agreed that war economy means more production, higher wages, higher cost of living, a boom in local business, with about 53 percent of the new business made on the installment plan.

When war ends—or when nations fall into bankruptcy or internal revolution—immediate economic reaction will occur in the United States. Workers who bought on the installment plan will have no money with which to meet payments.

This will start a cancelation movement that will gain momentum and volume until it overwhelms the national economy. With this will come an acute attack of economic "jitters." Once more we will hear on every hand the hysterical shoutings:

"My God, here we are starving in the midst of plenty."

"Factories everywhere and not a wheel turning."

"I want goods—you want goods—we can't buy any. Why?"

"Who closed our industries? Why doesn't capital do something about it?"

"Share the wealth."

"Turn the jobs over to the fellow who wants to use the products."

Can't you see, my dear Mr. Lawson, how logically, how naturally these conclusions will be reached when war "boom" gives way to the "horrors" of peace? And can't you see how readily such rabble rousing "truisms" will be accepted by the milling masses of bewildered citizens?

There is nothing farfetched about this. It is so obvious that even today United States industry cannot afford to hope for peace in Europe. If Europe should agree to peace right now, the United States would immediately be thrown into a devastating depression, one far more disastrous to the safety of the United States than the war now being fought 3,000 or 5,000 miles away.

A "peace scare" is already fraught with more potential danger to the economy of the United States than a "war scare" ever was.

If this sort of feeling has developed in 1 month, what will be the situation if war lasts 6 months, or a year, or 3 years?

The answer is obvious. We will be forced to perpetuate "war economy." To do this we will have to invoke the dictatorship provisions of the National Defense Act of 1916, section No. 120 of which provides, among other things:

"The President, in time of war, or when war is imminent, is empowered, through the head of any department of the Government * * * to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required. * * *

"Compliance with all such orders for products or material shall be obligatory * * * the President, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement herein provided for, is hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants * * * and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation or organized manufacturing industry or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 3 years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000."

For many years the War and Navy Departments have been working on a plan for the mobilization of the country's economy.

A mobilization plan already adopted by the Army and Navy provides for sweeping economic control, including labor, prices, transportation, power, fuel, and trade generally. Its purpose is to divert materials and services from peacetime to war-making channels.

Surely no one can study these plans and provisions without realizing how thoroughly this country has observed the time-honored injunction:

"In time of peace—prepare for war!"

The purpose of this letter is to urge that your great organization—in the spirit of its expressed attitude on war and peace conceive a new national policy:

"In time of war—prepare for peace!"

If we would preserve fundamental American democracy we must prepare to take definite action now probably along these lines:

Create a permanent peace college to develop ways and means of meeting peace problems just as we have a war college to develop ways and means of meeting war problems.

This peace college should be composed of representatives of industry, labor, transportation, finance, and agriculture on a nonpartisan basis. It should be dedicated to the preservation of American democracy and confine its operations to the utilization of such tried and approved measures as come within the general field of agreement of its various members.

An important function of the permanent peace college should be to plan:

(a) The peacetime utilization of surpluses that are produced during the time lag between the end of war and the return to "normal" peace economy, as a basis for stabilizing international finance and our domestic currency and credit.

(b) The coordination of various forms of government relief, insurance plans, public works programs, relief plans, etc., to meet anticipated problems that come with the transition from war boom to normal peace economy.

By keeping the "peace college" in continuous session it will be possible to have such plans and programs worked out in a sane and deliberate manner; it will be possible to submit these plans and programs for approval to Congress for democratic action free from the threat of panic and widespread riot.

There isn't much real danger of the United States actually fighting in Europe, but the very nature of the war now going on over there, considered in connection with our national economic situation, leads inevitably to the conclusion that Europe's war probably will come to the United States.

Let's be prepared to keep it out.

In time of war—prepare for peace!

Very truly yours,

MANCHESTER BODDY.

St. Louis Jefferson Memorial

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 23, 1939

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, after 4 long years of conniving and legal legerdemain, the projected $30,000,000 Jefferson National Expansion Memorial in St. Louis has actually gotten under way, although Congress has never voted an appropriation for it and it never will. The story behind this memorial is a long and sordid one. It reveals that certain agencies of our Government have been willing to accept without question a project that stands revealed as the outstanding achievement of political debauchery in the United States. This memorial has behind it a background of corruption, fraud, and deception, that was fully revealed by the Citizens' Nonpartisan Committee of St. Louis in 1936. The newspapers of St. Louis have carried this story to the Nation, yet this knowledge was no detriment to the promoters when it came to getting the cooperation of the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service in the planning and building of this memorial.

Mr. Speaker, in St. Louis a week ago last Monday, Bernard L. Dickmann, the mayor, ripped out the first brick in a building at No. 7 Market Street to inaugurate the demolition of the buildings in the 37-block area that has been designated for the memorial, which is now being built under the guise of preserving alleged historic sites. On this site were alleged to have started the Oregon Trail, the Santa Fe Trail, and many other historic events, including the place where Lewis and Clark made their preparations for their voyage of discovery into the great Northwest Territory. Although history places the beginnings of these trails elsewhere, and records the fact that Lewis and Clark prepared for their expedition at River Du Bois, in Illinois, history will surely record this memorial area as the starting place from which many political careers in St. Louis were wrecked. To these I may at some future time refer, but for today I want to make a few observations about No. 7 Market Street. It was from this small, two-story, long vacant building that 56 of the 46,252 ghost voters of St. Louis were utilized so effectively in the famous bond-issue election of September 10, 1935. It was from this building that 37 of these ghost voters transferred to No. 22 North Commercial Street, when the heat was on the ballot-box stuffers in St. Louis in 1936.

Mr. Speaker, the mayor of St. Louis must have had feelings of deepest emotion when he approached this building last Monday to destroy the abode of the spirits that had served him so well in the past. The mayor, it is announced, will preserve this brick in his office in the city hall.

Perhaps the ghosts of the departed voters will, in course of time, visit the mayor's office to haunt what remains of their earthly political home. Perhaps it would be appropriate in this particular instance, to encase this brick in gold foil, and place it in a special case in the foyer of the City Hall, just to remind future generations that way back in 1935 someone sold the taxpayers of St. Louis and of the Nation the world's biggest and most useless goldbrick of all time—this second memorial to Thomas Jefferson.

But whether this is done or not the wrecking of these commercial and industrial buildings in St. Louis is just another incident in the wrecking of what seemed to be a most likely political career for his honor the mayor.

The people of St. Louis who now gaze upon this spectacle of destruction are forced to bow their heads in submission to a political triumph—a triumph deplored by believers in civic decency and political honesty everywhere. But this present triumph, Mr. Speaker, would not have been possible without cooperation from Washington. With all the facts of the deception, fraud, and intrigue behind this memorial available or in their hands, the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service have steadfastly lent encouragement to the memorial promoters, have proceeded with this project although it has never been authorized under the Preservation of Historic Sites Act.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has not heard the last of this St. Louis memorial. Once these buildings are wrecked and this property is fully and finally acquired, the promoters will be here for years begging for money to build something, anything to remove an eyesore from the front yard of St. Louis. They will also be here soon clamoring for money to build a new airport in the Mississippi River close to the downtown area. If they are disappointed in getting money for either or both projects, let them be consoled with the fact that Uncle Sam's role of Santa Claus is about played out.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate my previous observations that I believe this spending of Federal funds for this memorial is unlawful and unauthorized by all fair construction of our laws.

With that thought before the Congress, I shall expect to proceed along all available lines to secure a full and complete congressional investigation of this memorial project from its very inception down to the first steps in its construction.

Were I to sit in this Congress, knowing the facts, and remain silent, when funds appropriated for relief, work relief, and the increase of employment by the building of useful projects are diverted to the use of the real-estate promoters of St. Louis under such a tawdry excuse as the preservation of historic sites, I would feel that I was woefully lacking in my duty to the people of Kansas, whom I have the honor of representing, and to the people of the entire United States whose money is being spent without sanction of Congress.

Civil Liberties

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, civil liberties are one of the foundation pillars of American democracy, as they are of all democracies in the world. They mean that men and women shall enjoy the right to worship in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences, that they shall freely exercise the right to speak or print what they believe, that they may meet and assemble together without molestation and that their petitions for redress of grievances will be respectfully listened to by those in positions of public trust. They mean a man or woman in America can call his soul his own.

CIVIL LIBERTIES ARE IN DANGER IN AMERICA TODAY

The depression has given us a group of American citizens, most of whom have had the rather common misfortune of passing the 45-year mark, who cannot find employment in private industry. They are at present dependent, if they are to work at all, upon public employment. They are citizens of the United States and, as such, they are as much entitled to the rights and privileges of the Constitution as anyone. And yet we hear politicians who would welcome a well-groomed lobbyist with open arms complain that some unpardonable crime has been committed when the unemployed people of the country write them postal cards, or hold meetings, or vote for their opponents in an election. Yet the Constitution gives the right of petition, as I understand it, to everyone, and especially to the poor and the unemployed who need it most. For never in all history has any nation retained its greatness if it denied to any considerable group of its people the normal rights of citizenship and of human life. We cannot expect prosperity, happiness, and freedom for four-fifths of the people if the other one-fifth are pushed outside the economic and political systems of the Nation and then even denied the right of protest and "petition for redress of grievances."

I believe that all people in America have a right to hold such views as they desire to hold. I believe it is the very essence of democracy that it shall stand only so long as the majority of the people wish it to stand. If any group can, in open and aboveboard fashion, persuade a majority of the American people to abandon democracy—which God forbid—and adopt some other form of government, I believe that then democracy must cease because it must always rest upon the free will of the people. But those of us who advocate and defend democracy have only the method of open persuasion and sound argument at our disposal.

Therefore, I do not believe that democracy is called upon to permit minority groups to prostitute the liberty it affords to the purpose of the destruction of that liberty itself. I do not believe that democracy is required to suckle with some of the best milk from her breasts, babes which are not her own but which have been born from the womb of systems that are antidemocratic and destructive of civil liberties. There is a limit even to liberty. That limit is found where the abuse of liberty by a small group endangers the continued enjoyment of it by a much larger group. This is true whether that smaller group consists of powerful financiers or industrialists or of a regimented political organization.

Where democracy and civil liberties have been destroyed in the world, one reason, at least, has been the failure of democratic government to draw a proper and justifiable line between true civil liberties on the one hand and their abuse upon the other. It is not enough to protect civil liberties today. We must see to it that they are protected tomorrow, too. And to either allow the continuance of financial oligarchy or to permit the growth, under a cloak of secrecy and relentless discipline, of organizations subject to the rigid direction and control of foreign totalitarian powers in which civil liberty is a myth, seems to me to amount to a betrayal of American liberty itself. The issue in such a case is not one of the denial of civil liberty to such organizations, but rather of the prudent protection of our system of freedom against totalitarian intrigue and even espionage. A man who does not seek liberty for the people of all nations can hardly be relied upon to effectively protect it in America.

WHO CAN DEFEND CIVIL LIBERTIES

I do not believe it is possible for a person or an organization to effectively defend civil liberties in America and also defend the destruction of civil liberties in Russia or in Germany. Neither do I believe it is possible to build the movement for the defense of civil liberties upon the support of people or organizations which insist upon the right to civil liberties now but whose basic philosophy would require their destruction should that organization ever come to power in the United States. But I believe that the American democracy has not only the right but the evident duty to insist that those who would enjoy its liberty must use the methods of liberty in all their dealings.

To say that there cannot be a German-American Bund or a Communist Party or similar organizations is one thing. I do not believe we should say that—for every person in this country has a right to his opinion whether it accords with majority opinion or not. But to say that if you are going to have these organizations they must be free, not captive, organizations, that they must consist of free people, and that they must freely and openly carry on their work is quite another thing. I believe it would be a good thing to say that. I think it is necessary to say it.

I think America can well say to such organizations: "If you want to have civil liberties you must use them to the full. You must use them to generate more freedom, not to destroy and throttle it." For America, civil liberties stand at the opposite pole from such practices as the building up of private military organizations, the maintenance of secret membership lists, the use of false names, the clandestine exchange of orders and reports between foreign powers and their controlled minions in the United States, or the attempted ordering of the lives and consciences of people in America in accordance with the will of a foreign dictator. These things are certainly—to state it mildly—as much a violation of civil liberties as would be the censorship of the press or radio or the denial of a permit to hold an open meeting.

Our democracy has in my opinion to learn not only to defend the liberty of all who truly desire liberty but also to find a formula for protecting itself and the liberties it affords from destruction at the hands either of economic or financial overlords of the people or of stifling totalitarian movements unwilling to expose themselves to the light of liberty itself. I believe that formula is to be found first in certain essential reforms of our present economic order of finance capitalism; second, in prudent regulations against the building up of private military organizations of any sort; and, third, in a decent well-considered requirement that every political or semipolitical organization in America be required to conduct all its business in open and aboveboard fashion, to state freely all its aims and purposes, and to maintain open membership lists and lists of contributors.

Under the Securities and Exchange Act no one can try to sell stocks or bonds to the American people without registering with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Why is it not equally logical to require that anyone seeking to sell an idea through propaganda literature should also register and give to the proper authorities essential facts concerning himself and his organization. Certainly such measures are no violation of true civil liberties. They are, rather, it seems to me, their logical fulfillment as well as their protection.

Mr. Speaker, I delivered these same remarks to the Conference on Civil Liberties held in New York City on October 13, 1939.

The History of the Italian Cheese Industry in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 23, 1939

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, the production of Italian types of cheese actually began with the first emigrated Italian herdsmen in California, New York, and New Jersey, who utilized the products of their farms in the production of types of cheese to which they were accustomed in Italy. Industrially, however, the first cheese factories producing Italian cheese sprang up in the northern part of Indiana, in New England, and in the State of New York. The cheese factories in New England had been promoted by Italian financial groups of some importance, but they were not fortunate in their choice of location in relation to milk quality and in their choice of technical equipment. As a result, after a brief existence, they had to cease operating.

The cheese factories destined to have a lasting influence were the ones of Frigo Bros., of Iron Mountain, Mich., started in 1915 and engaged in the production of Asiago cheese; and the ones of the Stella Cheese Co., now with headquarters at 651 West Randolph Street in Chicago, which company is engaged in the production of Parmesan, Reggiano, Asiago, Romano, and Provelone types of cheese.

The first factory of the Stella Cheese Co. was built at Lake Nebagamon, Wis., in 1918, and the second at Campbellsport, county of Fond du Lac, Wis. This latter plant produces exclusively cheese of the Provolone types. It is provided with a large curing and concentration warehouse and large shipping rooms, from which most of the cheese produced by the Stella Cheese Co., in all its plants in Wisconsin and Michigan, is shipped to different parts of the Nation. This warehouse has a capacity of a million pounds of cheese.

About the same time, in the northern part of Wisconsin, other Italian cheese makers were making headway, among them Cubalichini Bros., Del Santo Bros., Mr. Passini, and others.

In 1928, the Stella Cheese Co. built the first really modern Italian cheese factory in the United States, at Mass, in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, at a cost of $75,000, with a working capacity of 70,000 pounds of milk a day, provided with warehousing facilities for the storing and curing of a million pounds of Parmesan and Reggiano cheese. In 1934, J. R. Tolibia, of New York, an importer of Italian cheese, purchased a cheese factory at Brownsville, near Fond du Lac, Wis., and engaged in the production of cheese of the Provolone types. In 1935 the Stella Cheese Co. built at Baltic, in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, what is now known as the largest Italian cheese factory in the world, capable of working 100,000 pounds of milk a day in the production of Parmesan, Reggiano, and Romano cheese. This factory is provided with five large warehouses for the curing and storing of 3,000,000 pounds of cheese. In 1936 a large whey drying plant was added to said plant, in which all the whey of the Mass and Baltic plants is concentrated and dried.

In the same year the Stella Cheese Co. took over from the Clayton Cooperative Creamery Co. at Clayton, Wis., a large plant which had been up to that time engaged in the production of Swiss cheese. This plant is provided with five large warehouses for the curing and storing of cheese, with a total capacity of 2,000,000 pounds of cheese. In 1937 this plant was also equipped with a whey-drying plant with a capacity of 120,000 pounds of liquid whey per day. In this plant the whey of the Clayton and Cumberland plants is concentrated and dried.

Meanwhile J. R. Tolibia started two new plants, one at Brownsville, Wis., and the other at Dodgeville, Wis.

In 1936 the Cudahy Packing Co., operating through the Dow Cheese Co., assigned part of its plant at Washington Courthouse, Ohio, to the production of cheese of the Provolone type.

In 1937 A. Pocci, operating under the name of the Belmonte Cheese Co., started a cheese factory at Mayville, Wis., and in 1938 Mr. Joe Di Santo started a cheese factory at Manitowoc, Wis.

In the same year the Stella Cheese Co. acquired two additional cheese factories, one at Baraga, county of Baraga, Mich., and the other at Ewen, Ontonagon County, Mich. In 1939 it acquired from the Cumberland Cooperative Creamery Co. its plant at Cumberland and at the same time a large plant at Barronett, Wis.

In the same year Paul Sartori and Louis Rossini engaged in the production of Italian cheese at Plymouth, Wis., under the name of S. & R. Cheese Co.

The group of cheese factories operated by the Stella Cheese Co. today use, during the flush season, about 15,000,000 pounds of milk a month, and use in excess of 110,000 pounds of milk per year—all of which is used in the production of cheese of the Reggiano, Parmesan, Romano, Asiago, Modena, and Provolone types.

The group of cheese factories operated by Frigo Bros. produce Asiago cheese—for grating—while the cheese factories of the Tolibia Cheese Co., S. & P. Cheese Co., Fasini, Dow Cheese Co., Belmonte Cheese Co., and Di Santo produce cheese of the Provolone type, and also of the Asiago, Incanestrate, and Parmesan types.

This latter group of cheese factories use about 120,000,000 pounds of milk per year, making a total for the membership of the Italian Cheese Producers Federation of 220,000,000 pounds per year.

In addition to the cheese produced in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Ohio by the members of the association above mentioned, large volumes of cheese of the Jack and Monterey types are produced in California by Italian cheese makers. From a recent report by the president of the California Cheese Producers Association, it appears that over 10,000,000 pounds of cheese of the types above mentioned are annually produced in California. The Jack and the Monterey cheeses are generally used as grated cheese for seasoning purposes. Substantial quantities of cheese of the Romano type are also produced by the goat herdsmen of Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming. Numerous small Italian cheese factories are also operating near the metropolitan areas of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Chicago. It is safe to state that not less than 400,000,000 pounds of milk are used annually by the Italian cheese industry in the United States—corresponding to about 30,000,000 pounds of cheese having at present a market value of $9,000,000. This industry represents an investment of not less than $2,000,000 in land, buildings, machinery, and equipment. Most of this investment has been made since 1929 and was made possible by the protection afforded by the present tariff on cheese.

This industry employs in its plants as well as in the collection of milk, in warehousing, and in the distribution of its products—not less than 2,000 persons and is utilizing all the milk produced during the year by not less than 7,500 farmers; cultivating not less than 1,000,000 acres of dairy land, most of which is in the cut-over land districts of the northwestern States. It is safe to state that this industry directly provides the livelihood of 10,000 American families—in addition to the employment which it affords to the railroads, to the manufacturers of dairy machinery and equipment, and to the manufacturers of containers, shipping material, paper, salt, and rennet.

The volume of milk utilized by this industry, if skimmed, would produce 20,000,000 pounds of butter which goes a long way in reducing the dairy products which have so seriously concerned the United States Government and the American farmers generally. It is important, further, to take into consideration the following: The total importation of cheese of the Italian types, all of which could be produced in the United States, still represents today 26,000,000 pounds of cheese per year. If all of this cheese were produced in America, we could further eliminate another 15,000,000 pounds of butter from the surplus of the American dairy markets.

Reciprocal-Trade Agreements Wrecking American Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

Monday, October 23, 1939

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, State Senator C. H. Zurcher, of Oregon, recently reported that in the vicinity of Pasco, Wash., he found 6,300 Canadian calves, weighing about 250 or 300 pounds each. These calves were being fattened for the American baby-beef market and were being fed, according to State Senator Zurcher, Argentine corn and East India molasses. A small duty had been paid on the calves, but the Argentine corn was delivered cheaper at Pasco than Iowa corn could be procured there, and ships from the Orient brought molasses from the East Indies cheaper than our own sugar wastes could be obtained.

This is a striking example of the operation of the reciprocal-trade agreements and the havoc they are working upon agriculture. It shows the impossibility of American agriculture competing with the cheap labor and living conditions of South America and the Orient as long as we maintain the American wage scale both as to agricultural employees and maritime workers. The importation of these Canadian calves and the food products for fattening them, of course, deprive the American farmer of a market for a like amount of his products. It brings forcibly to our attention the fact that the American market is the finest market we have for our agricultural products, and if we trade it away to foreign countries in order to build up the manufacturing industry in America, we are undoing the very thing that the Congress has been attempting to do in solving the farm problem. The Congress appropriated $700,000,000 for the assistance of farmers this year, and immediately thereafter the executive department, through the so-called reciprocal trade agreements, which are in reality treaties, is now considering letting down the bars so that importation of competitive agricultural products may flood the American market.

Public notice of the intention to make a trade agreement with Argentina was given on August 23, 1939. Recently the Committee for Reciprocal Information has been holding hearings in Washington for the purpose of considering the reduction in tariffs on a great many agricultural products. Among others of vital importance to Oregon are beef, hides, casein, cheese, corn, flaxseed, and turkeys. I appeared before this Committee, in common with a great many others of the House and Senate, in opposition to the lowering of the tariff on any of the competitive agricultural products, and particularly turkeys. I also lodged a protest with the Secretary of State. In his reply the Secretary said:

> As you know, the objective of the trade-agreements program, of which the trade agreement with Argentina would form an integral part, is to benefit all sections of the United States. By helping to restore and expand our formerly prosperous foreign trade, the trade-agreements program is doing much to promote the prosperity of the entire country and therefore to enhance the demand for virtually all products. As an indication of the importance of the Argentine market to the United States, I may point out that during the 15-year period 1924–38 United States sales to Argentina amounted to $1,542,600,000, or nearly half a billion dollars more than our purchases from Argentina during the same period, which amounted to $1,055,700,000. The great benefits of this trade to American labor, industry, and agriculture generally should not be overlooked.

While it is true, as stated by the Secretary of State, that the purpose of these agreements is to build up our export trade, on the other hand it is a short-sighted and ill-conceived policy that seeks to build up trade for the benefit of one class of our citizens, namely, those engaged in industrial enterprise, at the expense of the farmer. As was said by Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, at the hearing:

> We don't feel so kindly toward Argentina that we want to hurt our own farmers to help the pampas cowboys. We don't want to build up industry which is already bloated and overextended. Congress appropriated $700,000,000 to help the farmers last year, and we don't want to do something now to harm them.

The turkey industry has come to be of major importance in Oregon. I am told that there are only about six States in the Union that produce more turkeys than does Oregon. It is a thriving industry. However, competition is such that if the tariff is lowered on the importation of turkeys from Argentina, and, of course, with the favored-nation clause, to many other countries, this industry will be put out of business. It was disclosed at the hearing to which I have referred that cold-storage turkeys can be shipped from Argentina to New York for 1½ cents per pound, and it costs twice that amount to ship turkeys from Oregon to New York. Furthermore, with cheap peon labor and low-standard living conditions in South America, turkeys can be produced and laid down in New York for approximately 10 cents a pound, according to reports presented at the hearing. My information is that in Oregon the producer must receive at least 16 cents a pound in order to secure cost of production. It is at once apparent that any lowering of the tariff on turkey importations will disastrously affect this great American agricultural occupation and further complicate the farm problem.

The Washington Post, on the 18th of this month, discussed this trade agreement with Argentina editorially, saying, among other things, that—> it would be a direct contradiction of policy for the administration to grant concessions on competitive agricultural importations while it is paying domestic farmers for not producing similar crops.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 18, 1939]

TRADE WITH ARGENTINA

The proposed agreement with Argentina seems destined to put Secretary Hull's reciprocal trade program to its most severe test. Farmers and their representatives in Congress fear that concessions on competitive Argentine products may add to existing agricultural surpluses in this country. Some legislators have gone so far as to threaten a fight to repeal the Trade Agreement Act if a larger volume of competitive farm products is admitted to the American market in return for Argentine concessions on our industrial exports.

These fears are based largely upon the list of products on which the United States is considering concessions. Included in this list are casein, linseed oil, canned meat, cheese, corn, cattle hides, and various other agricultural products. Fresh meats would be excluded, however, under the sanitary embargo which still remains in effect.

On the other hand, the negotiations with Argentina are considered by many as an opportunity for the United States to take over part of that country's trade heretofore going to European countries now at war. An agreement with the most progressive nation of South America, it is argued, would strengthen commercial ties with our southern neighbors to the mutual advantage of all countries in the Western Hemisphere.

This desire to extend American trade is, of course, wholly constructive. But it is not simply a problem of inducing Argentina to buy more American machinery, automobiles, and typewriters. The war has made it even more essential that we take a larger volume of South American products if we are to expand our markets in that region. And we must face the fact that most of what Argentina wishes to sell is competitive with the products of our own farms.

Obviously, this proposed agreement should be negotiated with full recognition of its direct bearing upon our domestic agricultural policy. As Senator CONNALLY pointed out to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, Congress appropriated $700,000,000 to aid farmers this year. Much of this money is used to compensate tillers of the soil for reducing the size of their crops. Federal funds have also been used to purchase surplus commodities and to pay export subsidies on wheat and cotton.

It would be a direct contradiction of policy for the administration to grant concessions on competitive agricultural imports while it is paying domestic farmers for not producing similar crops. So the Department of State faces the necessity of reconciling whatever concessions may be granted with the general farm policy of the Department of Agriculture. The whole theory behind the A. A. A. is that it will tend to bring agriculture into a more balanced relationship to industry. Unless that policy is to be abandoned, it would seem to preclude any extensive concessions at the expense of agriculture for the benefit of expanding industrial exports.

A consistent policy does not mean, of course, that no trade agreement with the Argentine can be negotiated. There are a number of products on which concessions can be granted without piling up new agricultural surpluses. The careful defense of domestic interests in all the trade agreements negotiated to date strongly suggests that the pact with Argentina will be similarly safeguarded. For that very reason, however, only moderate increases in our trade with the other American republics can be reasonably anticipated.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that all of us who are interested in the protection of agriculture take steps to prevent, if possible, the consummation of this treaty if it lowers the tariff on any competitive agricultural products.

My State has two major industries—agriculture and lumber—both of which are disastrously affected by the reciprocal-trade agreements. We are thrown in competition with lumber and forest products from Canada and other countries on an unfair competitive basis, due to the difference in wage scales and living conditions of the competitive countries. The pulp industry is a striking example of the way that the trade treaties are working out. America is becoming the dumping ground of cheap foreign competitive products which are undermining agriculture and the lumber industry. I believe it was a mistake for the Congress to authorize the consummation of these trade agreements without the advice and consent of the Senate. These so-called agreements are treaties and under the Constitution must have Senate sanction. We should restore this authority of the Senate and by so doing give an opportunity for any industry or section affected by a proposed treaty to have a voice in the writing of the treaty, as the representatives of every State will be thereby accorded the privilege of shaping the tariff policy.

In common with others I have introduced a resolution in the House providing that no foreign-trade agreement under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall become effective until it shall have the advice and consent of the Senate, as in other treaties.

The Argentine trade-agreement situation was discussed at some length by Mr. John W. White in a special cable to the New York Times, appearing in the Times October 22, 1939. There is much information in this article worthy of consideration in connection with the whole subject matter. I have taken the liberty, with the consent of the House, of including it in my remarks. It follows:

[From the New York Times of October 22, 1939]

ARGENTINA KEEPS CURB ON UNITED STATES' TRADE—FRANCE, NORWAY, BOHEMIA, AND MORAVIA ADDED TO LIST OF MOST-FAVORED NATIONS—TREATY STRATEGY IS SEEN—CONTINUED DISCRIMINATION HELD BARGAINING WEAPON FOR IMPENDING PARLEY

(By John W. White)

BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, October 21.—France, Norway, and Bohemia and Moravia were added this week to the list of countries with which Argentina maintains most-favored-nation trading relations. Although Bohemia and Moravia now form a part of Germany, Argentina continues to treat them separately.

These three countries were admitted to most-favored-nation preferred treatment without any ceremony and virtually no publicity beyond the issuance of three routine circulars by the Exchange Control Committee. The circulars are Nos. 525, 526, and 529 and are signed by the assistant director of the Exchange Control Committee.

UNITED STATES STILL IN THIRD GROUP

Argentina has classified the nations of the world into three categories for trading purposes. First, there is a list of 15 nations that receive most-favored-nation treatment—that is, they receive the same treatment as that accorded to Great Britain under the terms of the Roca-Runciman Treaty. This most-favored-nation group includes Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Bohemia and Moravia, Denmark, Greece, Holland, Norway, Spain, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay.

Ninety-five percent of the total import trade from these 15 countries is not restricted in any manner. Then there is a group of less-favored nations, composed of Belgium and Luxemburg, Finland, Iceland, southern Ireland, Poland, Sweden, and Switzerland. Imports from these countries are partly restricted by certain quotas which are not applicable to the first group.

Finally, there is a third group composed of the United States, Japan, and countries that are of no importance to Argentine trade. Less than 25 percent of the import trade from these countries is unrestricted. For instance, there are more than 200 groups of United States products that either cannot be imported under any circumstances or against which there are discriminatory quotas that are not applicable to other countries.

Certain concessions were made to Japan this week by the issuance of the Exchange Control Committee's circular, No. 527. This circular permits the entrance of two shiploads of miscellaneous Japanese merchandise, including large shipments of textiles. The circular also permits the entry into the country of all Japanese merchandise now in customs warehouses that arrived here without import licenses.

No such concessions have been made to the United States despite the trade-treaty negotiations. All United States merchandise arriving here without proper licenses must be shipped back to the United States within 2 or 3 weeks or the importers are heavily fined.

In the opinion of leading United States businessmen, this continued discrimination against the United States is incomprehensible unless it is being used as a bargaining weapon during the treaty negotiations. Argentina's argument that it must limit the importation of luxury goods to protect its balance-of-trade payments appears absurd in view of the fact that the importation of such luxury goods is unrestricted from 15 countries.

The United States has been Argentina's second-best customer for 30 years, only Great Britain buying more heavily. United States purchases in Argentina are round 60 percent greater than those from the third-best customer, Germany. Argentina's exports to the United States have been booming all this year.

The consulate general's official figures of Argentine exports to the United States for the first 9 months of this year show an increase of about 50 percent over the corresponding period of last year. The total at the end of September was $40,916,000, compared with $27,318,000 on the same date last year. Yet there has been no easing of restrictions against imports from the United States except on some raw materials and semimanufactured products essential to certain local and vocal industries.

Importation of American catalogs and price lists is prohibited under the embargo against printed matter. It was only recently, and as a result of an outcry by newspapers, that books and magazines were removed from the quota basis.

Success of the present trade-treaty negotiations depends on the ability of the American negotiators to persuade the Argentine Government to accord to United States imports absolute equality of treatment with imports from the 15 countries now on the most-favored-nation list. This would mean complete abandonment of the policy Argentina has maintained toward United States imports for several years. Whether this can be done remains to be seen.

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion, which is one of the great peacetime organizations, and of which I have the honor to be a member, takes a sound and very constructive position respecting our foreign policy in this grave period in our Nation's history. The men who compose the very large membership in this great organization are veterans of the World War, and they do not speak from hearsay upon the subject of war, but they speak from that experience which comes from their own participation in that conflict. These men speak soundly upon this very vital question because they know whereof they speak; they speak upon the subject of war in unmistakable terms because they know the tragedies of it and the suffering it involves; they do not want the American boys of today to encounter the hardships and the suffering which the veterans of the World War endured.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in and to make a part of my remarks the resolution adopted by the twenty-first national convention of the American Legion, held in Chicago this year. In passing may I urge each Member of the House to read and study this resolution, which enjoins the Congress to "preserve the peace, sovereignty, and dignity of our Nation." The resolution follows:

THE LEGION ON NEUTRALITY—RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY TWENTY-FIRST NATIONAL CONVENTION

Eight departmental resolutions on the subject of neutrality, widely divergent in character and content, were referred by the resolutions assignment committee to the convention foreign relations committee. Another resolution on the subject, offered by a member of the committee from the department of Delaware, was received and considered. The action and recommendation of this committee on the subject of neutrality is contained in the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted by this committee with all departments except one represented on the committee and present and voting; and for the purposes of this report this resolution is designated as resolution No. 3 of this convention committee:

"The American Legion views with gravest concern the apparently widespread belief that this Nation must inevitably become involved in the present European conflict. We not only believe that this Nation need not become involved, but insist and demand that the President of the United States and the Congress pursue a policy that, while preserving the sovereignty and dignity of this Nation will prevent involvement in this conflict. The American Legion is not a law body. It has often recommended to the Congress the enactment of legislation establishing a permanent or fixed policy on important national problems. The American Legion has always strenuously advocated that this Nation pursue a policy of neutrality and peace. In the present world crisis world conditions may change so rapidly that a pronouncement by the American Legion at this time on specific legislation might be wholly inadequate in the near future. Therefore, with full confidence in the President and the Congress, we demand that the Congress continue in session during the present grave crisis, and that appropriate action be taken to preserve the peace, sovereignty, and dignity of this Nation, and that our armed forces be expanded immediately to maintain our neutrality."

OF

HON. CHARLES I. FADDIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 23, 1939

POEM BY JOSEPH MILLS HANSON

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, during the past 20 years much propaganda has been spread for the purpose of discrediting the entrance of this Nation into the World War. Some of this came from those who wished to make political capital out of the matter; some of it came from those who were disappointed because we entered the war on what they believed to be the wrong side; some of it came from a few individuals who, much against their wills, were forced to discharge their obligations to bear arms in their Nation's cause; some of it came from professional busybodies who delight in belittling any of their Nation's activities; some of it came from those who are violently anti-British; some of it came from crackpots.

So much has been said on this subject that I am afraid many people have taken what has been said for granted and have never stopped to analyze the matter. There is much room for research and study on the subject, and I believe every individual should acquaint himself with the facts before passing judgment.

The fact of the matter is that the United States acquitted herself with great honor in all phases of the matter, and we have nothing at all to be ashamed of.

Below is a little poem which, to my mind, sets forth the truth of the matter as no prose can do.

THE FLAG ON EHRENBREITSTEIN

Between its crag-ribbed summits
And ruined castles gray,
Between its clambering vineyards
And orchards white with May,
The rushing Rhine rolls seaward
And, hard by Coblenz town,
A flag on Ehrenbreitstein
Upon that tide looks down.

Its stripes of white and crimson
Are blazoned forth on high;
Its starry field of azure
Seems part of God's own sky;
By winds that touched his eagles
When Caesar's legions came.
The flag on Ehrenbreitstein
Is fanned to rippling flame.

Below it in the city
The passing townsfolk stare
With eyes of smouldering anger
To see it waving there,
Where once the Prussian war lord
Gazed forth across the land
And dreamed the world lay conquered
Beneath his iron hand.

What make ye of that banner
Ye folk of Coblenz town?
What think ye of the field guns
That from the ramparts frown?
And know ye all the meaning
Of the blue and red and white
That waves from Ehrenbreitstein,
And read ye it aright?

St. George's cross is floating
O'er the spires of Cologne,
Above the roofs of Mayence
The Tricolor is flown;
But now between them flutters
Fair freedom's final sign—
The New World's starry banner
Above the German Rhine.

Because ye dreamed that terror
Could stay the arm of right;
That steel was more than honor,
And justice less than might,
Our strong-limbed western legions
Have put your hosts to rout
And set on Ehrenbreitstein
The flag ye dared to flout.

We have not brought that banner
Through storms of gas and lead,
Through your shell-swept leagues of trenches
That are mounded with our dead
For a tinsel hour of triumph
Above the ancient Rhine,
But to leave you for the future
A warning and a sign.

Ye may bask you in your legends
Of Nibelungen lore;
Of the mighty sword of Siegfried
And the hammer strokes of Thor;
But drink no more the potion
Of gods and supermen,
Or the flag on Ehrenbreitstein
Will cross the seas again.

For the lands that through the decades
Have borne your threats and sneers,
And brooked your clanking armor
And the rattle of your spears
Now guard earth's peace and freedom
With Columbia's steel-blue lance
Beside the English broadsword
And the rapier of France.

We take no meed of vengeance—
Nor gold nor gear nor crust;
Ye dared us to the combat
And we stretched you in the dust.
But touch no more our sister
Whose lord ye hoped to be,
And goad no more our brother
Of the islands of the sea.

Of your creed of blood and iron
The world has had surcease;
Mankind is overweary
To walk its way in peace.
Lift up your eyes, ye people;
Mark well that high-flung sign—
The flag on Ehrenbreitstein

I Propose True Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

Monday, October 23, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in these days, while the powers that be are beating the tom-toms to raise the martial spirit of a population that wants peace, let me add these few remarks to an article that appeared in the Washington Daily News, Friday, October 20, 1939, page 5:

Section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, gives Congress "the power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

To this quotation I shall add an excerpt from article I, section 8, paragraph 1:

The Congress shall have the power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes * * * for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States.

We now have the full meaning of the power, and the objective of this power, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States. The words "for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States" should be used in conjunction with all powers granted in section 8, and not forgotten in other legislation.

As to House Joint Resolution 306—the Neutrality Act of 1939—we may ask ourselves, Is this type of legislation for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States? Let us consider it section by section:

First (sec. 1a). To name states at war;

Second (sec. 2a). To tie our ships to the docks;

Third (sec. 2b). To fine our people, the citizens of the United States, $50,000 and imprisonment for 5 years for violations that are not definitely described;

Fourth. To operate under regulations set forth in section 2c, d, and e;

Fifth (sec. 2f). To allow transportation on or over lakes, rivers, and inland waters to nations engaged in war;

Sixth (sec. 2g). To exclude from war zones the whole area from longitude 0° west to 180° and from latitude 30° north to the South Pole;

Seventh (sec. 3b). To again fine our citizens for violation $50,000 or $10,000 and 5 years in jail;

Eighth (sec. 7a). To operate under such regulation as set forth in this section;

Ninth (sec. 7c). To again permit a fine of $50,000 or 5 years in jail against a citizen of the United States.

It is this sort of legislation that knocks the Bill of Rights into a cocked hat, for it destroys the rights which the people have reserved to themselves. We now have laws which, under the flimsy pretext of emergencies, restrict truthful expression in patriotic publications and at the same time allow dissemination of false propaganda in the kept press, which is owned or controlled by our enemies in the invisible government.

We have reached a sorry state, indeed, when Federal intelligence and justice units are employed to investigate patriotic citizens and publications that denounce the Bolshevik, the Socialist, and the Communists who are engaged in destruction of the Republic.

In order to revive memories of free government, I quote amendments 1 and 4, respectively:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.
> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Does anyone dare to say that these two articles have not been violated? I do not think so. We have suppression of truthful speech and patriotic publications. The right of assembly and of petition were denied to a group which came to Washington for that purpose. Businesses, as well as private citizens, have been subjected to illegal search and seizure, and it is now just about treasonable to tell the truth.

What has brought about this deplorable state? Nothing but too much law. The shifting, from Congress to the Executive, of the power to administer, to penalize, to imprison, and to appoint his own judges is the end of free government. Yes; the end of our glorious Republic.

I have said before, when Congress by law removes the people's rights one by one, it will have created, when the last is removed, a despotism. Do you wish to leave such heritage to our Nation's children, to your own sons and grandsons? That is what we do when more and more power is given to one individual. I say, what a miserable record to leave in the archives of Congress.

I shall now proceed with further discussion of the neutrality bill.

Tenth (sec. 9). To sponsor and give support to South American republics engaged in foreign wars. Is not this a little too much for us to guarantee, to fight the foreign wars of South American republics?

Eleventh (sec. 10a). To meddle in neutral shipping, forbid departure of neutral vessels or demand bonds or securities from foreign nations for their own merchant marine, and (c) prohibit departure of neutral ships during the war. Such interference with neutral shipping is an incident that might lead to war.

Twelfth (sec. 12a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i). To give the Federal Government this power of regulation of business and of our citizens, and to subject those who violate these regulations to a fine of $10,000 and 2 years in jail, is fraught with danger.

What is the answer to this unwarrantable power given to the Federal Government? Such delegation of power is not only unconstitutional, but can end in a dictatorship, destruction of the United States, and in persecution of the people.

Let me now repeat: Is it for the common defense and for the general welfare of the United States to allow these powers to an Executive and his appointees, or to the Federal Government? The answer is "No," for such delegation of power is unconstitutional and can only end in dictatorship, destruction of the Republic, and persecution of the people.

If we must have a Neutrality Act, let us formulate one that will provide neutrality. For example:

Section 1. Whenever the Peace of the United States is threatened by foreign wars, the President shall, to promote the security, preserve peace and to protect the lives of the citizens of the United States, issue a proclamation, giving notice that a state of war exists between foreign states.

Section 2. Whenever the President has issued a proclamation under section 1, it shall be unlawful to clear ships under American registry and to issue passports to American citizens to nations at war.

Section 3. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under authority of section 1, it shall be unlawful:

(a) To extend credit to nations at war.

(b) To purchase foreign securities or redeem United States securities with gold in the United States Treasury.

(c) To accept any kind of money except a gold dollar that contains 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or the equivalent in foreign gold money in payment for war materials sold to nations at war.

(d) Whoever shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or director thereof participating in the violation shall be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

Section 4. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under authority of section 1, he may from time to time declare an embargo on any part or production of all commodities manufactured or produced in the United States.

(b) American merchant ships must be marked distinctly and all belligerents notified of such markings. When proceeding to neutral nations in active war zones, arrangements for safe passage must be made with the blockading powers.

Section 5. American vessels trading with nations at war or American citizens traveling on belligerent ships in war zones, do so at their own risk.

Mr. Speaker, in this simple wording, I have tried to bring out a real neutrality act that we can enforce and which is in conformity with international law. It is, however, my desire to raise this point, that no changes must be made at this time in the embargo now in force, because it was in existence when war was declared and must for that reason remain so until peace is established by powers now at war.

I venture to say if this type of neutrality act is adopted, it will aid to bring about peace in Europe, for all belligerents will know that the United States will maintain strict neutrality. I shall now give my reasons for the statements I have made.

In this simple resolution, the object is the same as that of the Neutrality Act, namely, to promote the security, to preserve peace, and to protect the lives of the citizens of the United States. The difference is that it eliminates all the dangers and objectionable features in the Neutrality Act now under consideration. This act which I suggest also places the penalties where they rightfully belong, namely, on those who by subterfuge or otherwise create incidents for no other purpose except to align the United States in war with the powers they favor.

In section 2, it is a violation of the law to clear ships and issue passports to American citizens to nations at war. It is not, however, unlawful for other nations to charter our ships and sail such ships under their own flags wherever they please. It is, therefore, possible for our ships to carry cargoes under foreign charters at their own risk and to neutral nations under our own flag. Such arrangement will eliminate incidents which may lead to war. It is perfectly obvious and now so admitted by the State Department that we have no jurisdiction or more rights than other nations, outside of our 3-mile limit.

Section 3 makes it unlawful to extend credit to any nation at war, and makes it unlawful to sell contraband merchandise to nations at war for the gold certificates now held by interests outside of the United States Treasury or by the Governors of the Federal Reserve banks. It is also unlawful to sell contraband merchandise to nations at war for commodity money, bonds, securities, and other negotiable papers against the gold held in the United States Treasury. In other words, under this act, we can sell to all belligerent powers for gold which is earmarked or on storage in the United States or brought in grain bulk as cash, in payment for merchandise.

I may say at this point that if this section is enforced, peace will soon prevail, for it is the lust for gold and the power it gives that nourishes war.

Section 3 (d) levies fine and imprisonment where it rightfully belongs and where it can do the most good. If it were possible to fine the internationalists or the international financiers a million dollars apiece and imprison each of them for life, there would be no more war. This group comprises probably little over 300 individuals and it would be a blessing to the world and to humanity if they were rendered inert.

In secton 4 (a) permission is given for declaring embargo as we think best or in conformity with the embargo list issued by nations at war. We are, however, free to use our own judgment as to the merchandise we wish to sell or keep for ourselves.

In section 4 (b) other safety measures are set forth. First, our ships should be marked distinctly, so they will be recognized by all belligerents. Second, when our ships are bound to a neutral nation adjacent to a nation at war, arrangement for safe conduct to port of destination should be made with the blockading power.

Mr. Speaker, peace cannot prevail in the world as long as we have people who sell themselves for gold and greed, and we cannot aid peace by becoming partners in destruction of human life. The great mass, or the so-called common people, do not hate each other. They are not envious of each other, for they ask only for their right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Why must these people who are friendly at heart be led into destructive wars, which are for no other purpose except to enrich an international group that lives upon the earnings of others? If a sacrifice must be made, why not sacrifice the cause of this unrest, so that civilization may be preserved?

It is my firm opinion that if those now engaged in forcing the world into war do not desist from his ungodly venture, they will, before the war is over, be destroyed themselves.

LETTER FROM FRED R. ZIMMERMAN

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, Wisconsin is known throughout the country as a charming vacation land. Its hills and valleys, its rivers and lakes, its verdant rural serenity have pleased its thousands of visitors every year.

But to its citizens, living on the many farms in the State, Wisconsin is America's dairy land. Over 2,000,000 head of milk cows and heifers graze on Wisconsin's countryside.

Statistics concerning Wisconsin's production of dairy products will be found in the following letter which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal on September 30, 1939.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of September 30, 1939]

HERE YOU ARE, MOTORISTS

To the Journal:

"Give us the figures" was a headline in From the People, suggesting that the secretary of state gather important and correct pieces of information in regard to why Wisconsin is America's Dairyland, as advertised on the 1940 motor-license plate.

Here they are: 1. Of all the cheese made in the United States, Wisconsin produces 50 percent; of the Nation's American cheese, about 50 percent; of the national output of the brick and munster cheese, 91 percent; of the Nation's Swiss cheese, nearly 67 percent; of the national output of limburger cheese, 65½ percent; of the Nation's Italian cheese, 43 percent; of the cream cheese, 21 percent; of the Nation's creamery butter, 11½ percent; of all the condensery products made in the United States, 28 percent; of the Nation's unsweetened condensed and evaporated milk, nearly 33 percent; of the national output of sweetened condensed whole milk, nearly 13 percent; of the Nation's powdered skim and whole milk, 24½ percent; of the Nation's ice cream, 3⅓ percent.

2. The annual cheese production in Wisconsin totals around 324,300,000 pounds. Of this quantity, about 243,000,000 pounds are American, nearly 32,500,000 pounds brick and munster, about 27,700,000 pounds Swiss, over 9,000,000 pounds cream cheese, 5,300,000 pounds limburger, and almost 6,000,000 pounds Italian cheese. Wisconsin creamery butter production totals approximately 175,659,000 pounds annually. More than 865,000,000 pounds of condensery products are manufactured annually in this State.

3. More than 1,000,000,000 pounds of dairy products, valued at nearly $178,000,000, are manufactured in Wisconsin each year.

4. With a total of 2,157,000 head of milk cows and heifers, Wisconsin leads all other States in the number of milk cows.

5. Milk accounts for about 50 percent of the Wisconsin gross farm income.

6. Wisconsin has almost 2,000 cheese factories, about 500 creameries, 75 evaporated-milk plants, 450 ice-cream establishments, and 120 powdered-milk plants.

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, several times the past week there has been reference made to the strike now in progress at the Chrysler factory. At no time has anyone intimated that there is more than one side to the question, that of the company. A speaker simply made the statement that this was nothing but the work of members of the Communists that he claims are interfering with the rights of legitimate workers. People that are really thinking are not going to be willing to take that explanation of the cause of the difficulty. All will be interested in what the Washington Post has to say about it editorially:

[From the Washington Post]

LABOR HAS AN INTEREST

The dispute between the Chrysler Corporation and the United Automobile Workers' Union has produced a bewildering barrage of charges and countercharges.

The company maintains that employees have engaged in a "slow-down" under union instructions, causing serious disruption of production schedules and forcing suspension of operations in the main company plant. Union officials assert, on the other hand, that the company has engaged in "speed-up" methods and that it has fired men for inability to maintain the pace set for them.

Back of this controversy is an issue of major significance. That is whether representatives of the automobile workers shall have a voice in deciding what are reasonable production standards.

In a recent letter to Richard T. Frankensteen, representative of the union, Herman L. Weckler, vice president of the Chrysler Corporation, asserted that: "Production schedules are the management's function. You may as well know now that we do not intend to give your union control of production." However, representatives of the company have since expressed a willingness to consider grievances due to production standards.

Objectively viewed, it would appear that workers have at least as great an interest in determining the amount of work demanded of them within a given time as in the length of the working day or the rates of pay. Indeed, excessively high production standards may prove to be a much more injurious kind of labor exploitation than subnormal wages or excessively long hours. Moreover, employees frequently are much better able to judge the reasonableness of production requirements than is management.

In consenting to discuss production standards with representatives of its employees a company would, therefore, simply be expanding the scope of collective bargaining along rational lines. Such a policy would not entail any surrender of managerial functions. If, after discussion, production standards should be modified in accordance with workers' proposals, operations would be adjusted to meet the new conditions, just as they must be when working hours and wages change.

In a seasonal industry, such as automobile manufacturing, faced by annual changes in the models turned out, there is a great temptation to speed up operations unduly at certain times. That may or may not have been done in the present instance. The company denies it; the union affirms it. But neither company nor union is sufficiently disinterested to be given full credence.

In general, protection against speed-ups would be better assured if the workers themselves had a voice in determining production standards And management under such conditions could properly expect to be protected against slow-down tactics by employees who now complain that the pace is too swift for the endurance of the average worker.

The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of Highway Building

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT

OF OKLAHOMA

Friday, October 13, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, OF OKLAHOMA, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON ROADS, BEFORE THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF STATE HIGHWAY OFFICIALS, RICHMOND, VA., OCTOBER 10, 1939

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert a speech which I delivered before the American Association of State Highway Officials in Richmond, Va., October 10, 1939, which is as follows:

Mr. President, friends, and lovers of good roads, as soon as I learned from your efficient executive secretary, Mr. Markham, and others, of the plans being made for this celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the American Association of State Highway Officials, I felt that the Congress of the United States should be officially represented by a special congressional committee authorized to convey to the members of this association the appreciation of the Congress for your fine work and leadership in the field of highway development during the last quarter century.

So, on February 27, this year, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 10, providing for the establishment of such a committee, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, to attend this meeting and silver anniversary celebration and publicly express deserved recognition of the fine accomplishments of the State highway departments and the Public Roads Administration.

Much credit is due Hon. EUGENE B. CROWE, of Indiana, a member of the House Roads Committee, who, in my temporary absence on account of a leg injury, obtained consent for consideration of the resolution in the House and secured its unanimous adoption. I am glad that Mr. CROWE's sincere interest in roads and his very helpful activity and leadership in behalf of this resolution was recognized by your association officials who invited him to be a special guest at your convention.

Speaker BANKHEAD, on the part of the House, appointed Hon. LINDSAY C. WARREN, of North Carolina, the ranking majority member of the House Roads Committee; Hon. JAMES W. MOTT, of Oregon, minority member of the committee; and myself to serve on the committee for this meeting and present congratulations to the State highway departments for their wonderful accomplishments in road building.

I have the following communication from Mr. WARREN: "Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I have your letter about the breakfast at Washington and the convention at Richmond. It is with great regret that I must inform you that I will be unable to attend either, as I will be in North Carolina at that time." Congressman MOTT is present and you will hear from him when I have finished.

Vice President GARNER appointed the following Senators to serve on this special committee: Hon. CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona; Hon. HARRY FLOOD BYRD, of Virginia; and Hon. CHARLES W. TOBEY, of New Hampshire. Senators speak for themselves.

The committee is pleased to represent the Congress and to convey to the members of the American Association of State Highway Officials at this, your twenty-fifth annual meeting, an expression of public appreciation by the Congress for the splendid results which you have achieved in the vital development of our national highway transportation system.

It is not for us to tell you how many miles of roads have been built on the Federal-aid or State highway systems, nor to recite the demands for additional improvements. That is doubtless more evident to you than to us.

But we have, almost since the beginning of your organization, been in close touch with the road activities in the States. For many years the House of Representatives has maintained a Committee on Roads, whose duty it is to deal exclusively with this subject. Federal contributions toward a cooperative plan of road construction began modestly in 1916.

THE BANKHEADS

Here let us pause and pay tribute to the Honorable John Hollis Bankhead, father of our illustrious Speaker WILLIAM BANKHEAD and the present distinguished Senator BANKHEAD, who for years was a conspicuous leader in highway development in the Congress. Much credit is due him for his vision and activity.

CONSTRUCTIVE ASSISTANCE

Those who are familiar with the legislation of Congress covering this subject are fully aware that we are indebted to your organization for its constructive assistance in formulating needed legislation, and the unprejudiced information which you have so freely given us has been a most excellent guide.

NO CUTS

This is not the time to argue as to what the Federal obligations toward road construction must be. Naturally it must be based on interstate demands, but personally I feel that despite other calls made upon the Federal Treasury for worthy causes, we are making a grave mistake when we cut road appropriations below the modest and orderly planned amounts.

NO DIVERSIONS

The next session of the Congress will need to consider authorizations for another 2-year period. I feel sure the committee upon whose shoulders rest the responsibility to produce the needed legislation will, after reviewing with you the accomplishments of the past 2 years, present for consideration a bill to continue the work and certainly will not approve the diverting to any other purpose the funds secured by the Federal Treasury direct from the road users.

HIGHWAY NEEDS

Even the colorful plea of national defense does not merit reducing expenditures for these important highways, but rather it adds to the argument for increased appropriations.

You recognize that our present highway facilities fall drastically short of present-day requirements. On a national scale, traffic is expected to double within the next 25 years. It appears that there is immediate need to start construction of improvements on the 26,000-mile interregional primary highway system on which the President reported to the regular session of this Congress.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Now let us think in terms of national defense. In 1917–18 our highways could not cope with our transportation demands. Today our Army is mechanized. When we think of preparedness we must think of highways. Not only highway builders sense this need, but the War Department has stressed the inadequacy of our facilities. Highways should receive a substantial part of any national defense appropriations in Congress. Remember you cannot drive a car on a battleship.

On the subject of national defense, I don't think I can do better than to repeat what I said at your Dallas convention last year:

"Our highway system is a vital part of our national defense. Without good roads, under conditions of modern warfare, the United States would be seriously crippled in dealing with an enemy attack.

"There is no question that our defense will have to be a mobile defense in the future. Defense not only by guns on wheels to be placed at strategic points upon brief notice, but manpower on wheels to be transported whenever and wherever needed.

"The roads, first of all, will serve our everyday commercial needs, but no army and no navy can move without food and supplies. We must have roads to the farm where the food is produced and roads to the factories where the munitions and supplies are made. These, plus rapid means of transportation, will comprise the heart of successful national defense."

CONCLUSION

Your own members, who are best qualified from experience and duty, will give you at this convention a résumé of highway developments during the past quarter century and make definite suggestions as to your obligations as public officials in the future. It is therefore unnecessary for the committee to do more than to say that we rejoice with you in the attainments achieved and to give you assurance of our cooperation whenever possible in carrying forward this much-needed public service, so essential to the well-being of all our citizens.

Please pardon me for digressing but while the nations of Europe and the Orient are at each others throats in murderous combat, I think the course our Nation should take is fittingly expressed by this poem entitled "That's What Old Caesar Did":

"When Caesar took a westward ride
And grabbed the Gauls for Rome,
What was the first thing he did
To make them feel at home?
Did he increase the people's loans,
No! he dug in and built good roads—
That's what old Caesar did.

"He built good roads from hill to hill,
Good roads from vale to vale;
He ran a good-roads movement
Till Rome got all the kale.
He told the folks to buy a home,
Built roads their ruts to rid,
Until all the roads led to Rome.
That's what old Caesar did.

"And, if our Nation wants to be
The center of the map,
Where folks will want to settle down
And live in plenty's lap;
If this broad land its own abodes
Of poverty would rid,
Then let us plan and build good roads,
Just like old Caesar did!"

Oil From the Standpoint of National Legislation

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR.

OF MARYLAND

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR., OF MARYLAND, BEFORE THE INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, OCTOBER 20, 1939, AT FORT WORTH, TEX.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Independent Petroleum Association of America at its annual dinner, Friday, October 20, 1939, at Fort Worth, Tex.:

Enjoying the privilege and honor of representing nearly one-third of the population of the small but great State of Maryland in the National Congress for 12 years, and being born and reared in that State and closely identified with its development and fairly familiar with its history, I feel completely at home in the great State of Texas tonight, and especially in the congressional district represented so very ably by my good friend, the scholarly and popular Representative FRITZ LANHAM. Texas, like Maryland, is known as a sane, progressive, tolerant commonwealth, proud of its past, confident of its future, able to adequately manage its own affairs, and like Maryland it wants to be unmolested in doing just that.

I preface my remarks tonight in this introductory way, knowing the subject before me draws the fire of many citizens of Texas and other oil-producing States because of the threat it possesses, on the part of the Federal Government, to usurp what they consider to be privileges of the State. Furthermore, in the application of our basic law to the ever-recurring problems of the day, it has been my creed and gospel to prefer the path of principle to that of expediency, and to continually advocate that we put more business into government and more self-government into business. Aside from the dangers facing democracy through the development and growth of many despicable "isms" throughout the world—and to some extent within our own borders—we must speedily watch another threatening danger and reestablish within ourselves the determination to preserve the unique and simple system of Federal and State sovereignties with which our country began or suffer consequences highly repugnant to our basic concepts.

The philosophy I have mentioned means just what it implies, but it does not mean opposition to the necessary exercise of regulation by government in the public's interest. Just as we are determined that communism, Hitlerism, socialism, sovietism, shirts of various colors, and any other "isms" and new conceptions of government must not secure a foothold or a comfortable resting place here, so must we insist upon Government, State and National, staying where they belong. This does not mean that there shall be an unchangeable rule that the age of the wheelbarrow shall govern the age of the airplane. Industrial development, through expansion and conduct, compels the adoption of necessary regulatory measures at times.

At this time, in the midst of an important investigation of the petroleum industry, I am therefore mindful of the freedom from Government regulation, both State and National, which it must desire, but at the same time I am keenly aware of the break-down in some instances of the ability of this great industry to handle its own affairs and of the failure of some State agencies to likewise possess the essential regard for the general welfare of a nation of which such State is a part and of an industry the assets of which are an indispensable governmental requirement. Since I have been associated rather intimately with this problem, the foregoing has been the opinion of many of our leading statesmen, governmental officials, and in some instances prominent men identified with the industry. It has, at the same time, been challenged by an equally formidable group. The allegations, however, were of such force and persuasion that following the somewhat voluntary adherence by the industry as a whole to the code regime of 1933 and 1934, congressional action was recommended and seriously threatened.

It is easy, I am sure, for this great gathering to recall the 1934 session of Congress when a determined effort in both the Senate and House was being made for the Federal Government to take over virtually lock, stock, and barrel the petroleum industry and regulate it in every conceivable method. As an illustration I quote from a letter to Congress from President Roosevelt in the early part of his administration:

"My administration for many weeks has been in conference with the Governors of the oil-producing States and with component parts of the industry, but it seems difficult, if not impossible, to bring order out of chaos only by State action. In fact, this is recognized by most of the Governors concerned.

"There is a widespread demand for Federal legislation. May I request that this subject be given immediate attention by the appropriate committee or committees. The Secretary of the Interior stands ready to present any information or data desired."

It so happened that such legislation was referred to a committee of the House of Representatives, presided over by the distinguished Representative from the great State of Texas, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, now majority leader of the House and one of the great statesmen this State has given to our country. That legislation was the subject of hearings in May and June of 1934. I refer to H. R. 9676, introduced in the Seventy-third Congress by Representative DISNEY, of Oklahoma. A companion measure was introduced, as I recall, by Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma.

The proponents of the legislation, most of whom were from oil-producing States, were in dead earnest, and it looked as though a real fight was ahead for those opposing the measure, possibly a losing fight.

Following the results of these hearings, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, while in executive session, declined to report the bill, and in lieu thereof recommended to the House of Representatives that a thorough investigation of the petroleum problem be conducted. I think I am safe in saying, without divulging any of the proceedings of the executive sessions to which I have referred, that the threatened collapse of the entire petroleum industry, as vigorously advanced to us by representatives of the oil-producing States of this country, did more to influence the decision to which I have referred than any other single consideration.

I was designated by the main committee to introduce House Resolution 441 on June 15, 1934. This resolution inaugurated the petroleum investigation by a subcommittee of the House of Representatives, of which subcommittee I had the honor and privilege of being chairman. The other members of that committee were the Honorable Samuel B. Pettengill, of Indiana; the Honorable Edward A. Kelly, of Illinois; the Honorable Carl E. Mapes, of Michigan, and the Honorable Charles A. Wolverton, of New Jersey. Many times I have publicly expressed not only my deep affection for all of these splendid gentlemen, but my appreciation for the many hours of hard and tedious work which they put in during the recess months, as well as during the regular session of Congress, on this investigation.

The House resolution authorized and directed our committee to investigate as follows: (1) The production, importation, storage, transportation, refining, purchase, and sale of petroleum and its products for the purpose of determining whether there is an excessive supply of petroleum and its products; whether such excessive supply, if it exists, injuriously affects commerce in petroleum and its products and has the effect of rendering unprofitable the operation of wells of small but settled production and will cause their abandonment before the maximum economic yield is obtained; whether premature extraction of petroleum from natural resources, induced by absence of restrictions upon the quantity which may move in commerce, results in waste and inferior uses; whether restrictions should be placed upon the quantities of petroleum and its products which may move in commerce when an excessive supply exists, and if so, whether such restrictions should regulate and coordinate commerce in petroleum and its products among the several States and with foreign nations, with fair and equitable apportionment among the States and among different operators and sources of supply; and whether commerce in petroleum and its products is of such nature that it may be regarded as a unit for the purpose of establishing quotas irrespective of whether transactions are interstate or intrastate, or whether exportation or importation is involved; and (2) all other questions in relation to the subject of regulating commerce in petroleum and its products.

From a technical standpoint, through the assistance of personnel placed at the disposal of our committee by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, the hearings contain a lengthy and interesting study of the following subjects:

GEOLOGICAL SUMMARY

(1) Geological concepts, tracing history of knowledge regarding occurrence of petroleum, including movement of production centers from east to south and southwest. (2) Geological summary of Texas, Oklahoma, and California, with description of major fields in each State. (3) Geological summary of other States, with description of stripper well and minor flush areas. (4) Estimates of reserves in present proven areas, starting with earliest estimates and continuing to the present, with estimates from group of geologists. Method of calculation and probable accuracy. (5) Probable extent of oil supply which may be discovered in areas at present unproven, with estimates from geologists.

TECHNOLOGICAL SUMMARY

(1) How much oil is recovered and how has improved technology increased the recovery? (2) Changes in engineering views from the days when it was thought that oil flowed in underground rivers to the present concept of reservoir energy. (3) History of well spacing and the relationship between well spacing, energy utilization, and prevention of waste. (4) Methods of production and technical changes which have increased production, either through ability to drill deeper or recover larger proportion of oil.

SUMMARY OF DEMAND

(1) History of demand, with changes in characteristics and fundamental reasons for change. (2) Previous forecasts of demand. (3) Forecast of gasoline demand until 1950. (4) Forecast of probable crude-oil requirement to meet demand. (5) Forecast of probable changes in refining which will result. If, for example, gasoline demand by 1950 will double that of present, does this mean twice as much crude oil will be needed or will refineries of 1950 be able to produce twice as much motor fuel from crude as do the present plants? Hydrogenation and its economic status. Other substitutes. (6) Other demand factors, such as increasing efficiency of motors, habits of consumers, etc. (7) Probable future of oil burning, both domestic and industrial.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

(1) History of imports and exports. (a) Development of foreign resources by American companies. (b) Particular quality of imports, such as heavy crude for asphalt manufacture and fuel oil for ship bunkering, with decrease in imports of gasoline crudes and of gasoline. (c) Analysis of reasons for decline in exports. (d) Probable future trends in imports and exports.

CRUDE-OIL PRODUCTION COSTS

(1) A regional comparative study of total costs per barrel throughout the United States. Data by unit-areas in which costs are similar, due to similar geological structures, depths of producing sands, and age of fields, important factors in drilling and lifting costs. (2) Labor cost per barrel, covering total United States production. (3) Analysis of all costs relating to the production of crude oil. (4) Operating costs in stripper areas in Kansas, Illinois, and Pennsylvania.

INTERSTATE RELATIONSHIPS

(1) Review of interstate or interregional movement of crude petroleum and products from 1920 to date. (2) Operations under the petroleum code. (3) Well abandonments. (4) Table showing approximate proportion of petroleum which is shipped from major States to other States. (5) Data showing interrelationship between intrastate and interstate shipments. (6) Methods for determining required crude-oil production and its equitable allocation between States.

These gentlemen, then associated with the Government, did a fine job and our committee so acknowledged in its report to Congress. I shall refer later in my remarks to the personnel now working on similar subjects as part of the investigation we are conducting at this time.

In addition to the Thomas-Disney bill, which was the immediate cause for the investigation of 1934, our study uncovered still another measure, known as the Margold bill, found printed at pages 2416 to 2420 of the hearings. It deserved the place it finally and permanently occupied in the padlocked archives of dreams and hopes that some unseasoned brain trusters were willing to sponsor and but for the red light fortunately found at some intersections on Capitol Hill might have got somewhere.

Following the investigation of 1934, concrete recommendations were not made because we felt such should await the outcome of the Panama-Amazon cases then pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, the full report of the National Resources Board, which was then being written, and the result of the Governors' conference on an interstate compact.

In the committee's report of January 1935 are found the following statements, which might be accepted as general conclusions by the committee at that time:

"The petroleum industry, the third largest in the country, represents an investment, based upon present-day values, of more than $12,000,000,000. No argument is needed to establish reasons for the interest of the National Government in the future development and in the operations of many of the present-day activities in the petroleum industry.

"We recommend, therefore, that any legislation establishing permanently the interest of the Federal Government in the petroleum industry should provide for an agency, commission, or board, as it might be designated to absorb some of the activities in various departments of the Federal Government as now constituted. The Bureau of Mines might very easily be revamped for the purpose.

"The subcommittee feels that such an agency should have sufficient personnel and authority to study continuously the status of the petroleum reserves; encourage discoveries of new pools; assist in improving present-day methods of production; study the possibility and expense of repressuring in various existing fields; systemmatically determine the total demand for petroleum and its products, both domestic and foreign; have jurisdiction over the management of oil-producing public and Indian lands; be given jurisdiction to establish pipe-line rates, unless the Interstate Commerce Commission is given greater appropriation to handle more expeditiously this subject now before it; and to study and make report as to the advisability of divorcing pipe lines; recommend at regular intervals to the President of the United States—the President being given authority by Congress to approve—limitations upon the importation of petroleum and its products, including natural asphalt, so as to prevent importation thereof from interfering with current domestic production by supplying an undue proportion of the domestic consumption and export demand therefor; to represent the Federal Government, if need be, in any cooperative interstate compact, agreed upon and approved by the Congress; and, in general, to possess all other necessary authority so as to present that dignity, from a national standpoint, to which the subcommittee believes the petroleum industry is entitled."

Following this report, practically all oil legislation other than that dealing with taxation has passed through our committee. In February of 1935 the original Connally Act was passed; August 1935, the first Interstate Oil Compact was approved. In 1935 President Roosevelt desired some new and more substantial legislation which, from a Federal standpoint, would deal with the petroleum industry. The President invited me to the White House and requested that my subcommittee, known as the Cole committee, formulate a concrete bill embodying the views of the subcommittee on the subject and let him have it for study and consideration. This we did, and after careful perusal of the bill by the President, a conference was called at the White House in which Members of the Senate, of the House, Secretary Ickes, and other participated. The President approved the measure and asked that it be introduced in both branches of Congress. I refer to H. R. 9053 of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The Connally Act of 1935 was reenacted on June 14, 1937, to remain effective until June 30, 1939.

Under date of August 10, 1937, the Interstate Oil Compact was extended for a period of 2 years, expiring September 1, 1939.

On June 29, 1939, Congress again extended the Connally Act for a period of 3 years, the expiration date of the said act to be June 30, 1942.

On July 20, 1939, Congress extended the Interstate Compact for a period of 2 years, expiring September 1, 1941.

As a group or individually, members of the committee have visited nearly all of the States in which oil is produced. We have seen the veteran pumping wells of the Appalachian region and have traveled lengthwise and crosswise throughout the gigantic east Texas field in which, at the time of our visit, there remained visible evidence of attempts to produce oil in violation of the orders of the Railroad Commission of Texas. By way of contrast, we have seen the Conroe field, with its planned development and judicious control of reservoir pressures, and the competitive operations in the Oklahoma City area. We have been at Burbank, on the land of the Osage Nation, and have seen new producing methods applied immediately in the shadow of the old. We were in the Texas Panhandle when a billion cubic feet of natural gas was being blown daily into the air. We have visited the fields of the Los Angeles Basin and, recently, I supplemented my California information by visiting Kettleman Hills and some of the coastal fields.

We have talked with many who are engaged actively in the business of producing oil and with most of the State officials who administer the oil and gas conservation laws. During the course of our original inquiry and the two subsequent hearings on the extension of the Connally law, we have come to know the viewpoint of the executive branch of the Federal Government as it relates to the conservation of oil and gas, as well as of those in the industry and in the State offices.

Many of the foregoing experiences were enjoyed by the committee prior to the actual taking of testimony. At the very outset, appreciating the little knowledge we possessed on this important subject at the time I was asked to preside over such important committee, I concluded along with my associates to witness the practical side of the problem before starting to talk about it.

It was but our duty to do this. At the same time I mention it here because it tended to furnish our committee with a greater realization of the magnitude of the problem before us.

In his appearances before our committee Secretary Ickes has recommended consistently the establishment of a permanent policy of oil conservation. The background of support which he has given to this recommendation may be well known to all of you, but a brief summary thereof may be of interest at this time. When Secretary Ickes testified before our committee on April 27, 1937, he said:

"The oil reserves of the United States are limited and oil is an irreplaceable resource. Petroleum and its products are essential to our happiness and well-being as citizens and absolutely indispensable to our national defense. The United States is using up its oil reserves faster than the rest of the world, and an oil shortage in the United States may be expected long before there is an oil shortage elsewhere. As a nation we should not exhaust these resources and be forced to depend upon the more costly substitute fuels in advance of the rest of the world or be required to pay the higher price for oil which foreign producers will demand when our production fails to meet our needs. If we are to avoid this penalty for our past and present extravagance, we should make certain that our present and future reserves of oil will be developed without waste and that our supply of this irreplaceable resource will be made to meet, so long as possible and at reasonable prices, the needs of the Nation."

What I have just read is a restatement of what Secretary Ickes had said at greater length to our committee at its first hearing in September 1934, and, in substance, what he again said when he addressed your association in Houston on October 15, 1937.

Our committee was in substantial accord with that viewpoint. In the report which we presented to the Congress at the conclusion of our hearings nearly 5 years ago we said:

"Statistics of production are also statistics of exhaustion. No one knows how much petroleum there is underground in America. We take the broad position that whether our petroleum supplies are large or small, they should not be physically wasted above or below the ground. Cheap and abundant fuel and power are the very cornerstone of American industry, transportation, and business."

I think there is full recognition and appreciation of the fundamental truth of these statements. Recent figures show that the United States produces 61 percent of the world's oil, while the most favorable estimates credit the United States with less than half of the world's oil reserves. Accurate information on foreign oil reserves is not readily available, but as additional discoveries are made abroad, such as have been reported recently in Colombia, northeastern Venezuela, and in the Persian Gulf area, the relative standing of the United States oil reserves is being progressively lowered.

I recall only one witness before our committee who has been unwilling to support conservation. Some have qualified their viewpoint by saying they favored true conservation. However, when our committee has asked to have conditions in the oil industry interpreted in the light of the witnesses' support of conservation, wide variances in opinion have been encountered. One witness may say that physical waste is to be deplored and then limit his definition of physical waste so as to include nothing but the evaporation losses which might result from lack of storage or from improper handling of oil above ground. Such a witness eliminates any consideration of underground waste. If all the oil which is produced is used, he would say there is no physical waste. Another witness may include the results of inefficient well completion in his definition of physical waste but eliminate or neglect to mention physical waste as related to the operation of a producing well. Some may regard the production of oil in excess of current demand as the most likely source of waste. Others, including those who have testified for the Federal departments, hold that the definition of physical waste should include any avoidable method or practice which, to an unreasonable degree, leaves underground quantities of oil which, through the use of proper methods, could be produced for beneficial use.

In thus reciting some of the differences in viewpoint as to conservation and physical waste, I do not imply that the committee has favored one as against another or that it has formulated any separate opinion of its own. Our committee recognizes that there are distinct differences of opinion on this point, just as there are between wide and close spacing in drilling and between open and retarded flow in production.

It seems that avoidable physical waste still occurs in oil production, and that wasteful practices are to be found in some States which have enacted conservation laws and in some States which do not have such laws. Your association apparently has knowledge of producing conditions which are physically wasteful, as your supply-and-demand survey and forecast which was presented at the Austin meeting of the Interstate Oil Compact Commission on March 15, 1939, contains the following statement:

"There are still some producers of crude petroleum in some of the oil-producing States who are producing oil from wells in such large quantities as to create underground physical waste to the detriment of the industry, the States in which this is occurring, and to the Nation. These conditions can probably only be eliminated in the States that do not have conservation laws, by the enactment and enforcement of adequate conservation laws. Where these conditions exist in States having conservation laws they can be eliminated in most cases through the cooperation of the producers themselves, and in all cases probably by proper enforcement of the conservation laws."

In recent hearings before the T. N. E. C. in Washington, a witness cited Rodessa, La., and Fitts, Okla., as fields which have been poorly controlled. You will recall that it was in the Rodessa field that at least a half billion cubic feet of gas was being blown into the air and burned wastefully each 24 hours when the present Louisiana law was approved in July 1936, and that, in the Fitts pool, reservoir pressures dropped 1,000 pounds in about 800 days, with most of it occurring after the 1935 revision of the Oklahoma conservation law.

New Mexico may have had some difficulty in regulating gas-oil ratios, as the State geologist stated on July 22, 1938, that the majority of the operators had not taken the matter seriously in the past and unless every possible measure was taken to correct high gas-oil ratios, the commission would be forced to adopt a maximum gas-oil ratio for the various fields in that State.

Our committee has been particularly interested in the east Texas field, first, because its reserves form a substantial part of our national source of supply; and, second, because it is recognized generally that the manner in which its reservoir pressure has been regulated during the past 6 years will lead ultimately to a material increase in oil recovery. Through charts which have been shown to our committee we have noted the immediate response in reservoir pressure to an increase or decrease in the permitted rate of flow. We have been acquainted with that field since our visit there in 1934. Earlier this month the present proration order was attacked and the supplemental complaint filed by the plaintiff in civil action No. 31, in a proceeding entitled "Humble Oil Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas et al., defendant," in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas, Austin division, states that the east Texas field cannot produce oil allowable, plus the water withdrawn concurrently, without causing a "great amount of physical waste" and a rapid decline in reservoir pressures, quoting from the bill of complaint, and continued withdrawals at the rate of 600,000 barrels per day, or at any rate materially in excess of 500,000 barrels per day, will cause a rapid decline in reservoir pressures and will result in physical waste, for the reasons stated in paragraph IV (9) of the complaint. The excessive withdrawals of oil and water under proration orders of September 11 and 29 have caused and will cause physical waste which will reduce the ultimate recovery of oil from the field * * *." I quote from the pleadings in this important litigation solely for the purpose of showing how, within the industry itself, present practices even in the State of Texas are said to result in waste and not personally to take sides in the controversy one way or the other.

In the forthcoming hearings we will devote much of our time to a thorough study of any evidence which may be presented to us as to the prevalencc of physical waste in oil production in the United States. We shall be glad to have your association, the individual members thereof, and others tell us of the presence or absence of physical waste in oil operations.

While our efforts were not controlling in that accomplishment, our committee gave considerable encouragement to the oil-producing States in the formation of the interstate compact to conserve oil and gas. The compact, as originally presented to the Congress and on two subsequent occasions for extension, was limited specifically to conserving oil and gas by the prevention of physical waste from any cause, and expressly declared that its purpose was not to authorize the member States to limit the production of oil or gas so as to stabilize or fix prices.

Since its establishment more than 4 years ago the Interstate Oil Compact Commission has held regular quarterly meetings. On August 15, 1939, a special meeting of the commission was called. Promptly after that meeting the regulatory authorities of five oil-producing States—Oklahoma, Kansas, New Mexico, Arkansas, and Louisiana—did as Texas had done on the preceding day, ordered the shut-down of oil production in their respective States for a period which covered approximately the last 2 weeks of August. As a result crude-oil production in the United States was reduced by nearly 2,000,000 barrels daily and 30,000,000 barrels of crude oil were taken out of storage.

In his telegram to the Governors of Illinois and Louisiana, the chairman of the compact commission said that this special meeting was called "on account of the drastic cut in the price of oil which seems to be unwarranted as stocks of all oils are at a 12-year low and demand is at an all-time peak." This telegram was read into the record at the oil hearings before the T. N. E. C. in Washington. The compact commission chairman was asked whether a meeting called because of a cut in the price of crude oil and to deal with the situation caused by that cut is a meeting called for purposes which legitimately fall within the purview of the compact. The answer was that such action was within the limits of the compact if it would "save the lives of 200,000 stripper wells." During the course of the inquiry other possible reasons for the shut-down were suggested, such as the need to build up reservoir pressure in the east Texas field, and to protect 50,000 stripper wells in Texas with production costs of $1 per barrel.

When this special meeting of the compact commission was concluded, its chairman is reported to have said (I quote from the Oil and Gas Journal, August 17, 1939, p. 23):

"The sovereign oil-producing States are capable of handling their oil-conservation problems. We firmly believe they will promptly and properly control the production of oil within their own States. We feel it will be done with certainty and in a manner that will get results. Each State will handle its own problem in its own way, subject only to the laws of the particular State. We reiterate that State sovereignty will not permit encroachment upon its exclusive police power.

"Under the authority granted us by the legislatures of our States and under the consent of Congress we have exchanged our experiences and have thoroughly discussed ways and means of conserving oil and gas in our own States and each State will take such action as it sees fit, each State making its own announcement."

Obviously our committee does not yet have sufficient information to warrant any conclusion as to this recent action of the Compact Commission, but it is a matter of real concern. The member States of the compact, plus the two others which also shut down production, produce about three-fourths of our crude oil; but the other States, those which have no voice in the compact, consume three-fourths of our gasoline. A serious situation would arise if the Compact Commission, which is authorized only to prevent physical waste, should prove to be a medium through which State authorities representing the bulk of our crude-oil output may, whenever they feel conditions call for it, completely stop the production of crude oil and jeopardize the interests of those who consume petroleum products, and if it is to such an agreement that the Congress of the United States has consented.

The committee also may find itself interested in oil operations on lands owned by the United States. Four years have passed since the Congress authorized the Secretary of the Interior to require the submission of unit plans when public lands were to be leased for the production of oil and gas. Sufficient time may now have elapsed to permit of some valuation of the merits of these plans and whether they are effective in promoting an increased recovery of oil. The committee may be interested in learning if and to what extent operations on properties offsetting the Government units may be affecting the Government's interest as a landowner or proprietor. As to such lands, as well as Indian and naval petroleum reserve properties, it might be pertinent to the pending legislation to inquire into the operating regulations to determine if the prevention of waste on Government lands is keeping pace with technological advances of the oil industry.

In other inquiries the committee has given considerable thought to the organization of the various agencies of the Federal Government which are directly concerned with oil. The bill which was drafted by our committee in 1935 provided for the coordination of Federal oil activities within the agency which was proposed under that measure. Some members of our committee felt that a new agency, compatible with the national importance of the petroleum industry, should be established, while others were of the opinion that an existing agency should be employed. In our report of May 14, 1937, our committee stated that the bill recommended in 1935, with the exception of the recommendation for a new agency, might well be considered as a permanent policy of the Government dealing with the oil industry.

It is to be expected that our committee will review the organization of the oil activities of the Federal Government. We may inquire into the relationships which exist between the Federal agencies and the State regulatory commissions. It is approximately correct to say that the oil-producing States, in the aggregate, appropriate and expand for oil administration approximately the same amount annually as is appropriated and expended by the Federal Government for petroleum research and the administration of existing oil laws. It may be pertinent to our inquiry to know something of the value and the timeliness of Federal research on oil and if the results, when obtained, are being made available to State agencies and the industry without delay.

The critical period through which we are now passing will make it necessary and advisable for our committee to consider national defense in connection with the proposed Petroleum Conservation Act of 1939, known as H. R. 7372 of the Seventy-sixth Congress. The National Resources Committee report on energy resources and national policy states:

"The dependence on petroleum and its products of the Naval Establishment, of the increasingly mechanized Army Establishment, and of the air forces of the two services is so great that the national defense interest alone is sufficient to justify the Federal policy recommendations concerning conservation of this resource which have been outlined in a preceding section of this summary. It has been pointed out, however, that normal peacetime interests likewise make a compelling demand for a program of conservation. The Navy's interests and the Army's interests reinforce that general demand.

"Although the natural reserves of petroleum in the United States are estimated to exceed the proven reserves of any other country, the peacetime industrial demands upon these natural reserves are such that eventually rigid conservation measures will have to be adopted. In a national emergency, the estimated requirements of petroleum products for industry, for the Army and for the Navy exceed by nearly 25 percent the present peacetime production of crude petroleum."

Officers of the Army and Navy assisting with that report will be asked to elaborate thereon. There is a demand that we cover, if time will permit, some important phases of the oil problems from an international point of view. Whether that will be done and if so, to what extent, must await later decisions by our committee in view of conditions existing at the time. It will be of interest, however, in connection with this subject and because of the vital concern the problem embraces at this time to take my audience into the confidence of the committee and refer briefly to an important document now in my possession and which will, at a later date, become part of the proceedings before us. In discussing the naval petroleum reserves and the Navy's position with respect to the oil industry, the Navy Department, in an interesting and instructive statement, has left with me the following observations:

"The importance of petroleum and its products as necessities of modern warfare can no longer be denied and those departments of the Government charged with the defense of the United States must be assured of ample supplies of these vital materials if they are to be able at all times to carry out their missions. To this end the Navy Department is of the opinion that the petroleum resources of the United States must be conserved and the naval petroleum and other naval fuel reserves protected, as far as it is possible to do so, from depletion by operations conducted on both fee-owned and leased land within and without the reserves.

"While many petroleum technologists and economists assure us that the petroleum resources of the United States are ample, that there is no occasion for their conservation, and that there is no prospect of a shortage in the near future, it is my opinion that these so-called vast reserves of petroleum are largely dependent on much higher prices because of the greater development and production costs necessary to reduce the oil to possession. Due to the constantly increasing world demand for oil (over 2,000,000,000 barrels in 1937) the day when oil can be obtained in abundance, quickly, and cheaply from relatively shallow wells is rapidly drawing to a close, at least as far as the resources of the United States are concerned.

"Less than a decade ago few oil wells were producing from a greater depth than 5,000 feet and seldom were "wildcat" or prospect wells drilled more than two or three thousand feet before the "wildcatter" abandoned his well and moved on to explore elsewhere when he failed to find production. Today many wells are producing from depths between eight and ten thousand feet and one prospect well has been drilled to a depth of over 15,000 feet. The present indications are that prospecting for oil will, in the not distant future, even exceed that depth. It is not uncommon today for prospect wells, favorably located, to be carried to depths of over 10,000 feet at costs of hundreds of thousands of dollars as compared with the tens of thousands formerly felt to be justified in such work. These facts cannot be disputed and can only be explained by the acknowledgment on the part of the oil industry generally, that the regions where oil might be discovered at relatively shallow depths and at small expense have nearly all been explored.

"Naval petroleum reserve No. 1, in California, constitutes what is probably one of the few remaining large areas in the United States where, from comparatively shallow wells, it can be reasonably anticipated that, within a relatively short period of time, intensive drilling will develop a daily production of oil sufficient to meet a sudden national crisis. It is not improbable that some day the safety of the United States may depend on the oil remaining in this reserve and therefore it must be protected from further depletion and the Government's lands therein must be consolidated so that the largest possible area will be embraced in a single tract of land.

"With a large increase in the tonnage of the Navy, larger air forces in both the Army and Navy, and the tendency for complete mechanization of various Army units to increase their mobility and effectiveness, the necessity for the Government to possess adequate petroleum reserves in the ground becomes a constantly more important factor in the missions of the country's armed forces to provide properly for the defense of the Nation and its outlying possessions.

"The success of military operations at home and of naval operations at sea is becoming more and more dependent on having available for all requirements ample supplies of the best possible fuels—all of which are dependent on access to large reserves of petroleum. In wartime the facility and speed with which both the Army and Navy can maneuver will unquestionably determine the effectiveness of military and naval operations and will be dependent on an abundance of proper fuels for all purposes during the entire period of action. Any country attempting an aggressive war or fighting defensively, which has limited petroleum resources, against a foe having access to practically unlimited supplies of oil will be, even though it may possess some superiority in armaments, in the long run, up against a disadvantage almost impossible to overcome.

"Believing that the submerged lands off the California coast in the Pacific and off the coasts of Texas and Louisiana in the Gulf of Mexico probably would be found to contain oil deposits in addition to these already discovered, the Navy Department has given its full support to all proposed legislation which would enable it to secure such oil deposits as additional naval reserves but has strongly insisted that in such legislation all legal rights of others in such lands should be protected and that the controversial question as to whether minerals in submerged lands along our coasts are rightly the property of the Federal Government or the adjacent State should be determined by the courts.

"The American Petroleum Institute estimated the known petroleum reserves of the United States at 17,348,000,000 barrels as of January 1, 1939, or approximately 14 years' supply at the 1938 rate of producton, 1,277,000,000 barrels. This amount of oil, then, represents the Nation's present backlog, a quantity which tends to be augmented in years when discoveries exceed production and decreased when new discoveries fall below production.

"This backlog or producible reserve of oil has gradually accumulated over the past life of the industry as a result of many discoveries each year of relatively shallow (500–5,000 feet) producing areas capable of producing at a slowly diminishing rate over a relatively long period of time. Of late years, however, new discoveries of this type have fallen far below the annual rate of consumption of petroleum, and our reserves have been maintained and augmented by discoveries of deep-seated (5,000–15,000 feet) oil horizons, many of which have been found within or adjacent to the known shallower fields. What the life of production from these deep sands will be is not yet known, but it would seem to be beyond question that production from them will be progressively shorter lived with increasing depth. In my opinion, such deep production will add materially to the oil reserves of the United States but will not add at all to the life of the industry, as it is probable that all deep wells will have ceased production, due to higher operating costs before some of the shallower wells now producing have yielded the last of their recoverable oil.

"In the 20-year period since 1918, world production of petroleum has increased from 503,515,000 barrels in 1918 to 1,992,488,000 barrels in 1938, or approximately 300 percent, while production in the United States has increased in the same period from 355,928,000 barrels to 1,213,254,000 barrels, or 243 percent. The United States produced 70 percent of world production in 1918 but only 60.8 percent in 1938, a fact which would seem to indicate that the United States is slowly falling behind in its position and is therefore using up its oil reserves at a faster rate than other world reserves are diminishing.

"In 1918 the domestic demand for petroleum amounted to 387,760,000 barrels of the 503,515,000 barrels of world production, or 77 percent; in 1938 it amounted to 1,178,399,000 barrels of 1,992,488,000 barrels of world production, or a little less than 60 percent. In 1918 imports of petroleum exceeded exports by 31,852,000 barrels, but in 1938 exports of crude oil exceeded imports by 50,861,000 barrels, seeming to indicate that the world demand for petroleum outside the United States is just in its infancy and will probably increase much faster in the future than will domestic demand. It would seem, therefore, logical to expect exports of crude to continue to increase at the expense of domestic reserves—an unhealthy condition from the viewpoint of national defense. Of the 50,861,000 barrels of crude oil exported in excess of imports, 26,459,000 barrels, more than 50 percent, were exported from the Pacific coast, and represented production from the California fields. It has also been reported that stocks of California crude oil were increased some 6,741,000 barrels during 1938—which oil, together with the more than 26,000,000 barrels exported, amounted to 13.3 percent of California's 1938 production, 249,749,000 barrels. It would then seem that California's production last year could well have been decreased at least one-eighth to the advantage of both the State's petroleum industry and its reserves.

"During 1938 the United States produced approximately 60.8 percent of world oil production and 13.25 percent of the remaining 39 percent was produced in Mexico and South America, areas which in time of war would be dominated by a strong United States navy.

"At the present time the United States, Canada, and Mexico produce approximately 63.25 percent, South America 13.25 percent, Europe 13.68, and Asia and the East Indies 9.84 percent of world production.

"The importance of California oil in a region barren of other cheap natural fuels in connection with the State's commerce and industry, as well as its necessity for the needs of the Pacific Fleet, cannot be too strongly stressed. It is therefore essential that this resource, abundant though it may appear to be at present, must be made to last as long as possible. The conservation of California's oil supplies is deemed by the Navy Department to be of paramount importance in connection with the defense of the country's western border, Alaska, and its Pacific Ocean possessions. The Navy must therefore continue to support all measures taken which have for their purpose the conservation of the State's oil and gas resources to the end that the life of the industry in the State will be of maximum duration."

Many of you have read and perhaps studied the bill which our committee will consider. If you have, you will know that there is nothing in the measure to support recent allegations that a producer would have to go to Washington to procure a certificate of convenience and necessity before he could drill a well or that, if a State should produce more oil than was shown in the estimates of the Bureau of Mines, an administrator would step in and tell the State what it would have to do. Neither is there anything in the measure to support the thought that refining and marketing would be regulated. Those who say it would be necessary to run to Washington must have failed to note the specific provision that all hearings in connection with field investigations must be held in the Federal judicial district in which the field is located. I think it may be fairly said that each word in the measure is there for the single purpose of promoting the conservation of petroleum and cooperating with the States in preventing its waste.

Upon the completion of the difficult assignment now being handled by the employees of the Interior Department and others in revising part 2 of the Petroleum Investigation of 1934, these men being among the leading experts in their respective fields in the United States Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, the General Land Office, the Indian Affairs Bureau, and the Petroleum Division, the first public hearings before the committee will be held and at that time, the work done by the experts dealing with the technical phases of the problem will be filed for printing, in order to give the public an opportunity to see just what information the committee has on the subjects covered therein. Included among those testifying before the committee will be representatives of the Army and Navy and other interested governmental departments.

As I have previously stated, it is hoped that this initial testimony can be completed before the present special session of Congress ends, in which event the committee will, in the interim between adjournment and the 1st of January, visit as many fields as possible. This will not, I am sure, permit us to accept the many invitations and suggestions we have received from the various parts of the country to take testimony in their respective States. Some testimony may be taken during these inspection tours by the committee, but that has not been definitely decided by the committee. There will be no rush on the part of the committee to conclude this investigation by January 1, as the resolution does not require that, but it will be the purpose of the committee to conclude the testimony at as early a date as possible.

We shall expect the Federal governmental agencies, in their appearance in support of H. R. 7372, to be able to prove a prima facie case in support of the findings and declarations of policy embodied in the bill. Those findings, while not a part of the law itself, are of extreme importance. To give those who might want to question this statement an opportunity to do so, let me read section 2 of the proposed bill:

"(A) The Congress hereby finds that in the production and storage of petroleum from deposits situated within the United States the employment of methods and practices which are wasteful of petroleum and of the reservoir energy available for the recovery thereof from such deposits (1) is inimical to the maintenance of reserves of petroleum, and of the facilities for the recovery and transportation thereof, available for military and supporting civilian needs in an adequate national defense; (2) burdens and obstructs interstate commerce and causes harmful diversion of such commerce; (3) if not controlled, will further and increasingly burden and obstruct interstate commerce and will unduly limit the usefulness of instruments of transportation in and cause the abandonment of facilities for such commerce; (4) causes interstate commerce to be the means of encouraging such wasteful methods and practices; and (5) constitutes an unfair method of competition in interstate commerce.

"(B) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, through the exercise in this act of its power to provide for the maintenance of an adequate national defense and to regulate interstate commerce, to further the conservation of petroleum by the elimination of the wasteful methods and practices above referred to insofar as such methods and practices may be avoidable, and to encourage and assist the various States in their efforts to prevent the waste of petroleum."

Certainly there is nothing wrong with that statement. I presume all in this audience tonight can adopt it as a creed. The important problem, however, is the law that follows and which represents the Government's interpretation of what that declaration embodies. If the legislation, as the proponents state to me and as in reading it I am frank to say seems to be the case, simply means that if wasteful practices known to and admitted by everybody associated with this industry are permitted to exist and continue, with a flagrant disregard on the part of the industry and of the States as to their duties in the premises, that it then becomes the problem of the Federal Government. Such an encroachment—if it is an encroachment—upon the prerogatives of the States would seem to be justified. This legislation now and at all times in the future will be intended to assist the States and not usurp their duties. Some may not want any assistance. Some may not want the assistance embodied in the bill, but such assistance is apparently becoming one of primary need and importance and it will remain, I am sure, for the calmness and deliberate judgment of our committee and ultimately of Congress, following a complete investigation of the subject, to say to just what extent such is necessary at this time.

Colonel Thompson, a member of the Texas Railroad Commission, and chairman of the Interstate Oil Compact Commission, in a recent statement said: "It (referring to conservation) is simply an attempt on the part of the oil-producing States, acting through their conservation agencies, to see to it that we wisely apply the simple law of Nature, to the end that Nature will help us to produce and lift to the surface the greatest ultimate amount of petroleum. Nature helps us greatly if we will observe her laws. She takes terrific tolls if abused. This effort has been one to prevent every bit of physical waste that the application of sound engineering principles could achieve. It has taken a lot of patience. Really the old methods were so wasteful that looking back it seems almost criminal the way our oil resources were wasted, but it is no worse than was done with the forests and certainly it was not to be mentioned in the same breath with the prolific waste that we have experienced by our lack of conservation in the use of the soil of America, and when we examine the physical facts, conservation of the soil is as simple as the conservation of oil. We are just now getting around to it. I heard about a man who tried to sell a farmer a book, telling him how to farm twice as good. The farmer replied, 'I don't want to buy that book, I am not farming half as good as I know how now.' "

I approve the foregoing and submit it as an opening statement in the argument advanced by the proponents for the enactment by Congress at a reasonably early date of new legislation dealing with petroleum. H. R. 7372, which I introduced at the request of the present administration, is the bill before us at this time for consideration. At the request of President Roosevelt and of Secretary Ickes of the Interior Department, both of whom have always shown a keen personal and official interest in that status of our petroleum resources and the conduct of the petroleum industry, the proposed legislation was prepared, presumably through the collaboration of a number of interested departments.

A copy of the bill was left with me and at a later date, at the request of the President, a number of us met with President Roosevelt to discuss the entire situation. Along with Chairman LEA, who now serves with distinction in the position formerly held by Representative RAYBURN, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I attended that conference. I was asked to introduce the bill, notwithstanding the fact that it did not embody in every particular my views, nor was it in such form in my opinion as our committee would ultimately recommend—if they would recommend at all the reporting of any legislation. Preliminary to the introduction of the measure in question, President Roosevelt addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Chairman LEA, which speaks for itself. It is such an important document that I incorporate it at this point in full:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On February 15, 1939, I transmitted to the Congress a report on energy resources, by the National Resources Committee, wherein certain recommendations were made relative to oil and gas problems in the United States.

I believe it is consistent with these recommendations to invite the attention of your committee to the desirability of the early enactment of legislation which will provide a coordinated national policy in oil conservation. To my mind the legislation should be designed to prevent avoidable waste in the production of oil and gas in the United States.

As you know, despite the progress which has been made toward oil conservation under State law and regulation, the production of petroleum is attended by waste. In view of the vital part which petroleum plays in the national defense as well as its importance in commerce and industry, the prevention of waste in petroleum production should be the subject of an enactment by the Congress.

I appreciate the thoroughness with which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted the petroleum investigation in 1934 in response to House Resolution 441; but in the light of changes that have taken place I believe the committee may wish to study developments since that time by investigation and hearings prior to the next session of Congress. To this end, and with a view to the enactment of suitable legislation in the next session, I request that the petroleum conservation bill which I today discussed with you and Representative COLE be introduced at this session.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. CLARENCE F. LEA,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

Subsequently, as requested by the President, the entire Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce discussed the introduction of House Resolution 290, which was later passed by the House, calling for an investigation in line with the President's proposal. In lieu of the entire committee conducting the investigation, a subcommittee was appointed, of which I have the honor of again being chairman. I am happy to state the same personnel which served with me during the investigation of 1934 and 1935, with the exception of Representative PEARSON, of Tennessee, in place of former Representative Pettengill, constitute the subcommittee.

The resolution refers to H. R. 7372, making it incumbent, as I see it, upon the committee to give special consideration to this concrete proposal. At the same time the resolution is so broad in its scope and purpose that the committee can, and I am sure will, go far beyond the four corners of the legislation and, to the extent the funds available will permit, cover as fully as possible every item mentioned in the resolution.

The work of the committee as directed by the House resolution is broad in its scope. The authority is substantially the same as that given the committee in 1934 under House Resolution 441 of the Seventy-third Congress, except in addition to the 1934 resolution the committee is directed in the pending investigation—

"(b) To investigate the methods and practices employed in the production and storage of petroleum from deposits within the United States, for the purpose of determining whether such methods and practices are wasteful of petroleum and the reservoir energy available for recovery thereof from such deposits; whether the employment of such methods and practices is inimical to the maintenance of reserves of petroleum, and of the facilities for the recovery and transportation thereof, available for military and supporting civilian needs in an adequate national defense; and whether the employment of such methods and practices burdens and obstructs interstate commerce and unduly limits the usefulness of instruments of transportation in, and causes the abandonment of facilities for, such commerce; and to investigate any other matters bearing upon the practicability and abvisability of enacting legislation of the character of H. R. 7372, introduced on July 26, 1939; and

"(c) To investigate methods and practices employed in the production, transportation, and distribution of petroleum and its products for the purpose of determining whether such methods and practices, in or in relation to interstate commerce in petroleum and its products, constitute unfair methods and practices from the standpoint of their effect upon producers and consumers."

Our committee will be just as glad to hear those who may oppose the measure as from those who may favor it, but I believe the committee would be justified in asking that those who speak against or for the measure should first study its provisions. The president of your association is to be commended for the attitude which he outlined in the August issue of your monthly magazine in his statement, "Federal oil bill calls for industry's best thought." On our part, I promise you that the measure will receive the best thought of our committee.

We have recognized and have encouraged the right of the States to handle and control the production end of this industry. We have felt that the problem is not too big for the States if they sincerely want to solve it; at the same time the problem is not one which will tolerate abandonment or trifling by the States. The country as a whole has the right to demand that petroleum, a great God-given resource belonging as a whole to no State or individual but a natural national resource, must be conserved and must not be wasted.

EDITORIAL FROM THE MARINE NEWS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks and include therein a very timely editorial from the Marine News, published in New York in the interests of the shipping business:

[From the Marine News]

NO TIME TO SHOW THE YELLOW FEATHER

In 1812 we went to war to defend the freedom of the seas, and have defended that right continuously since then. Any proposed action now by Congress, or the administration, that would surrender that right must be defeated.

Nobody wants war, but if in order to avoid it we are to surrender our right to the use of the seas, and foreswear our foreign trade, then stop squandering money on building useless ships, and let the Maritime Commission build rowboats for the parks.

While there may be a difference of opinion as to what produces war, there can be no difference of opinion on the inalienable right of the American merchant marine, manned by American sailors to carry cargo to and from our shores and any port on the seven seas.

The freedom of the seas does not mean that American ships must be tied to the docks, must stay out of the war zone, or be rendered helpless while ships of other nations are permitted to sail where and when they please. On the contrary it does mean that a vessel may carry on ordinary commerce to and from any port where its owner or captain believes it should go.

The Marine News believes that Congress, in its present consideration of the Neutrality Act, will commit a fatal blunder if it in any way limits the field of operations of American-flag ships. In doing so it would surrender our blood-bought right. It would undo all that has been accomplished in the last few years in reestablishing our merchant marine. It would be compelled to reverse its own declaration of principle contained in the Merchant Marine Act, and it would drive American ships forever from the seas.

We do not believe that firm insistance on the freedom of the seas would produce war, neither do we believe that Congress or the administration should for any reason, even the avoidance of war, lower the American flag anywhere on the seven seas.

No time to show the yellow feather.

S. WILLSON RICHARDS.

The Menace of Bigotry

OF

HON. JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 23, 1939

SPEECH OF HON. JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following speech, which was recently made by me:

I speak to you today on the menace of bigotry. I shall be specific and direct my address to the particular "menace" that challenges everything I hold dear—philosophically, religiously, and patriotically. I refer to the resurgence of anti-Semitism.

Anti-Semitism—while an attack against the Jew—is in essence an attack on the personality of man—I use the term "man" in its generic sense—meaning thereby the whole human family. Unless we be heathens or unbelievers—and deny the existence of a Supreme Being, we all believe that man is created in the image and likeness of his Creator—God; that man has a spiritual personality, as well as his human personality, and that this spiritual personality is eternal.

The spiritual personality of man makes the whole of humanity akin, binding us all into one brotherhood under the fatherhood of God. This is the religious concept of the personality of man. There are other concepts, for instance, the concept of man as a product of economics is the essence of the philosophy of communism; the concept of man as a biological product, his destiny entirely determined by his racial chromosomes, is the essence of the philosophy of nazi-ism. If we follow the philosophical concept of man from the Communist or Nazi-ist point of view—or perhaps from both points of view—since Hitler and Stalin are today treaty brothers—we can understand prejudice, hatred, and discrimination, whether it be racial, religious, or national. However, if we profess the principles of deistic philosophy we may have no relation with prejudice, hatred, or discrimination. You cannot blow hot and cold together. You cannot proclaim the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man together with intolerance and prejudice.

They are not consistent and compatible one with the other; one of necessity denies the other. You cannot have both, no more than you may have God and Satan together. That is why, philosophically and religiously, I fear the menace of bigotry.

Persecution begets persecution; it cannot be otherwise. We, as Americans, must recognize and guard against the patent attempt to spread amongst us religious and racial hatreds. Bigotry acts much like a virulent drug which, once quaffed, grows an asses' head upon the befuddled individual, as in the story of Bottom, the weaver.

A great Irish statesman, and one of the world's immortal orators—Daniel O'Connell—defined bigotry as follows: "Bigotry has no head and cannot think, no heart and cannot feel. When she moves it is in wrath; when she pauses it is amid ruin. Her prayers are curses, her god is a demon, her communion is death, her vengeance is eternity, her decalogue is written in the blood of her victims; and if she stops for a moment in her infernal flight it is upon a kindred rock to whet her vulture fang for a more sanguinary desolation."

Discrimination against races, whether it takes the form of a petty or major persecution, must at all times meet with the condemnation of men of right instincts. There is a unity in humanity no matter how unconscious various individuals may be of its existence, and unless the aims of humanity take cognizance of this and proceed accordingly it will not be well for mankind.

In the calmer times preceding the days of gloom and anxiety through which we are passing men would generally commend racial tolerance as a desirable thing, as something due to the honor and justice that should prevail among civilized men. Today thinking people regard it as an indispensable condition of anything like well-being or progress. The World War was productive of numberless disasters which few could foresee in 1914, and among the greatest of these was the development of exaggerated racialism. Achievements were claimed for individual races which were the joint production of many. Civilization is a collective thing. Various races contribute to it, and its existence and maintenance depend on factors of various origins.

The ancient classical civilization furnished many factors even though these civilizations were based on slavery. The revelation of which the Jews were the custodians while contributing many new ideas of priceless worth, purified much that was tainted in paganism. The Jews insisted on a personal God who was brought close to them as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and thus they liberated men from the abject fear of blind fate and the machinations and terrors threatened by irresponsible and wayward deities. In this connection it is significant to note that the Jews, who were surrounded by powerful empires that despised them, survive, and their ancient enemies have vanished forever.

Christ came not to destroy, but to fulfill, and the suffrage which was the prerogative of the Jews was extended to all mankind through the commission given to the apostles to preach the Gospel to every creature. Nothing that was good in humanity was alien to Christianity, and the classics of ancient Greece and Rome were made part of the Christian's training. Just imagine what the Soviets and totalitarians would do to a literature in which many of their most cherished principles were assailed.

The Christian insistence on the dignity of the individual first mitigated the lot of the slave, and then gradually made men realize that slavery was incompatible with the Christian spirit. The racial intolerance that has been spreading with such feverish intensity promises destruction of the great benefits afforded mankind by the ideal and practice of Christian brotherhood, and the ruin of America would be involved in the cataclysm.

I also fear this menace nationally, for it is as opposite to true Americanism as darkness is the opposite to light. You cannot have anti-Semitism and Americanism together—one destroys the other; one is incompatible with the other; they cannot exist together.

One hundred and sixty-three years ago we won our independence and built a representative republican form of government upon the foundation of equality. This principle of equality we have steadfastly maintained as our "pearl of precious price." To our country came millions upon millions of peoples of other nations, who, harassed and persecuted at home, sought our shores for the fuller enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. These immigrants contributed to our country the best of their various cultures, with the result that, in spite of foreign carping critics and historical foretellers of doom, America arose from the debris and chaos of revolution, and later civil war, to world leadership, if leadership be judged from the viewpoint of the practical attainment of man's centuries of aspiration—political, religious, and social equality. The dream of Socrates, the hope and aspiration of Aristotle, became the full fruit of enjoyment in our beloved country.

We, as Americans, believe that man has an intrinsic dignity that must be respected by governments and rulers. We believe, too, that majorities are morally bound to respect the rights of minorities. After all, the most certain test by which we may judge if a country is really free is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities. We also recognize and believe there is a supreme or higher law binding upon all mankind. The whole history of mankind bears testimony to the ever-present struggle between liberty under divine authority or liberty under the state. Plato and Socrates—pagan though they were—had a nebulous idea of a supreme or higher law. Yet the Jews were the first, either as a people or a nation, to recognize and declare the supremacy of the divine law over the temporal power of the state. This divine law embraces the principles of love and charity. With these principles dominant in the heart and mind of men there can be no intolerance.

Unity and harmony among men are the crying needs of our time. Unity and tolerance walk hand in hand with religion. We have seen in the instance of Russia how tragic is the effort to promote unity without God. Death for apostasy in Russia is almost as frequent as martyrdom among the early Christians for constancy. The intolerance of Hitler would, in the long run, prove as disastrous as the intolerance of Stalin.

America, though far removed from the European scene, will participate in European disintegration unless it safeguards the virtues that made our Nation great, and among these none is more essential than the tolerance which we advocate. Our sense of tolerance is founded upon our national principle of equality and justice for all. These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guide our steps through an age of revolution and reformation.

Many misguided and sinister persons are striving to destroy this principle and to promote racial discontent in America. There are already such signs of cleavage among our citizens as would have been thought impossible a few years ago. So that it is not an exaggeration to state that even the most optimistic among us no longer feel that our national stability is something indestructible.

May hate, intolerance, and prejudice cease to play a part in our national life, and may God's greatest political gift to the world—the United States of America—be cherished and promoted by our people forever.

"Then let Fame's banner be unfurled,
Sing paeans for a victory won."

Patriotism of the National Small Business Men's Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. McLEOD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RESOLUTIONS OF THE NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, as an American, believing in our principles of real freedom and democracy, I have, I believe, through my many years as a Member of this body, by act and deed, proved my sincerity.

I have kept foremost in mind as my creed that to remain great the United States of America must never relinquish its Godlike principles of protection of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness for its people.

Therefore, in conformity with my beliefs and policy of rendering the most good for our people, I recommend, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Representatives seriously consider the resolutions recently adopted at the second national convention of the National Small Business Men's Association.

It is most timely and opportune that I present to you now—today—before this special session of Congress acts on the embargo question and before appropriation bills are prepared for the regular session in January, this strictly American policy and program.

In national convention assembled this patriotic and effective organization, representing the backbone and builders of the community, took a firm, unanimous, and active stand against the subversive influences that are steadily gnawing at the very vitals of our great American traditions.

These resolutions, I believe, will awaken in all our people a determination to hold fast to the fundamental principles which have been the prime factors in making this country the strongest and greatest democracy on earth.

The following are the resolutions:

PREAMBLE

America's danger comes from within rather than from without. The continued safety of free American institutions is more gravely threatened by incursion of subversive foreign doctrines, than by danger of our involvement in foreign wars. We emphasize the particular value of a steadfast adherence to the simple virtue of loyalty to our American Constitution and our American principles of individual free enterprise.

In troubled times the insidious strategy of crafty ambition magnifies real perils and even invents "red herrings" to serve its own selfish end. We warn against the dangers of too easy acceptance of published opinion, no matter how high the source from which it emanates. We remind ourselves that the highest qualities of restraint must be displayed by government as well as by private interests.

We view the European conflict with horror but it is not of our doing, and we must not take sides nor participate in its bloodshed.

As businessmen we want no share of profits from war, and urge that America shall continue in the paths of peace, strong in the faith and tradition of its past, and confident of its ability to lead the world onward to the goal of greater security and happiness desired by all mankind. By pursuing this road America best serves not only itself but the entire world.

The preservation of our democratic Government is dependent upon the active, intelligent use of the ballot. An alert citizenry must be on constant guard in its own household.

RESOLUTION I

In the belief that this association in convention assembled is without sufficient facts or knowledge upon which to base a sound judgment as to the action the Congress of the United States should take in regard to the neutrality and embargo proposals now pending before it, but convinced that this country should not become enmeshed in any foreign entanglements—

(1) It is resolved that the President and Congress of the United States should at all times so act as to keep us out of war and preserve and guarantee the peace of the United States; that the people of this country will not tolerate any action which would result in the sending of American youth to fight on foreign soil.

(2) That all officials and employees of the Government be required to refrain from making any unauthorized public statements which might be construed as partisan or as an unfriendly act to any foreign government.

(3) That all employees of the Federal and State Governments, irrespective of their positions, whose past conduct, utterances, or affiliations indicate a leaning toward communism, nazi-ism, or other ideologies that are at variance with American principles of government be forthwith dismissed and their positions filled by loyal citizens who believe in and will support at all times our form of government and American institutions.

RESOLUTION II

(1) Resolved, That this association publicly commends the activities of the Dies Committee investigating un-American activities and urges Congress to provide it with adequate finances to insure its continuance.

(2) We recommend a strict enforcement of the naturalization laws. Aliens within our Nation who desire the privileges of participating in our Government should be refused citizenship and its attendant right to vote until the proper authorities are doubly satisfied that as citizens they not only understand but will support our free institutions with the undivided respect and devotion which their application for citizenship implies.

(3) That the administration take immediate steps to clean its own house of those whose undivided loyalty to American principles is open to challenge.

(3–a) That this association sponsor a program to awaken the citizens of the country to the need for constant alertness in the selection of public servants; that our members in all cities give close attention to their local municipal affairs and participate actively in the selection of local officials and representatives and exercise their right to vote.

That we sponsor a program to bring about in grade and high schools, colleges, and universities to the establishment of public forums to inform our people on the great economic and social questions essential to a full understanding of present-day progress; that we now examine all systems of education supported in whole or in part by public funds and cause to be eliminated therefrom all subversive teachings and textbooks and dismiss such of the personnel as may teach or advocate theories of government at variance with our American ideologies.

That we seek and provide authentic information on questions of public interest to our members and governmental representatives.

(4) There is no social philosophy which has ever demonstrated its ability to provide common prosperity and happiness for its people in any degree that approaches the American standard of life. We, therefore, reaffirm our belief that the American system of free individual enterprise with the profit incentive is superior to any other social and economic philosophy.

RESOLUTION III. TAXES AND ECONOMY

Too great a proportion of the national income goes into taxes. To make a greater part of this income available for production purposes the cost of Federal, State, and local government must be reduced. The present high rate of taxation decreases production out of which taxes are paid, discourages initiative, freezes capital, increases idle labor, and diminishes the total of tax revenues.

National need and ability of the people to pay, rather than demands of politicians and special interests should govern the tax total.

Those who administer government should end its hostility to business, reaffirm the profit incentive, and provide for an early balancing of the Federal Budget.

Living within its income is just as sound and necessary for Government as for private business.

Wholesale employment on Government projects and vast increases of Federal bureaus and commissions has proved costly and has retarded recovery, which will be speedily stimulated when the country discontinues these experiments that we cannot afford to maintain.

Confidence among businessmen is the first essential to recovery.

We favor direct taxes and broadening the income-tax base as a means of awakening public opinion to the importance of this subject.

We condemn the inconsistency of local groups who advocate Federal economy in the abstract, at the same time using pressure to obtain Federal grants for local projects.

We favor a study of the Federal tax problem by a nonpolitical committee to be created by Congress.

RESOLUTION 4. GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS

The centralization of control over business has put the Government into direct competition with private capital and initiative in particular in (1) housing, (2) public-utility power and light, (3) capital financing, both long and short, (4) and agriculture.

These are not proper functions of Government. Government operations, undertaken by an administration quick to seize upon the necessities of a temporary emergency, should be liquidated progressively in all four of the above fields of enterprise and returned to private business where they belong. In the words of our last year's statement of objectives, "The Government should cooperate and not compete."

RESOLUTION 5

We oppose use of national credit for subsidizing insolvent business. We believe that there is no demand for legitimate bank credit which our banks are not eager to meet. Adequate private funds for the capital requirements of small business and for new enterprise would be immediately available if the present tax structure were altered to permit their normal employment without penalty; if the rulings of the bank examining authorities were liberalized to permit the free exercise of experienced banking judgment.

RESOLUTION 6

In line with our stated objective of last year that Congress should repeal all laws under which congressional powers have been delegated to other bodies, we note with satisfaction the recent tendency of Congress to assert itself and resume control over appropriations and appointments instead of issuing blank checks.

Maintenance of our national defense is a big business requiring our most able men in its coordination and direction. They should be selected for their fitness and ability, regardless of party affiliation, and they should be free from dictation or interference from nonresponsible political bureaucrats.

RESOLUTION 7. LABOR RELATIONS

Resolved, That we stand for the restoration and the preservation of the constitutional rights of all citizens * * * the right equally of the worker to work and of the employer to employ, without being subjected to intimidation, coercion, or domination by the leaders of organized groups, and with the full protection at all times of duly constituted civil authorities—local, State, and national.

We recognize the right of workers to organize for the protection and advancement, within the law, of their own individual and group interests and we have no quarrel with labor unionism as such, but we are opposed to the closed shop to the extent that in principle it infringes upon constitutional rights, both of employer and employee, and in practice leads to conditions not conducive to advancement of the interests, well-being, and prosperity of any group, or of any community, or of the Nation.

We recognize collective bargaining by workers as an established fact; while we accept it in principle we deplore its widespread misuse in practice by many labor leaders, by the United States Department of Labor, and especially by the National Labor Relations Board. We hold that employers have the same right of organization and collective bargaining as employees, and that the eventual solution of our so-called industrial problem lies in the voluntary and friendly negotiation of agreements fair to both, with equal responsibility, legally established, on both sides, and fair also to the public, always a third party in interest.

We deplore and condemn that policy of Congress which permits employment of Governmental agencies obviously and flagrantly in the interest of special groups, and in utter disregard of the constitutional rights of the overwhelming majority of American working men and women, of business and industry and of all other citizens not the beneficiaries of this abuse of governmental functions and responsibilities.

We deplore and condemn the present trend toward constantly greater centralization of power in a few hands or in the hands of any one man, and the assumption of ever-increasing control over the lives and liberties of our citizens, workers, farmers, and businessmen alike, and very particularly the unconstitutional delegation of dictatorial powers to appointive bodies and the abuse of those powers by officials not chosen by popular suffrage and apparently accountable to no one but themselves.

We approve governmental intervention in the natural operation of economic laws under our American system of free enterprise only to the extent that it protects all economic groups, individually and collectively, against practices repugnant to the American sense of fair play and common decency and detrimental to national progress, prosperity, and unity. We are opposed unalterably to governmental dictatorship over business, industry, labor, and agriculture as distinguished from fair and reasonable Government regulation.

The preamble of the National Labor Relations Act, commonly known as the Wagner Act, passed 3 years ago, declares its purpose to be "to reduce industrial strife * * *." The record shows that industrial strife almost immediately reached an all-time high and has remained abnormally high; that the administration of this law has cost millions in direct Government expense, has cost industry and business more millions to defend themselves, and has cost the employees themselves most of all through lost wages and increased cost of the things they buy.

Therefore, in the interest of steady and increased employment, higher annual wages, reduction of taxation, the elimination of industrial strife, and the resumption of the march of American progress, we advocate and urge repeal of the National Labor Relations Act, and the enactment of a Labor Relations Act that will reflect fundamental American principles and be fair to employer, employee, and the public at large.

Achievements of the Republican Minority in the Seventy-sixth Congress

OF

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ADDRESS BY HON. CHESTER H. GROSS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, SEPTEMBER 28, 1939

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following synopsis of an address which I delivered on September 28, 1939, at Chambersburg, Pa.:

Speaking before the Chambersburg Republican Club, Congressman CHESTER H. GROSS briefly set forth the achievements of the Republican minority in the recent session. He denied the statement of the President that the Republicans and certain Democrats formed a coalition to block the objectives of the New Deal, but claimed that the support given the Republican leadership by the economy-minded Democrats was nothing more nor less than a spontaneous response to a mighty wave of disapproval arising all over the country against the reckless expenditure of public funds. Under the splendid leadership of Congressman JOSEPH W. MARTIN, floor leader of the House, Congress turned back a proposal to raise the national debt limit above $45,000,000,000, and rejected the $3,800,000,000 spend-lend program which sought to evade the limitation upon the national debt, and once more forbade additional expenditures on the crackpot Florida ship canal.

Under the same aggressive leadership the House and the Senate turned back the administration's attempt to involve America in European politics, and voted vast sums for national defense on land, sea, and air at home.

Likewise tax revision measures have been forced, which will no doubt be extended in the next session, that are going to be of tremendous help to industry in this country in the next year or two.

Social Security was revamped, and the funds now, instead of being dumped into the Federal Treasury to be used for everything except Social Security, will go into a trust fund and will finally find their way to those for whom it was intended. They likewise froze pay-roll tax at the present rate and saved industry and labor hundreds of millions of dollars in the next 3 years. By this wise handling of these funds it will be possible to make upward of one and a half million more people beneficiaries to Social Security.

They have forced audit systems to be established that will keep the taxpayers informed of actual governmental costs in the future, as well as in some degree limited subsidized Government competition with private enterprises.

We have exposed and partially reformed the vicious political manipulation of W. P. A. work relief by the New Deal racketeers.

Overrode militant opposition and passed the Hatch bill, which will compel certain men in high public office from using political pressure in elections.

We have enacted legislation dealing with aliens, Communists, and Fascists within our country.

We have amended the Government reorganization bill and sustained the time-tested constitutional principle of checks and balances, thereby eliminating many of the dangerous powers of dictatorship.

We have forced an investigation of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings of which without a doubt will be as shocking as was the investigation of the W. P. A.

We have forced congressional inquiry into the damage caused to American industry and agriculture by the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements.

The Republican resolution requiring 10 percent cut or savings on all departmental appropriations was received by the administration with only a jeer.

The seventh New Deal deficit on July 1 carried the national debt to the limit allowed by law. New appropriations for the fiscal year 1940 aggregate almost $13,000,000,000 or three times the annual Republican average of the previous decade.

The harmony that prevailed and the solidity of the Republican side of the House threw constant fear into the forces of the New Deal.

NEUTRALITY

The present neutrality law in the face of present world conditions contains many inequalities that will work badly for both the United States and foreign governments. Under the present law American ships will be permitted to enter combat zones, which creates a terrific hazard. Under the present law they can sell munitions to Japan who is waging a ruthless war on China, simply because they have not declared war, while at the same time it forbids us from selling to other countries who have declared war. It also permits this country to sell to Italy who in turn may turn the materials over to Germany, while we cannot sell to our next door neighbor, Canada, whether we would or not.

I believe that the Neutrality Act can be amended and that we can maintain much of our world trade without getting into the war. I believe we owe it to American labor and industry to maintain as much of our foreign trade as possible. Since many of these belligerent countries owe us vast sums of money, which they are never going to pay, I believe that the cash-and-carry program would help us to get back much of the money they owe us and maintain business at a standard in this country that we sorely need.

I shall be very careful in voting for mandatory legislation that it does not give anyone in executive position added powers. I well understand that the Congress could pass the burden of responsibility now resting upon it by giving these powers to the President, and I believe that these powers which the Constitution of the United States places squarely upon the Congress should be retained by that body.

No nation is justified in going to war simply because a ship has been sunk or flag shot at. We only need to stop and think of the World War to come to that conclusion. It cost 10,000,000 lives—20,000,000 broken bodies—spent or mortgaged half of the wealth of the western world. And there is no yardstick adequate to measure the human tragedies never revealed.

I believe if we approach these problems calmly and think and act deliberately we can save our democracy without getting into the war. At the same time we must not overlook the enemies we have within our gates.

I am amazed that the Government of the United States permits communistic propaganda to be handed out and sold by the ton by the Russian Government on the New York World's Fair ground. I have carefully scrutinized their material and find it boasting of the fact that they have eliminated all property holders in Russia, and in all their literature they make no mention or reference to churches of any kind.

The Dies' committee reports there are over 2,800 recognized communists in public office in the Federal Government. I cannot understand why the United States Government should even permit anyone to express his love for any "ism" in America at this time, and much less to tolerate them in public office. I trust the present Congress will take some very definite steps to clean up America now before getting too enthusiastic about pulling someone else's chestnuts out of the fire. I am sure that if we finally do have to get into the war we can go into it much stronger if we have our own house in order.

From the information I gather from the mail I receive, I believe the sentiment in the country now is crystallizing in favor of the cash-and-carry plan as presented by the President. I believe that under this plan the dangers of becoming entangled in the war would be very much less and at the same time it would be better for our country economically.

This one thing I want definitely understood—that my actions in the weeks that lie ahead, on the neutrality question, will not be dominated by partisan politics. I intend to place my Americanism above partisanship when the welfare of the country and the happiness of our people are at stake.

The Repeal of the Embargo Clause of the Neutrality Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN KEE, OF WEST VIRGINIA, OCTOBER 21, 1939

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address delivered by me over the Red Network of the National Broadcasting Co., from Station WRC, in Washington, D. C., on Saturday, October 21, 1939, at 7 o'clock p. m.:

Ladies and gentlemen, as a native-born citizen of the United States, having at heart the best interests of my country, and as a Member of Congress, I am in accord with the proposal now pending before the Congress to repeal the embargo clause in the so-called Neutrality Act.

In my judgment the statement frequently, carelessly, and often deliberately made that a repeal of the embargo provision would get us into war, or will even be a step in that direction, is not supported by reason and is not the conclusion of intelligent thought. There can be no basis for the conclusion that our repeal of an unneutral act would have a greater tendency to drag us into international conflict than would our retention of this act upon our statutes. The embargo was an unfortunate experiment and an error. It was in derogation of international law and reversed a policy this Nation had followed for a century and a quarter. Its repeal will be to correct a grievous mistake.

Daily the advocates of so-called strict neutrality and those who argue the loudest against the repeal of the embargo, point to the Netherlands and the Scandinavian countries as shining examples for us to follow. It is loudly declaimed: "These countries stayed out of the last war, why can't we follow their lead and stay out of this one?" Very well, we can follow them only by a repeal of the embargo. It is true that Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, all stayed out of the World War—all were neutral. Not one of these States, however, embargoed either sales or shipments to belligerent countries. None of them even had a neutrality statute such as ours and certainly no similar embargo clause. Trade was carried from their shores during the war under the rules of international law. Shipments were even permitted in vessels of their own nationals. So, where do these countries fit into the argument of the antirepealists?

The bill now pending before Congress and as reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations will not permit us to go so far in the matter of shipping as did the neutral countries of Europe. It will not permit shipments to be made in American vessels. It will permit the ships of all countries to come to our ports, pay cash for our commodities, take title to the goods purchased, and carry these goods away in their own ships and at their own risk.

No one has yet pointed out just why and how this policy can possibly lead us into war. The mere statement that it will do so is not enough. Such an argument is mere dicta without proof. The self-evident truth is that the embargo clause in the present law is an aid to Germany and to all other nations engaged in aggressive acts. These nations were fully prepared in advance for the undertaking in which they are now engaged.

The fact that the embargo provision in our statutes is an aid to Germany cannot be disputed. On June 27 last, during the debate in the House of Representatives upon the neutrality measure, I made upon the floor this statement: "If we fail to repeal this embargo, our action will be celebrated upon the streets of Berlin." On the day following the passage of the bill with the so-called Vorys amendment—the amendment providing a mandatory embargo against all sales and shipments of arms and ammunition to belligerent nations—the news dispatches from abroad reported that the Nazis were holding in Berlin an enthusiastic celebration of this action of Congress. Thus, while supporters of the embargo clause were here joyously congratulating each other upon a political victory, the followers of Hitler, with equal joy, were in Berlin hailing the fact that the United States Government, the greatest democracy in the world, had again written for Adolf Hitler a blank check to be filled in at the expense of the defenseless nations of Europe.

It cannot be said that the embargo provision was reinstated in the pending Neutrality Act by the House of Representatives either blindly, innocently, or without a full understanding that it would be of aid to Germany and the aggressor powers of Europe. The Members were fully advised of the vital importance to Hitler of a refusal upon our part to permit the unprepared and unready nations of the world to secure arms necessary for their defense against their total destruction or their absorption by the nation which had, in advance, fully prepared itself to accomplish this purpose. By the same provision in the present law we had already given to Hitler a free hand in Czechoslovakia. We had told him to go ahead and take the country, and we would see to it that no help could possibly be secured from us for the unhappy people he had marked for destruction. Hopeless and helpless, these people surrendered to the inevitable. Today their government is no more, their national independence is destroyed; their individual liberty is but a memory.

The operation and effect of the embargo was clearly demonstrated by each new event in Europe, where Hitler, smug and satisfied with the policy we had adopted, was taking everything he coveted without any fear of resistance. And yet with all these facts before us, a majority of the House deliberately wrote into the pending measure a continuance of the embargo. Came then the celebration in Berlin. Came then the march of the Hitler forces into Poland. Came then the sound of guns heralding the beginning of a great war.

Let us mark this: The guns that opened this war did not come from America. They are German guns. They bear the label "Made in Germany." They were made there for the very purpose for which they are being used—to carry on an offensive against weaker nations. And Germany can continue to make them. Our embargo will never silence those guns. If it serves any purpose whatever, it will but serve to make impossible any defense upon the part of the unfortunate people against whom the "Made in Germany" guns are directed.

We may perhaps never know to what extent the actions of Adolf Hitler were influenced by the failure of the American Congress to repeal the embargo. The fact that such failure was celebrated in Germany and greeted there with cheers certainly stamps the embargo with German approval. It was definite notice to Hitler that the nations against which he contemplated aggressive action could not hope to secure any means of defense from the great United States of America. It was a "go ahead" signal which the dictator must have appreciated. Whether or not he would have gone ahead without the signal we do not know. To my mind, however, the events following our action, or lack of action, at the last session place a heavy burden upon the collective conscience of those who so blithely assumed that responsibility.

It is my firm conviction that had Congress at the last session promptly passed the neutrality measure as it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with its repeal of the embargo clause, that action would have given Adolf Hitler pause. It may indeed have been an effectual deterrent. Certainly there would have passed before the dictator the mental picture of a great nation of 130,000,000 people, with productive fields and farms, with unlimited natural resources, with skilled artisans and workers, with great mills and factories, with every facility to fabricate even better things than those labeled "Made in Germany." And with this there would have appeared a companion picture—one showing the sea lanes leading to our open ports and above these ports the sign, "Come and get it." With this picture before—this picture of an open door of promise to the weaker nations of the world—who shall say that Adolf Hitler would not have hesitated before turning his "made-in-Germany" guns upon Poland.

But the embargo clause was not repealed. Gentlemen whose sources of information were, they said, much more reliable than those available to the President, told us there would be no war. What happened is now history. Regardless of our optimistic self-assurance, Germany acted. Today Poland is conquered and dismembered. Her cities and towns have been destroyed and her people slaughtered. The stark forms of her countless dead bear silent witness to the brutal and horrible threat that hovers over the world like a dread shadow. The territory of a once free and independent nation has been carved at the table of international banditry. And now the gentlemen who were so well informed tell us that this is water over the dam and it is therefore too late for us to revise our policy. They voice the assertion that it will be unneutral for us to repeal an unneutral and indefensible act. Their position is the impossible one that our mistake is a fact accomplished and cannot be remedied.

The aggressor nations of the world have not yet reached the goal of their ambitions. Their greed for conquest has not been satisfied, their appetite for dominion has not been satiated, their dreams of power have not been fully realized. Not yet can Adolf Hitler, like Alexander, weep because there are no other worlds to conquer. Not yet can Mussolini order a Roman triumph and wear a Caesar's laurels before his legions. Not yet can the militaristic power behind the Japanese throne report to their sacred Mikado a world remade to their hearts' desire. Not yet can Stalin assure his own timid soul that the world has been purged of all those who dare the treason of independent thought. There are still functioning in this war-torn world a few governments based upon a conception of human rights—governments which do not consider individuals mere pawns upon the chessboard of life. There are still governments with peoples who are yet nurturing and fostering the ideals of democracy. There are still left in this world, organized into national units, peoples who yet retain an unshaken faith in a just and an all-wise God. These are the lands, the people, the worlds that the Hitlers, the Stalins, the Mussolinis, and their like must take in their stride, must subdue, must conquer, must bring under the lash and within the shackles of their brute force or else witness the collapse of the empires they have already builded.

This fight is on now, and no one knows how long it will continue. We do know that unless the dictators are crushed the world must expect to be ruled by brute force alone. So far our own country is not in this fight, and we do not want to get in it. No citizen of this country wants war. As we stand on the sidelines, however, we do know that if this war results in the downfall of the dictators, if the democracies win a victory over nazi-ism and communism, then you and I and our children and their children will through all the future years thank God for that victory.

The world is today facing its greatest crisis. Is there any sound reason why, while humanity's fate trembles in the balance, the United States Government should, through an embargo against the sale of commodities, continue to lend its aid to the forces of evil? Let us write this unneutral act off our statute books. Let us forbid, not the sale of our commodities, but their carriage on American ships through zones of danger.

Let us keep our country neutral—neutral without cowardice, neutral without skulking behind the doors of expediency, neutral according to the precedent we followed since the founding of our Government, neutral without deliberately and knowingly lending our aid to Nazis and Communists in their war to impose the rule of brute force upon mankind.

Domestic Problems Should Have Attention of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, this special session of Congress was convened on September 21, and we have been in session ever since that date. It is true that proposed amendments to our present neutrality law have had the consideration of Congress. It is equally true that no other legislation has been considered by any of the committees. When the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress adjourned on August 5, 1939, there were many domestic problems which were awaiting the attention of the administration and of the Congress controlled by it. Those problems were vital and important. Upon their solution depend the welfare of America. One of those problems was the matter of unemployment. On August 5 last, several million men and women were unemployed in the United States. They had a right to expect that the administration would do something to help them solve their difficulties.

The new World War started on September 1, 1939, and since that date the attention of people generally has been directed toward Europe, and the administration has apparently failed to give thought to the problem of the unemployed at home. I believe a mistake has been made in insisting that only neutrality legislation should be taken up and considered now. I have before me a recent Associated Press dispatch, stating that there are 5,000,000 homeless boys, jobless American youths wandering about the country today. Government agencies are doing something to meet this problem, but to date the program has been wholly inadequate. Legislation should be studied which will in some measure help to keep open the field of opportunity for these young men and thereby make it possible for them to secure some kind of employment. It is the duty of the administration to submit a program to Congress along these lines.

In this connection, I have another dispatch which quotes Col. Francis C. Harrington, Work Projects Administrator, as saying that even the alleged possibility of a European war will not take care of the millions of people who are unemployed. I am talking now about adults and not about the homeless boys of this land. There is going around in our midst frequent statements that this country must mix into the European war in order to give jobs for unemployed. As Colonel Harrington points out, leaving out the ethics of such argument, there is no basis for the claim that the European war will take care of our unemployed problem. It is a domestic problem. A Government program should be initiated which will encourage private industry to open the factories and the mills and to make it possible to increase the number of those who are able to get jobs. Let no one be deceived. The basis of any real prosperity in this country cannot be based on the tragedy of a war across the ocean. This is one reason why, Mr. Speaker, that Congress should stay in session and the Government should consider legislation along these lines.

The National Health Program

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, OF NEW YORK, OCTOBER 23, 1939

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, while democracy has made a marked retreat during the last quarter of a century in the Old World, in this country it has made a distinct advance. I know of no more effective manner of combating the dangerous ideologies of Europe than by strengthening the ramparts of democracy at home. A national health program will have a tremendous effect in fortifying the essential faith of the American people in the processes of democracy. The distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] delivered a valuable address on this subject on a broadcast over a Nation-wide hook-up of the National Broadcasting Co. during the national radio forum of the Washington Star on Monday night, October 23, 1939. I ask unanimous consent to have this address printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, in addressing you tonight on an important domestic issue, I am mindful that your thoughts are centered for the most part on happenings abroad. The course of events on European battle fronts holds for all of us a morbid fascination, born of horror that such things can be in a civilized age, born of fear that the flames of war may somehow leap the ocean barrier.

In this crisis the President, the Congress, and all the American people are motivated by a single thought and a single objective—to keep this Nation in the path of peace. No appearance of temporary advantage, no ties of sympathy or wiles of propaganda must weaken that peaceful purpose. America's destiny will be fulfilled not by becoming party to the deep-seated rivalries of Europe but by fostering life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness right here at home.

At a time of world upheaval many Americans are concerned about the possible invasion of this continent by philosophies of government alien to our own. To discourage and, if necessary, to repel any armed aggression from without we have built mighty defenses on land and sea and in the air. These defenses must and will be further strengthened. But our citadel of democracy cannot be defended by force of arms alone. The danger of alien encroachment is not lessened if in building up our armaments we neglect to watch on other ramparts. If under the stress of the European war we allow intolerance or subversive movements to spread their contagion in our midst, if we relax our protection of civil liberties, if we permit our social gains to be impaired or their further growth to be arrested, then American democracy will, indeed, have been conquered—conquered without firing a shot. Against any such surrender to the enemy within our gates the American people must redouble their eternal vigilance.

About a year ago, when the morale of the democratic world was at a very low ebb, I stressed a lesson from history which I think it appropriate to recall in the present hour:

"The fatal weakness of a despotic government is internal, just as the enduring strength of a free people lies within themselves. No autocrat has ever had enough armies to protect him in the long run against the resurgence of the human spirit in his own country. No democratic government has ever declined unless it was first undermined from within by a denial of the equality and freedom of opportunity upon which democracy rests."

All our efforts in the last 6 years have been devoted to projecting that ideal of equality and freedom of opportunity into every phase of our economic life. For that reason the steady retreat of democracy overseas has been paralleled by the steady advance of democracy in the New World all about us. New weapons of air power and sea power have been reinforced by the awakened strength of a free people.

And so today, amid the strife and confusion of the Old World, the ramparts we watch must embrace all the instruments for economic and human adjustment we have so recently and so carefully forged—labor standards and market standards; soil, forest, and water conservation; slum clearance; unemployment insurance; security in old age. The protection and advancement of these instruments are as essential to our democratic life as the safety of our geographical frontiers.

None of these economic problems which have engaged our earnest attention in the years since 1933 was created by the great depression. All of them were in some measure part of the price we pay for the material benefits of a machine age. All of them had been aggravated by long neglect. And in each instance our task was to substitute systematic safeguards for haphazard relief, to find ways of preventing the underlying causes rather than dealing with the results after they had gotten out of hand.

A national-health program raises the same challenging issues in a field of human need that extends into every home in the land. We cannot boast of attaining social security so long as that program remains on our list of unfinished business.

In the last few years, under the impetus of Federal health programs guided by the Children's Bureau and the Public Health Service, we have seen greater advances in public-health work than in any similar period of our history. But the record of impartial surveys and the testimony of reliable experts bear witness that the medical needs which remain uncared for dwarf what has already been accomplished.

More than half the counties in the United States have no full-time, trained, public-health officer; hundreds of counties are without public-health nurses; and only a fortunate few have maternal and child-health personnel sufficient to meet their needs under professional standards of adequacy. The combined Federal, State, and local preventive health measures are utterly inadequate to cope with fundamental health problems affecting the welfare of millions of our citizens, such as maternal and child care, venereal disease, pneumonia, tuberculosis, and occupational diseases. Yet these are the fields where comparatively small expenditures now will yield the greatest savings in human life and human suffering. By the prompt application of known and accepted methods of treatment, for example, the annual toll of maternal deaths could be cut in half, the lives of at least 50,000 new-born infants could be saved each year, and hundreds of thousands of physically handicapped children could be restored to normal life.

In measuring the need for health services, reliance on national averages will often conceal rather than reveal the true state of affairs. There are tremendous variations among different localities and income groups in the extent of available care, physicians, and hospitals. The very areas and population groups that need the care and services most are lowest in the economic scale and actually receive them least of all. A majority of the 2,000,000 babies born each year, for example, are born in families having incomes below $1,000 a year. In view of our declining population growth, it is a matter of grave concern that the areas and income groups making the greatest contribution to the national birth rate cannot afford and do not receive adequate medical care for mother and child.

The needs I have been describing are by no means confined to those at the relief level. Tens of millions of families in the lower- and middle-income groups—farmers, factory hands, and white-collar workers—are unable to meet the high and unpredictable cost of serious illness. These families, making up the bulk of the population, ask only that some economic mechanism be devised to enable them to pay their own way.

In addition to these deficiencies in care and services, there is completely lacking any systematic protection of the individual against loss of income in times of sickness. American workers are losing about $1,000,000,000 a year through disability not arising out of their employment. If only temporarily disabled, the wage earner finds his income cut off precisely at the time when medical bills make their greatest drain on his meager resources. If permanently disabled, he finds himself thrown upon the human scrap-heap, unemployed and unemployable. In either event, whether sickness lasts for a week or a lifetime, he has no recourse whatever to unemployment or compensation benefits in the prime of life, or to retirement benefits when he reaches the age of 65.

In the hospital, the laboratory, and on their daily rounds, doctors have labored from earliest times, sacrificing all material gain and often life itself, in order that you and I might live in healthful and productive security. Today, when medical science offers greater promise than ever before, the tragedy is that millions of people have not the means to pay. The national health program was designed to bridge that gap, through the cooperative efforts of all who do or can contribute to the solution of a common problem and the lightening of a common burden.

As outlined in the national-health bill which I have introduced, the program proposes grants-in-aid to the States, for the expansion of public-health services and maternal and child care, the construction of needed hospitals and health centers, the development of general programs of medical care, and the provision of temporary disability insurance. I have also introduced separately a proposal for retirement benefits to wage earners who become permanently disabled, to be paid out of the old-age-insurance fund established by the Social Security Act.

Nothing in this program infringes upon the exclusive province of the medical profession, to determine medical needs and administer medical needs and medical care. It does not create any vast medical bureaucracy, or raise new barriers between doctors and patients. My sincere purpose is to break down the economic barriers that now exist, and to bring the doctor-patient relationship to the millions who do not now enjoy its solace and its healing benefits.

Nor does the bill project the Federal Government into the exclusive domain of the States. Federal cooperation with the States in matters affecting the public health began long ago, began, in fact, in the administration of George Washington. In this field at least, we have long since passed the time when doctrinaire disputes over States' rights have clouded the cooperative effort toward the common goal. Speaking through their health officers, the States have testified to the value of existing Federal aid, the cooperative spirit in which it is being administered, and the need for its expansion along the broad lines of the program I am proposing. The Federal Government will not dictate to the States the scope and nature of their services or the methods of financing. The bill simply establishes the cooperative basis upon which to build a healthier and a happier nation.

Toward the close of the last session of Congress the appropriate Senate committee, after exhaustive hearings, filed a favorable preliminary report on the national health bill. The committee found unanimous agreement on its objectives, undisputed evidence of its need, and impressive support for its adoption among responsible farm, labor, women's, and professional groups. For myself, I heartily concur in the committee's resolve to give careful study to the many suggestions and criticisms which have been offered, with a view to perfecting the bill and pressing for its passage early in the next session of Congress. I welcome the counsel and the guidance of any person or organization that can contribute to lighting the way.

I want to say a special word for the church and other voluntary hospitals. Their work is being brought home to you now in the annual campaigns of your local community chest. I cannot urge too strongly that you give generously and with a full heart toward the support of these voluntary organizations, which have made such a splendid record of community service. Between them and the public authorities there has always existed a spirit of partnership. Toward the care of needy patients, the voluntary hospitals now receive from State and local governments aggregate contributions at least equal to the aggregate gifts received from private philanthropic sources. The Federal Government makes the fullest possible use of their facilities, in the care of crippled children under the Social Security Act.

The national-health program is framed in that spirit. Where qualified hospital facilities are available for needy patients, our first objective is to encourage their use, by cooperating with the States in extending the necessary financial help. No new hospital construction will be aided except upon a definite showing, through impartial State and local surveys, that existing facilities, private as well as public, are inadequate to meet the clearly demonstrated need. The localities must also show they can maintain any new facilities according to sound financial, medical, and personnel standards. I have pledged, and the Senate committee is agreed, to clarify the intent of the bill in these respects. Every encouragement will be given to the continued and vigorous activity of the voluntary hospitals as an essential part of the national health program.

It has been said—and it will doubtless be repeated—that we cannot afford to make any expenditures now, however modest, toward the health security of the American people. I do not agree, and I believe you do not agree, with any such policy of false economy. Eminent health authorities insist that as a nation we are not only sicker than we need to be but sicker than we can afford to be. The balancing of the health budget presents a real opportunity to help balance the fiscal budget.

It is cheaper to prevent mothers from dying in childbirth than to give aid to dependent children bereft of their mothers' care. It is cheaper to introduce preventive measures now than to carry the burden of home relief, hospitals, and asylums when disease has reached its final stages. It is cheaper to aid needy farmers to develop a program of medical care than to have the security for Federal farm loans impaired by the borrowers' ill health. It is cheaper to help workers build up an insurance fund against loss of earning power through illness than to place the burden for their care upon society at large or upon members of the medical profession, already overworked and underpaid. All this and more I could demonstrate from careful investigations in medical economics on the farm and in the city.

But in the final analysis the issue of cost goes far beyond any such material considerations. Who can measure in dollars and cents the sorrow and frustration of a single family disrupted by death of crippling illness that could have been prevented by proper medical care? Who can put a price on the life and health of a single breadwinner, a single mother, or a single child saved by medical treatment we know about and can apply in time? Who can calculate in material terms the net worth of all the gains the program would bring in national health, vigor, and contentment?

My friends, every civilization is judged by the store it sets on human life and human values. Across the Atlantic and the Pacific millions of our fellow men are being offered up as sacrifices to the gods of war. That sanguinary spectacle we cannot wholly dismiss from our thoughts and our daily contacts. But we can and should reject its brutalizing influence. By the adoption of a national health program now let us demonstrate to all the world that America places human resources first among the assets of an enlightened civilization.

List of Americans Killed and Neutral Ships Lost in World War and European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement of American lives lost and American ships sunk prior to our entry into the World War and a statement of neutral ships lost in the European War from September 3 to October 23, 1939, which I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN LIVES LOST AND AMERICAN SHIPS SUNK PRIOR TO OUR ENTRANCE INTO WORLD WAR

The records of the Navy Department, Historical Section, disclose that during the period of United States neutrality from the outbreak of the first World War to the rupture of diplomatic relations with Germany February 3, 1917, the lives of only three Americans were lost aboard American merchant ships as the result of submarine and/or raider activities.

All three of these casualties occurred on the tanker Gulflight, which was torpedoed May 1, 1915.

The nature of these casualties was explained in a cable from Ambassador Page to Secretary Lansing 4 days later, which stated that the attack on the Gulflight occurred shortly before noon:

"Wireless Operator Short and Seaman Charpenta jumped overboard and were drowned. * * * Captain Gunter died during night. Coroner's inquest determines cause of death as heart failure." (Page to Lansing, May 7, 1915—Diplomatic Correspondence, A. J. I. L. XI Special Supplement (1917), pp. 76, 77.)

It is also pertinent to this case to state that the Gulflight was at the time of the attack under British naval convoy. This is confirmed by Page's cable of May 10. A published paraphrase of this cable stated:

"Mr. Page reports that it appears that the captain of the Gulflight complied without raising any question with the signals of British patrol boats to proceed under their convoy."

Incidentally the Gulflight was not sunk, but was towed to port.

The following summary appears in Neutrality for the United States, by Borchard and Lage, Yale University Press, which volume is based primarily upon diplomatic correspondence of the United States as published by the State Department:

"Including the case of the Gulflight, 67 lives were lost on American vessels between August 4, 1914, and April 6, 1917, as a result of German submarine activities. Added to this total might be the four killed, one a Spanish stoker, as a result of mine explosions in February 1915. Since it is obviously impossible to state with any degree of accuracy which of the belligerents was responsible for these mine casualties, they have arbitrarily been attributed to German mines by most writers. But the startling fact is that of this total of 71 dead, 64, or 90 percent, were lost between March 16, 1917, and April 6, 1917, i. e., during the last 3 weeks of armed expectancy preliminary to the declaration of war."

[Note by Senator BAILEY: This statement disregards the important fact that the unrestricted submarine warfare did not begin until February 1, 1917.]

"Including the 194 lives on belligerent merchant ships and the 1 lost on a foreign neutral vessel, America's total loss of life, wherever situated, on April 6, 1917, amounted to 266, including the 40 foreigners on American vessels, for whom America was responsible.

"During the 2 years and 6 months between the outbreak of war and severance of our diplomatic relations with Germany, 6 ships (20,866 gross tons) of United States registry were sunk and 1 surrendered. Four were damaged by surface craft and submarines, of which one, the Rebecca Palmer, Secretary Lansing was informed, suffered about $200 damage from gunfire while passing through the war zone with no flag flying.

"Losses from mines increased the total for this period to 12 (34,007 gross tons) and 7 were damaged. Nine other ships were sunk during the period of armed expectancy, so that the total figures, confirmed by the Navy Historical Section records, show 21 ships (70,424 gross tons) lost and 7 damaged during the 2 years and 8 months preceding the declaration of war by the United States."

ON BELLIGERENT SHIPS

A summary of American lives lost on ships of belligerent nations before our entry into the war states:

"One hundred and forty-four passengers and fifty sailors—194 American citizens—had been lost on belligerent vessels, of whom 128, or approximately two-thirds, were Lusitania victims. Of the remaining 66 cases, 50 were enrolled as crew, 21 of them on a vessel engaged in admiralty service; 17 seamen and 3 passengers were on board vessels admitted to have been armed, and another passenger was on a convoyed troop ship. Thirty of the non-Lusitania losses, moreover, occurred when the belligerent vessels attempted either to resist or to escape." (Neutrality for the United States, p. 220.)

NEUTRAL SHIPS LOST IN EUROPEAN WAR FROM SEPTEMBER 3 TO OCTOBER 23, 1939

The New York Times states that 29 neutral ships have been lost since September 8. Below is a list of 24, giving name and nationality of each:

September 8: Dutch minesweeper Willem Van Wick.
September 12: Dutch freighter Mark lost, reported to have rammed a mine.

Centenary Celebration of Baltimore City College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, on last Saturday, the 21st instant, at the concluding banquet of the centenary celebration of the Baltimore City College, in Baltimore, Md., my home State, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] delivered an address dealing primarily with the subject of education and the importance of its relationship to the preservation of democracy.

It is a very able, instructive, and informative address on the subject of education and democracy and, in my opinion, of general interest to the people of the country. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When my good friend, GEORGE RADCLIFFE, invited me to participate in this meeting, I was happy to accept. First, because I felt honored to be asked to take part in the celebration of the one hundredth birthday of this institution. Any institution which can live for 100 years must, of necessity, be basically sound. My second reason was a more personal one. In my own life, prior to 1935, a goodly share of my time had been spent in educational work. I was glad of the chance to slip away for even this short time into a college atmosphere.

It may be that because of my interest in education I overemphasize its importance in its relationship with the preservation of our democracy. I believe that our system of education is and has been the bulwark upon which we must depend for the defense of our democratic institutions. That being true, now more than ever before, we must support and protect our educational system and its freedom.

Three hundred years ago education waged a desperate battle for its freedom. An Italian astronomer, Galilei, studied the stars in their heavenly courses. A burning issue arose over his right to tell what he saw. Many feared that if he told what he saw he would undermine religious faith. Galilei was himself a deeply religious man. He was so deeply religious that he had faith that religion had nothing to fear from the truth. He recognized, as all civilized men have come to recognize, that truth has nothing to fear from truth. That is why the freedom of education is the very basis of civilized progress. For it is the freedom of men of learning in the pursuit of knowledge to think and to declare the truth as it is given them to see it.

Since the days of Galilei, until very recently, this has been generally cherished throughout the western world. The most cruel fate up to the present that had befallen the modern educator was indifference or ridicule. By and large, he was permitted to go his way in peace. Society accepted gratefully, if sometimes belatedly, his contributions to the advancement of living.

But today, in many parts of the world, the educator would count himself blessed if he were simply looked on with indifference. In some countries, the educator has become the bond-slave of the ruling political party. He has been forced to lend the cloak of education to what is, in fact, stark brutality. There are many who could not remain in their posts if they would; this because of the accident of their birth. There are many others who could remain if they chose to do so. They, however, have preferred exile and poverty in the cause of truth to personal well-being in the cause of deception. These educators stood firm against intrigue, entreaty, and threats. They refused to lend the name and prestige of educational authority to myths and pseudo-educational propaganda. They chose rather to be homeless wanderers than to forsake the only aspiration that made life for them worth living—the aspiration for knowledge.

Some of these educators we have welcomed to our own shores. We are receiving from them the priceless gifts of their genius. In our universities and colleges they are adding to our knowledge and well-being. To all of these modern martyrs, those who have found refuge and those who have not, we should bare our heads in the profoundest admiration and respect.

In our own country the educator enjoys a liberty as great as at any time in the past. The spirit of intolerance, of bigotry, of brutality, has not penetrated to the academic halls. There are several reasons, I think, why we have preserved our academic freedom. The most important reason has been the acceptance of a doctrine expressed by Abraham Lincoln at Edwardsville, Ill., September 13, 1858. Let me read a short excerpt:

"What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling seacoasts, our Army, and our Navy. These are not our reliance against tyranny. All of these may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit, and you have planted the seeds of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you."

So long as educators are ready to refuse to yield to corruption or intimidation, the future of education is safe. No country can afford in the long run to throw overboard the talents of its best minds. A country that is forced to get along with a second-rate education condemns itself in the modern world to being a second-rate country. That is an inexorable truth that we in America understand.

Freedom of education in the full sense can thrive only if economic and political democracy thrives.

But educators and educated men and women must know that the perpetuation of that freedom depends upon the perpetuation of the political freedom of all our people. They cannot and they must not rest the future of this freedom they so much cherish upon the smug satisfaction that they are safe in the cloistered confines of a college campus. They cannot brush aside their responsibilities of citizenship with the curt rejoinder that government is not an exact science and that responsibility for its operation rests in the hands of politicians who are so unscientific.

I will be the first to admit that government is not an exact science. That is particularly true of a democratic one. But it is a process of trial and error. This, after all, is the ultimate in the procedure of the most careful scientist. We do not have opportunity to work under conditions favorable to accuracy which can compare with those of even the most meager laboratory. I will admit that since governments are political they must be operated by what are usually contemptuously referred to as politicians. We make mistakes. I do not attempt to defend them. I only say that we do try so much harder than people generally understand.

And in these troublous times we need the help and the understanding of those to whom has been given the opportunity of training.

Political freedom has been much more difficult of achievement than freedom of learning. Indeed, it has been a much longer and harder struggle for the common man to achieve political freedom than for the scholar or scientist to acquire freedom to pursue knowledge whither the quest for truth led him. The common man, I believe, has always desired political freedom for himself. He has, however, been slow to learn that his own freedom ultimately depends upon the equal freedom of all, even those whose views of government he may, upon occasion, dislike and even profoundly detest. It was only after centuries of struggle that the common man realized that political democracy was possible only if the right of all men—without regard to wealth, race, or religion—to express their political opinions freely and publicly, was scrupulously safeguarded. Freedom of thought is the very cornerstone of a democratic society.

In Thomas Jefferson's original draft of the Virginia bill for the establishment of religious freedom, we find these words: "The opinions of men are not the object of civil government or under its control." No one, certainly not I, can improve on that language.

We must have an atmosphere of free expression if we are to have the benefit of fearless political discussion. This is the surest guaranty of orderly change and the surest protection against the forces of disorder. Nothing is so dangerous as the belief that any part of our political society should be beyond criticism. No one generation's judgment as to the essentials of good government can be unerring. As the inquiring mind of Galileo made it possible for man to preserve his religious faith on an earth that moves, so political criticism today may point the only way of preserving tomorrow our democratic faith. The earth does move, and it is the spirit of free inquiry, whether in science or in politics, which enables man to adjust himself to its movements.

We must scrupulously maintain freedom of discussion if we are to develop our responsibilities as a people by choosing rationally the path we wish to follow. That is why freedom of thought and freedom of speech, with the resulting duty of making up our minds honestly and courageously, is at the very heart of the faith in democracy necessary to protect the pursuit of knowledge.

The preservation of our rights, privileges, duties, and responsibilities, under a democracy, must be the cause of constant concern to those who believe in democracy. The very nature of those resources is such that they cannot be even intermittently permitted to lie dormant. By their very nature, neglect and nonuse causes them to atrophy and die. Untiring alertness is the price which must be paid for their preservation.

I fear that we are entering into a period when the need for this untiring alertness will be greater than at any previous period in our Nation's history. This for the reason that right now three factors have converged.

First. For a full decade we have undergone a condition of depth-reaching depression. This could not have helped but to have weakened the resistance of our people. False doctrines of government acquire much more attractive color to a depressed than to a prosperous people.

Second. The last two decades have seen the acceptance by the peoples of many nations of political doctrines which are the direct antithesis of those in which we believe. Furthermore, the nations accepting these doctrines have attained some measure of success in the solution of their economic problems. I am convinced that that success is wholly superficial and entirely temporary. Regardless of that fact, it does not detract from the attractiveness of the success in the minds of many of our people.

Third. At the moment, most of the powerful nations of the world either are at war or on the verge of war. This results in a situation in which all the nations participating feel it essential that every possible effort be made by them to influence the attitude of our people toward them and their enemies.

The converging of these three factors presents to us the greatest danger that this Nation has ever seen. Our Government and our people must necessarily afford protection against improper activities conducted from outside sources. The danger comes from the fact that in our desire to defend against improper outside activities, we run the risk of destroying the civil liberties of our people and by so doing destroy our very democracy itself.

All about us, and all too close at hand, we see forces of intolerance at work—forces intolerant of democracy, of science, and even of religion. We have seen them in all too many shapes and forms. They preach a doctrine which is the antithesis of that spirit of tolerance which is so essential to the perpetuation of our institution—democracy. Fear, hatred, distrust, and bigotry, these are the tenets of their faith.

We must realize the grave danger to civilization that lurks behind these forces. They must be dealt with resolutely if the freedom and dignity of the common man is to be preserved. They must also be dealt with resolutely if the freedom and dignity of the scholar and scientist is to be preserved.

That resolute determination must carry with it an understanding of three basic principles of democratic machinery:

First, it must give to every citizen equality of opportunity to participate in government which is free from coercion or fear on the one side and free from impossible promises of reward upon the other.

Second, the minority in a democratic community must recognize the right of the majority to govern. At the same time, the majority must insure to the minority the same degree of justice which it demands for itself. Failing in this obligation, the majority becomes merely a mob. When the majority becomes a mob, democracy fades out.

Third, a democratic government must be a government of law. A civilized democratic community demands that all classes within it respect its law. If respect for law is to be maintained, the law must reflect the community sense of justice and not the demands of any class or group. If the law reflects the community sense of justice, no class or group may defy or set itself above or beyond the law without bringing upon itself the just resentment of the whole community. A civilized democracy demands patience and self-restraint from all its citizens.

These three more or less mechanical requirements of democratic machinery may all be summed up with the simple word—tolerance. It is the very essence of democracy.

You people in Maryland need no outside speaker to preach the doctrine of tolerance. The rich heritage of your historical background makes that unnecessary. It was here that the first statutory recognition of that doctrine was enacted. You who are or have been connected with Baltimore City College may ever be proud of its devotion of tolerance.

That devotion must continue. It must be continued not only here but in every school, college, and university in our land.

For if tolerance is the essence of democracy, it is to our classrooms, our laboratories, and our lecture halls that we look in order that the softened light of tolerance may be kept burning. That shaded torch is in the hands of the educated men and women of America. It must not be extinguished.

Sinking of the "Royal Oak" by Commander Guenther Prien

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE ELKO (NEV.) DAILY FREE PRESS OF OCTOBER 21, 1939

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Elko (Nev.) Daily Free Press of October 21, 1939, which to my mind is a very able editorial from the pen of the editor of that newspaper, entitled "They Decorated Him for Valor."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Elko (Nev.) Daily Free Press of October 21, 1939]

THEY DECORATED HIM FOR VALOR

Commander Guenther Prien, the man who squirmed through a British mine field to Scapa Flow with a submarine and sank the battleship Royal Oak, was a hero Wednesday as Berlin celebrated his doughty exploit. This 31-year-old submarine commander received from Adolf Hitler Germany's high war decoration, the Grand Cross of the Iron Cross.

We are not going to question the commander's valor. Certainly his was a brave deed. His entire crew knew that every foot they pressed forward was filled with danger—possibly death. They made it through safely; they made it back; they sank a great ship; and more than 800 men went to their deaths. For what?

Surely he deserved his country's plaudits; the commander is a brave and able man. But how about the 800 who went to a watery grave? How about the heart-rending sorrow of those who were left behind, the wives, the kiddies, the mothers, and fathers, for after all these brave British soldiers are men in early and middle life? How about the heartbreak? And for what? We had almost forgotten. This is war.

Berlin's streets were merry as the celebration of victory rocked the city. A marvelous feat had been accomplished; a German submarine had penetrated Scapa Flow and 800 British sailors were dead. These dead were little different from the Germans who celebrated the victory. Had the English been the victors in the battle there would have been rejoicing in London. But this was a German victory and so the Germans celebrated. And to what end?

Perhaps Commander Prien may take his same submarine to sea next week and it is possible that a British destroyer will find it with a depth bomb and this gallant young commander will be carried, with his courageous crew, to the bottom of the ocean. And the British will rejoice * * * and the Germans will bow in sorrow. How about the children, the wives, the mothers, and fathers of these German soldiers? There will be agony and sorrow and more hatred. And for what? Oh, yes, we almost forgot—this is war.

Wheeler Homecoming Celebration

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESSES BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA, AND HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on October 1 of this year the citizens of Hudson, Mass., extended a homecoming welcome to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], Hudson, Mass., being his birthplace. On that occasion my colleague the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] delivered an address complimentary of the Senator from Montana and introduced him to the citizens of Hudson whom he then addressed. I ask unanimous consent to have both addresses printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, and members of the radio audience, we are meeting here in Hudson today to welcome back to Massachusetts a son of the Bay State who has gone far in the life of the Nation. Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, whose homecoming we celebrate, was born in this town in 1882 and attended the schools and a business college here. We read in Alva Johnston's excellent biography that "After working as a stenographer and clerk in Massachusetts firms, he saved enough money to go to Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1902, where he enrolled in the Michigan Law School. He maintained himself during the school year by waiting on table at the students' boarding house and acting as a stenographer to the dean's office. During summer vacations he traveled through Illinois selling an all-purpose volume abounding in general information—cooking recipes and instructions for the treatment of diseases of adults, children, and livestock. It was printed in English, German, and Norwegian and sold for $1.50 or $3.50 a copy, according to the binding. WHEELER took orders on foot during the summer and delivered the books by horse and buggy during the early fall. At one of the farms he visited he met Lulu M. White, of Albany, Ill., now Mrs. Wheeler.

"After graduating from law school in 1905, WHEELER went to Telluride, Colo., and worked in a law office for 3 months. After that he started looking for a good place to set up law practice. At Butte, Mont., he was offered $50 a month to work in a law office. He declined. He intended to leave town that night, but his train was several hours late. He got into a poker game and was cheated out of all his money, so he took the $50 offer and settled down in Butte, which has been his home ever since."

In 1910 he was elected as the youngest lawyer member of the Montana Legislature. He was later appointed United States district attorney in Montana, and was an unsuccessful candidate for Governor in 1920. In 1922 he was elected to the United States Senate, where he has been ever since.

As we look over this remarkably successful career, we see that Senator WHEELER has been called many things, and that, like every strong character, he has made enemies and friends. He has been charged with being a Bolshevik; he has been accused of being a conservative; he has had applied to him the labels of "Progressive," "Non-Partisan Leaguer," labor man, and Democrat. The record does not show that he has ever been labeled a Republican—but I hasten to add that this does not mean that he has not many sincere friends and admirers in the Republican Party.

It is a career which has interested itself in many great questions. He has sought to regulate public utilities; he has interested himself, and still interests himself deeply, in the railroad problem. He wants to curb monopoly wherever he can.

Let it be noted, however, that he is opposed to monopoly and dictatorship wherever it is found. He hates monopoly and dictatorship if it wears the garb of big business, but he detests it just as strongly if the desire for power comes from those in public office. He hates a tyrant, whether he is in business or whether he occupies a judicial bench. To him the economic royalist and the political royalist are on the same footing.

It was natural that feeling this way he should have taken such a prominent part in the fighting attempt to apply force to the Supreme Court. He broke with his party leadership, and did so at once, not waiting to see which way the wind blew. Whether you agree with him or not—and I do—we can all agree that this was the act of a courageous man. As a freshman Senator it was my pleasure to see Senator WHEELER in that fight and to admire his slashing, vigorous, and bold attack. He had logic, research, and industry on his side; but he had more—moral fervor and strong conviction.

You remember the outcome of the Supreme Court fight—how the course of battle changed from almost certain victory for the administration in January to an afternoon 9 months later, when a ruddy, white-haired man, the Vice President of the United States, walked into Senator WHEELER's office and said: "BURT, write your own ticket." He had won, decisively, unquestionably and without reservation, and in winning he had educated countless numbers of his fellow citizens in the importance of maintaining a truly democratic Government. He had shown the Nation the difference between reform on the one hand and control on the other. All too often do we see the desire to control masquerading as liberalism. His liberalism is the liberalism of reform.

It is particularly precious to have men of courage at a time like the present—men who have proved, as WHEELER has, that he dares to go against the trend, that he is not afraid of being criticized because he opposes the whim and passion of mob spirit. Let it be noted that Senator WHEELER opposed American entry into the World Court and that he declared himself to be opposed to sending our soldiers overseas to fight in foreign causes. America can use public servants with that kind of courage now.

As I have said, his is the liberalism that favors reform rather than control. I think of him as one of that stirring band of Massachusetts reformers which our State has always been able to produce. It is the Massachusetts passion for reform that has given us such a commanding place among the States in social and humanitarian legislation of all sorts. It was the Massachusetts passion for reform and our hatred of slavery which supplied a large—if not a major—part of the emotional and spiritual impetus in the Civil War. BURTON K. WHEELER, son of the Bay State, stands in the shadow of a great tradition which he is ably carrying on. There is scarcely a man who knows him who will not disagree with many of his beliefs, as I do. There is also not a man who knows him who does not, as I do, respect his virile courage and, paraphrasing Shakespeare, say to himself, "This is a man."

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

It is a pleasure to be back in Hudson and to greet old friends and acquaintances.

Though the town has changed with the march of progress, though many sites familiar 30 years ago are no more, and though there is increased business activity and many more persons are here, yet the old spirit is the same. I am proud to be numbered among the sons of Hudson, just as I am pleased, beyond my limited description, with the great reception that has been accorded me.

My obligations to you now are even greater, and I have long known that I owe you much. It was in your public schools that I received my primary education. It was the principal of the Hudson High School who suggested and encouraged my study of the law. Fate has treated me kindly, and I wish to acknowledge my debt to Mr. Charles A. Williams and to Miss Ethyl Rawson, of the Hudson Public School System, for the encouragement which they gave me.

It was the town of Hudson, the county of Middlesex, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the glorious traditions of all New England that furnished the background of which I am so proud. No State, no part of these United States, ever produced greater liberals, greater leaders, or better men than John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, Paul Revere, John Adams, and the host of patriots whose names and whose deeds are so indelibly inscribed on the pages of history of this Nation. They were the liberals of their day. Some called them radicals. Today we honor them as patriots. The liberalism of those farseeing patriots has been a constant source of inspiration to all Americans.

New England has contributed more than leadership to our great Nation. Democracy on this continent had its birth in the town meeting. I can well remember as a boy clutching the hand of Abe Tyler, my grandfather, as we went to town hall. I thrilled to the discussions. There it was, after full and open debate by all citizens who desired to participate, that town problems and policies were settled. Such free and open discussion and the rule of the majority is real democracy.

Your forefathers and mine laid down their lives to establish a democratic republic in this land. They were farmers, cobblers, blacksmiths, tailors, merchants, and tradesmen, but with the march of progress the shoeshop became a factory and the cobbler an employee. The small factory or shop with its owner-worker disappeared, and in its stead came modern industrialization, combinations, and trusts. Mass production replaced the individual and brought with it severe tests of democracy—unemployment, low farm prices, and poverty.

Amid economic inequalities, social injustice, and poverty, democracy always labors, if indeed it does not fail. Poverty is as needless as it is vicious. It fills the earth with subversive dogmas—endangers our democracy, and hence our freedom. Poverty is the menace of peace, the seed of race hatreds, and the cause of religious prejudice. If man must hate, let us not hate each other; let us hate poverty. If man must make war, let us not fight each other; let us make war on poverty.

The success or failure of American democracy is dependent upon economic and social conditions—upon the welfare and happiness of the people who compose it, and not upon who wins the war in Europe. Men will fight and even die for democracy; but, once gained, their children and grandchildren come to accept the privileges of constitutional democracy as commonplace. Lacking employment, food, clothing, shelter, or markets for their produce, they become a fertile field for demagogues. Once Germany attempted a democracy, but its people had been reduced to economic serfdom, and in poverty succumbed to the false promises of economic security. They sold their freedom for the promise of bread. The old saying that "you cannot have bread for nothing" is as true today as ever. You must work for it or you'll be required to give up your liberties for it.

Through the ages the No. 1 economic problem had been that of producing enough. American industrial genius solved this problem in our country by mass production.

Now we are told we have too much farm land, too much factory capacity, too many mines, too much food and clothing—so much of everything that starvation lurks at our doors. So much wheat, milk, and meat that farmers are losing their farms, laborers losing their jobs, and people losing faith in their fellow man, if not in their Government.

What a paradox!

Let us not forget that it is the very lack of all these things of which we have an abundance that lies at the bottom of the wars in Europe and in the Orient.

It must be apparent, then, that mass production to be successful must be accompanied by mass consumption—money earned and in the pockets of the people to buy the goods produced.

We in America must use our genius and our resources in solving this paradox of want in the midst of plenty if we desire to save the country from financial and moral bankruptcy. We must not use that genius or our great resources in a futile European war. It should never be forgotten that it is the moral and financial bankruptcy of a nation that brings about dictatorship.

Less than 23 years ago we went into a bloody conflict "to make the world safe for democracy." Today after that so-called victorious holy war the world knows less democracy than every before. To say the World War was futile is to be charitable—it was horrible, it was disastrous. I shudder to think of the potential results, direct and indirect, of the present war.

A quarter of a century ago kaiserism was to be stamped out; now it is nazi-ism. Both are indefensible—both are repugnant to free peoples. The problem that faces Europe today not only parallels the 1914 situation but is one which is recorded in the pages of European history a hundred times. The characters may be more bold, the names changed, and certainly the villain is equally or more repulsive, but the plot and the climax are as old as European history itself.

My sympathies are with the Allies—and I know that the American people and all lovers of democracy want Hitlerism crushed. It is the symbol of dictatorship, of bankruptcy, followed by intolerance, bigotry, and prejudice. All this is the product of the last war, and should the present war assume the dimensions of the first World War, I am fearful that there will not only be a bankrupt Germany but a bankrupt world—not one Hitler, one Mussolini, or one Stalin, but many.

Sympathetic as we are with those who find themselves at war with dictators, we must never lose sight of the fact that our entry into war cannot be measured alone in terms of lives lost and dollars spent. The price would surely be loss of democracy and Christianity. They could not withstand the impact of war.

Our problem is to solve our economic difficulties at home and not the politics of Europe. Our problem is to preserve American democracy and not the balance of power or the boundaries of Europe.

We are passing through a grave crisis, a trying period. We must be vigilant in guarding our peace. Neither sentiment, propaganda, nor profits must be allowed to influence our determination to avoid our participation in the present conflict.

Already there has been loosed upon us a flood of propaganda from both sides. Its intensity will be multiplied with the passage of time. Already in Washington the war hysteria rises in full flood. Detectives watch the Capitol, watch the office buildings, and watch each other. It won't be long now before we will be spying on each other and seeing German U-boats in the Great Lakes and enemy airplanes over the Rocky Mountains.

I sometimes wonder whether we shouldn't be more afraid of the war propaganda originating in Washington than that which emanates from foreign capitals.

The American people today seem resolved to withstand it. Let us pray that they keep steadfast in the hectic days to come. They realize that our vision may be clouded and our thinking dulled, but they know that the cost of war will be greater today than ever before.

War profits will destroy true neutrality. They lure and corrupt. War profits may bring a temporary and artificial prosperity—a prosperity which would be only a shot in the arm of our economic system productive of a cheap and murderous jag, but which would end in a disastrous depression. At this moment there is some increase in the price of wheat, sugar, beef, and other basic goods. Certain industries are hastily reemploying men, but for any war-engendered prosperity we will eventually pay and pay and pay.

We are neither Germans, Poles, Britons, Frenchmen, Italians, nor Russians. We are Americans, and in this hour of world strife our country is a haven for peace. We must so maintain it. Cries of nazi-ism, fascism, or communism that we presently hear neither frighten nor interest me. Working democracy can withstand their attacks. The only "ism" in which I am interested is Americanism. We should build up our national defense so that no nation will dare attack us; we must build up our trade in the Americas where our natural markets lie.

As a member of the United States Senate, I will never vote to send a single American boy across the water to fight on foreign soil. Neither will I, by my vote, approve of a single step that in my judgment may lead this country down the road to war.

These are some of the reasons why I am not in favor of selling arms and munitions to any of the belligerents. This is why I would insist that all other products be paid for in cash and delivery made in this country. And this is why I would say to all Americans: You travel in troubled waters at your own risk—you cannot and must not involve this country in war.

America must be kept safe for Americans in America.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. A. B. CHANDLER, OF KENTUCKY, OCTOBER 21, 1939

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very timely address on the subject of the pending legislation delivered by my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], at Richmond, Va., on the 21st of October 1939, before the annual convention of the Disciples of Christ.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have been very much impressed during my 2 weeks as a Member of the United States Senate at the general feeling which unquestionably exists in the minds and hearts of not only the Members of the Senate but all of the officials with whom I have come in contact in Washington. It is the desire of each and all of them to do their utmost to prevent America from participating in this war or any war except in defense of our country when attacked.

In opening I would like to repeat with strong approval the words of the President of the United States at the opening of this special session of the Congress:

"I proceed on the assumption that every Member of the Senate and the House of Representatives and every member of the executive branch of the Government, including the President and his associates, personally and officially, are equally and without reservation in favor of such measures as will protect the neutrality, the safety, and the integrity of our country, and at the same time keep us out of war."

That the present neutrality law is an unneutral law and works to the distinct advantage of Germany and against the Allies is now hardly subject to serious question.

We are trying as best we can to avoid, if possible, the many mistakes which seem to have been made in 1917 and which later resulted in our participation in that war.

It seems not only good sense but good judgment to say to all nations that if you do buy materials and supplies of war you must come to America for them, pay cash when you get them, and carry them over in your own ships.

If the Pittman bill becomes a law it will mean that in the future there will be no occasion for the American Government feeling obligated in any way to protect the lives and property of American citizens who go without justification or authority into war zones. Under the provisions of the Pittman law the President will have the authority to define combat zones, and it is believed by those who favor the passage of the bill that it will result in the ships and citizens of America staying out of the dangerous war zones entirely.

Of course, we still entertain the hope that some day the nations of the earth will realize the absolute futility of war. There is no longer any victor in war. If the nations of the earth persist in having war, it will eventually lead to the extermination of civilization.

Bombing of defenseless cities and of citizens cannot be countenanced by any Christian country. Discrimination and persecution against religions cannot be condoned.

It is, I believe, the general feeling that if there must be war on the face of the earth that it is the duty of the Members of the Congress of the United States to do all in their power to see that such wars as seem to be incapable of being avoided because of misunderstanding or greed for power and lust should be fought across the seas and not here.

The only hope for the future in avoiding war is for all nations to obey God's own injunction and all of us to devoutly pray for the time when men will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

Of course, there may be honest differences of opinion as to the best means calculated to keep us out of war. During these times of stress and high tension it is of the utmost importance that we keep cool heads and exercise calm and deliberate judgment. It is a time for calm thinking and a clear determination to find as nearly as we can the best solution to this most pressing problem.

I have been deeply impressed with the sincerity of the men on both sides of the question who have carried on during the last few weeks the discussion in the Senate of the United States. They are sincere and honest men anxious, in my opinion, with God's help, to find the best solution for the people of America.

For myself I am determined that I shall not vote to send our American boys across the seas to fight in a foreign war. If ever it becomes necessary for America to take up arms, we are determined that it shall only be in defense of the rights of the people of America and to protect their homes, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is encouraging in these serious times to find laymen of the Christian churches gathering for the purpose of backing those who are in charge of the affairs of the Government, and who are trying as best they can to find the right solution to a desperate situation.

I have, as always, the greatest confidence in the considered judgment of the people of America and their representatives to find with God's help an answer that will best protect the citizens of America. Without His help we are lost, but with the aid of our prayers we feel that He will help us to find the right way.

It is my hope and prayer that some day in some way the spirit of God will so work in the hearts of men that they will find certain and lasting peace.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN OF OCTOBER 1, 1939

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial written by H. L. Mencken, entitled "Sham Battle," published in the Baltimore Sun of October 1, 1939.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of October 1, 1939]

SHAM BATTLE

(By H. L. Mencken)

It is possible that the debate over the proposed amendment of the Neutrality Act of 1937, now getting under way in the Halls of Congress, may produce same gaudy hollering and breast beating, full of thrills for connoisseurs of whim-wham, but beyond that it is hardly likely to be of any significance.

Whether the act survives substantially as it stands, or the New Deal scheme to pull its teeth is adopted, or some other and even more disingenuous plan emerges, will be all one, for no imaginable legislation can keep the United States out of the war if the administration itches badly enough to take a hand. That it has begun furiously to itch must be manifest to even the most underprivileged understanding. All its principal spokesmen, headed by the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt himself, have been rooting hard and openly for England since the issue was first joined. What they ask for today is simply a license to give the embattled motherland more direct and effective help, and if that turns out to be insufficient they may be trusted confidently to go the whole hog, license or no license.

There is only one event that can cure their libido, and that is the quick and complete collapse of the arch fiend Hitler, which somehow seems improbable. It is far more likely, at least at the present writing, that if his peace overtures are rejected scotching him will turn out to be an extremely expensive and bloody business, and that before many months have come and gone the altruists engaged upon it will begin to sweat painfully. When that melancholy time arrives the excuse for American intervention on the side of what the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt speaks of as "morality and religion" will be provided by the always ingenious brethren of the English atrocity factory, and the administration certainly will not say them nay.

On the contrary, it may be relied upon to give them a leg up whenever it can, and with loud hosannas. Every time the English clamp down on American shipping, the fact will be delicately passed over, as it was in 1914, 1915, and 1916, and every time the Germans clamp down on either American shipping or English shipping there will be a violent hullabaloo. In a little while note writing, radio crooning, and spy hunting will be in full blast, and after that it will be an easy step to horning in.

In answer to all this the judicious may point out that the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt, in his message to Congress on September 21, declared solemnly and categorically that it was his hope and prayer "to keep us out of the war," and then added, without being asked, that his "candid judgment" told him that "we shall succeed in these efforts." Certainly it would be unreasonable to call for anything clearer than that. But statements by the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt, however clear, no longer carry their face value; in fact, the discount of them is almost as great as the discount on those of Hitler, Chamberlain, Stalin, et hoc genus omne. Since the opening of his first campaign, the honorable gentleman has been making them at frequent intervals, and not 10 percent of them have ever been redeemed in gold. Indeed, the only one so redeemed that I can recall at the moment was his promise to bring back beer.

It is not necessary to ascribe this series of defaults to a deliberate attempt to cozen, though that thesis could surely be argued plausibly; it is enough to remember that the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt is an extremely mercurial, grandiloquent, and unreliable fellow, with little apparent temperamental fitness for the sober responsibilities that lie upon him, and no visible fear that his customers may be intelligent. When he talks to them, as he was talking on September 21, he usually talks "hooey." In very few of his pronunciamentos, whether written or verbal, is there any politeness toward the known facts, and in almost none of them does he resort to rational argument.

There was an amusing example in his message to Congress. "Let no group assume," he said, "the exclusive label of the peace bloc. We all belong to it." All? There can be only two ways to account for this assertion. Either the honorable gentleman was seeking, in the face of the obvious facts, to deny the existence of a formidable war party, with eminent members at his very elbow, or he was confessing that there was no substantial difference between these forthright succorers of "morality and religion" and his own peace bloc. The second of the two alternatives is easier to embrace.

A President of the United States, like any other citizen, has a plain right to an opinion about the rights and wrongs of this or that foreign war, and in his official capacity he may also have a right, and even a duty, to indicate that opinion to the people, though on this point learned counsel are far from unanimous. But neither he nor any other man has any right to pretend to neutrality when he is in fact bitterly partisan, nor to talk loftily against war when he is notoriously planning to promote it. Of the first of these improprieties the Honorable Mr. Roosevelt proved himself guilty in every one of the notes he addressed to Hitler, Mussolini, and company before the war actually began, and in all his speeches on the subject after his Chautauqua speech. Of the second he convicted himself in the very message to Congress which contained his plea for peace.

The head of a great state, speaking ex cathedra, can't indulge himself in the evasions and inconsistencies suitable to a chance debate on a street corner. What he says commits his country, and the least one may ask of it is that it be frank, sincere, and in accord with ordinary notions of candor and fair dealing. He has no right, favoring one side or the other in a foreign war, to pretend to be the honest friend of both, and he has no right, preparing to help one side against the other, to assume hypocritically the character of a lover of peace. When a Hitler, a Mussolini, or a Stalin resorts to buncombe of this sort the whole world snickers, and when a President of the United States does the same thing it snickers no less.

The late Woodrow Wilson's unparalleled talent for such buncombe produced effects that linger to the present day. All over the world the character of the United States is assumed as a matter of fact to be that of a Pecksniff. That notion is by no means confined to the public enemies in the last war, it is especially cherished in England, and contempt naturally goes with it. If we are now to have a second and worse dose out of the same bottle, we'll be embalmed in history as an even worse gang of Pharisees than the English themselves.

I am not arguing here against the theory that the United States, as a matter of self-interest, should support England against Hitler and company, though I do not subscribe to it. It is held by many honest if misguided men, and may be defended without any excess of sophistry and worse. What I am arguing is simply that it is disingenuous, dishonorable, and ignominious for a great nation to profess neutrality and blubber for peace, and at the same time to give all the aid it can to one side against the other, by fair means or foul. It is quite possible to fight gallantly in even a bad cause, but it is not possible to fight gallantly in even the noblest of causes without standing up like a man, raising a flag without any raincoat over it, and eschewing blows behind the back and under the belt.

The present course of the administration can lead only to dishonor and disaster. The English would never have undertaken the present adventure if they had not been sure of its support, and they will be asking for the full measure of that support if the war goes on, and getting it. No matter which side wins in the end, the United States will come out of it even more ingloriously than it came out of its last adventure as England's prohibition agent. If Hitler is put down by force we'll get no more thanks than we got then, and a bill two or three times as large. And if Hitler is not put down we'll face the just and bitter enmity of the strongest military power on earth, and the disdain and derision of all the rest of the human race.

The Bankheads of Alabama

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALABAMA JOURNAL

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial written by Mr. C. M. Stanley, the able editor of the Alabama Journal, on our distinguished colleagues WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2D.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Alabama Journal of October 19, 1939]

TWO BROTHERS

It is a remarkable coincidence that farmers of the United States stricken in recent months by flood, drought, and insect enemies should have as leading national champions of their cause two Alabama brothers. Several thousand of Alabama's farmers have been especially hard hit because their crops were victims not only of boll-weevil depredations, but the floods of July and August finished the damage, with the result that this State has the smallest cotton crop in many years. Other States in the South and West have suffered similarly.

Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD during his entire public life has devoted major effort to farm problems, with the result that his colleagues in the United States Senate have come to look to him for advice and leadership in all matters affecting agriculture and its problems. Hence it was Senator BANKHEAD who last week called the conference of Senators from States affected by drought, flood, and weevil at which tentative agreement was made to press for a special appropriation of $50,000,000 with which to meet the situation and to tide over the farmers of the stricken regions until they can get another crop planted and get on their feet.

Now comes the other brother, Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of the House of Representatives, who has called a conference of House Members to consider the same subject. Any bill making an appropriation must originate in the House of Representatives; therefore the conference called by Speaker BANKHEAD will decide upon the amount to ask and make suggestion as to its distribution. It is expected that existing governmental agencies will be utilized to make the contacts with those in need, and that the Farm Security Administration will be the chief dependence in seeing that the funds appropriated go where they are needed and where they will do the most good.

From Alabama's standpoint, it should be a source of pride that these Alabama brothers are looked upon both by farm interests in Congress and by the farm organizations of the Nation as their dependable friend and reliance in anything affecting agriculture. Those with historic perspective and knowledge of Alabama history, however, are not surprised that farming is so close to the hearts of these two brothers. Their father, the late Senator John H. Bankhead, was himself a farmer. In the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate the elder Bankhead was known as the "father of good roads" because of his sponsorship of the original laws authorizing Federal aid for highway construction, just as he was the father of the rural free delivery system which has brought the daily mails within reach of every farm homestead in America.

With a heritage of that kind, the BANKHEAD brothers of the present generation might have been expected to have the farmer's problems close to their own hearts.

Drafting of Wealth in Wartime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAN GURNEY

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. STYLES BRIDGES, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, OCTOBER 22, 1939

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] on October 22, 1939, on the subject of the Lee bill, providing for the drafting of wealth in wartime.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

God forbid that this country should ever again be drawn into a war. I do not agree with Senator LEE, the sponsor of this bill, that it will tend to keep us out of war. This country does not have to be bribed into staying out of war. The American people are determined to see that it is not drawn into one.

Since the beginning of the New Deal we have been hearing constant reports that a capital levy was to be presented as another panacea. This bill sponsored by the Senator is it. It is a bill to confiscate the Nation's wealth under the guise of national defense. I read to you from the bill:

"Whenever Congress shall declare war, or shall declare that the imminence of war has created an emergency which in the judgment of the President is sufficiently serious to necessitate an increase in the Military Establishment by the drafting of manpower, the President is authorized and requested to cause to be taken a census of the net wealth of the Nation. Such census shall be taken in such a manner as the President shall by regulations prescribe and by such agency or agencies of the Government as he may designate or establish for such purpose.

"Such regulations shall require every citizen of the United States, every resident alien, and every nonresident alien having any wealth in the United States to file with such person or agency as the President may designate a sworn declaration in such form as the President may prescribe with respect to his gross wealth in the United States and financial obligations therein."

Now, let's see what is wealth. It is not only Wall Street that this bill is striking at; it is not only the economic royalists whom you have heard so much about. It is a bill to take your wealth—the wealth of the people of my own New England, the people of the sunny South, of the people of Oklahoma, whom Senator LEE represents, of the people of the Middle and the far West.

If all of your earthly possessions over and above what you owe are not worth more than $1,000—that much exemption is granted—if your home, your farm, your savings, your business, your insurance, your stocks and bonds, altogether, do not have a net worth of more than $1,000, there is no need for your listening to me further. If they do, I would suggest that you come closer to the radio.

Because all of your net wealth over $1,000—again I quote from the bill—"shall be subject to the borrowing power of the United States" when this act goes into effect.

The bill says "subject to the borrowing power." I say it is a capital levy. It is not borrowing money when money is taken by force.

Let's see if I am not right when I call it a capital levy.

Do you have a farm which you value, over and above your obligations, to be worth $10,000? The Government under this bill "borrows" $450. Do you have net assets, including savings, everything you own, of $3,000; the Government "borrows" $100. In the case of a net wealth of $100,000 (including a business, a home, a farm, everything you have) the Government "borrows" $9,450; a net wealth of $250,000, it "borrows" $31,950; on $1,000,000 the figure is $206,950, and so on.

Under this bill the Government is empowered to borrow this money for a period of 50 years. It does not have to pay any interest at all. And it is prohibited from paying more than 1 percent.

But what happens is this:

Do you have $450 available in your home tonight? If this bill were to go into effect tomorrow, do you have $300 or $10,000, as the case may be, which you can quickly put your hands on? If not, you can do one of three things:

First. The farmer may sell some of his stock or a part of his farm to raise the cash; the businessman may sell part of his business; the investor may sell enough of his securities. Can you imagine the havoc that such wholesale selling would create in the cattle market, the land market, on the stock exchange, if you please?

Second. You can, perhaps, borrow the money, in which event you will have to pay 6-percent interest. The Government may give you no interest, maybe 1 percent. At best, you lose 5 percent for a period of possibly 50 years. This is not borrowing money. It is confiscation.

Third. Under the third course, you can give the Government your note. It takes a lien on your property and charges you 6-percent interest. Again it may or may not pay you the munificent sum of 1-percent interest. Again you lose at least 5 percent. Is this borrowing as you and I understand the meaning of the word?

This third procedure is the one that would most generally be taken.

Under it the Government, in all probability, would come to take over our industries, our larger businesses, our larger plants.

Mr. Henry Ford's wealth is supposed to be in the neighborhood of $600,000,000. He would have to turn over to the Government the amount of $439,000,000. Where do you suppose he would get the cash? The outcome would be the Government taking over his plant.

Frankly, I think that Mr. Ford can make better Fords and Lincoln Zephyrs than Mr. Tommy Corcoran, Mr. Benny Cohen, or Mr. Harry Hopkins.

Now, where does this bill come from? The New Deal has set up the Securities and Exchange Commission to prevent just such trading in our securities markets as would occur with the liquidation necessary under this bill. It has similar control of the commodities markets to prevent panics there.

The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy have expressed opposition to the bill on the ground that it would bring about economic dislocation in time of war. The heads of these departments are what have come to be known as conservatives in the New Deal.

The bill, then, apparently comes from the radical wing, those apostles of a philosophy that has brought this country's debt structure to the near breaking point, that has kept millions of our citizens idle for more than 6 years. They are the apostles of a spending policy which would inevitably throw this country into a socialized state. Is this not their purpose with this bill?

Admittedly there have been many influences operating in recent years to debilitate the American people. But they have not yet been pressed to the point where, if war should come, they would not be willing to finance it.

We had no trouble in financing the last war.

The first Liberty Loan was oversubscribed 52 percent, the second 54 percent, the third 39 percent, while the fourth, which was double any preceding issue, was oversubscribed 16½ percent.

The Senator is working on the assumption that what he and his New Deal associates call "financial tycoons" bring about wars for profit. There may have been immediate profits for American finance and industry as a result of the last war, but these communities along with the rest of the American people have long since learned that war simply does not pay.

The financial and business influences are not the ones who are now seeking to work us into a state of excitement. Nowhere, in fact, is anyone more fearful of war than those influences upon whom the new dealers have blamed all of our troubles.

The Senator has a very misleading and seductive approach to the bill. He says: "We draft the men; why not draft the dollars?" I am in favor of drafting the dollars of those able to pay.

If we should ever again be so unfortunate as to get into war, I believe that all the people of our Nation would bear their part of the burden. I have enough faith in the American people to believe they would be glad to make sacrifices at such a time.

We can do this through the drafting of excessive profits. We can do this by making every citizen contribute more heavily of his current income.

However, we should not endanger the little nest egg of the widows and orphans—we should not endanger the homes of our people, their farms, their businesses, and their savings.

This country simply cannot stand for the destruction of its productive energies at any time, most certainly not in time of war.

Senate bill 1650, sponsored by Senator LEE, would do just that.

Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM E. BORAH, OF IDAHO

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an able and eloquent speech delivered last evening by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] over the National Broadcasting System hook-up.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, 2 weeks of debate have enabled us to realize the real issue involved in the proposed repeal of the present embargo law. The term "neutrality" is no longer used except as a matter of convenience or through habit. It is now fully recognized and very generally admitted that the pending bill is not a neutrality measure at all. It was not so designed. It is not so understood. And, if it becomes a law, it will not be so administered. I do not mean to imply that the President will not administer the law in accordance with its terms, but its terms will not require administration upon the basis of neutrality. The bill is in fact legislation providing, in effect, for intervention in a great European struggle for power, in the hope by some and the belief of others, but not all, that we will be able to take part in this struggle under such terms and conditions as will enable us to escape the more serious sacrifices of war. It is the theory of the bill and its supporters that we can furnish arms, munitions, and implements of war to one side and counsel and advise with them and yet avoid such involvement as will call for armies and navies. Two weeks of debate have torn the mask of neutrality from the face of intervention, and it is from that dubious countenance we must seek to read our future. If the bill becomes a law, the problem will no longer be how we can avoid intervention, how we can avoid taking sides—that will have been settled in the very fact of our furnishing arms, munitions, and implements of war to one of the groups of nations—but the problem will be can we, will we, be able to limit intervention so as to keep our young men out of Europe; will the demands of intervention be satisfied with arms, munitions, and implements of war, or will these demands call for armies?

The problem, therefore, with which we must concern ourselves is, What are the risks which intervention will impose? It may be possible to limit the risks of intervention to the use of arms, munitions, and implements of war. I can imagine conditions under which it would be possible—such, for instance, as an agreement between Germany and Great Britain similar to that at Munich. But if war continues and the struggle for power, as it now appears, reaches for permanency as between these two nations, it seems almost impossible that we shall be able to limit the risk to the supply of arms, munitions, and implements of war. It is at least a gamble, a frightful gamble, in human blood and human life. It is a hazard which no nation ought to take without the most immediate and commanding reason.

When the supporters of this measure advocate its passage for the avowed purpose of blasting from power a government of 80,000,000 people, of destroying in some way a leader of signal ability, however reprehensible may be his views, all these things present to me a scene of human sacrifice, the fearful shedding of human blood. These things which it is said are the justification for the passage of the bill are not things achieved in any other way than that of war—of the use of manpower and every means known to modern war. A great nation, great in energy, in industrial power, in fighting capacity, in devotion to country, is not easily destroyed or conquered. It calls for fearful sacrifices. If those who lightly announce such to be the justification for intervention will weigh closely the lessons of experience, they will not doubt that they are indicating already a task which means a vast sacrifice of wealth, treasure, and blood. Yet these are the suggestions talked over already.

Once we are a part of the conflict, however limited in the beginning, once having taken sides, is it not hazardous to suppose that we can stay the usual course of war or choose our own methods in waging it? Can we win in such a game? Is it worth while? Is there any justification for taking such a chance? If we take a gamble of that kind, the enemy should be our enemy, the war should be our war, it must be our Government which has been assailed, our country invaded, and our people whose lives are threatened.

Let us consider some of the powerful influences which are already unleashed and determined to take us into the European war should this war continue for any length of time and which influences will be greatly strengthened and greatly advantaged by the removal of the embargo. Do we so soon forget or so magnanimously overlook the fact that the British Government was opposed from the beginning to our embargo law and that from the hour of its passage until the present time the political forces of that Empire have exerted all possible influence to break it down and destroy it, a work in which they are even now actively engaged? These influences were determined that we should not establish a policy of neutrality as against European wars.

I could bring to you a volume of facts and evidence to sustain this statement. But, in the interest of time, one instance must suffice. I quote from a noted British authority. Speaking of the neutrality acts which we passed in 1935 and 1937, acts which our Secretary of State declared and the American people believed were greatly to our advantage in keeping us out of European embroilments, this person declared: "It (the United States) created in the Neutrality Act what it hoped would be a watertight system for preventing the United States from being drawn by economic causes, or the popular bogeys, foreign propaganda, or 'Wall Street' finance into another war. It would not take sides in any future conflict; it would not sell implements of war to any belligerent; and those who traded with the United States in time of war would only be able to do so on the cash-and-carry plan. The whole of this house of cards was fatally undermined during the last week in September," and so forth. No more respectable term than a "house of cards" could be found for a plan which our President, our Secretary of State, the Congress, and the American people looked upon as of transcendent worth to the Nation. Similar statements involving repeated attacks upon the whole traditional foreign policy of this country might be quoted.

The person who wrote this attack upon the law, the national policy of this Nation, was Lord Lothian, who is now the British Ambassador in Washington, in daily touch and consultation with our Government; and, if reports be true, is most active in advancing reasons why this law should be repealed. With some degree of pride he must look down from the Senate gallery, if he deigns to visit that humble scene, and note the progress toward repeal of a law he so early and boldly denounced. This attack by a foreign power upon a law purely domestic, placed upon our statute books in the belief that it would help to protect our people against involvement in foreign wars, continued from its enactment. Eminent divines came here to speak to us on the subject of how selfish and un-Christianlike we were in our effort to stay out of war. Scholars came to lecture to us as to how America could best serve humanity. All to the end that not only should we not seek to be neutral in any matter in which Great Britain was involved, but that we could not be. From this source came those fatalistic teachings and preachings that we must inevitably be involved in all European wars of any moment. The embargo law, when it passed the Congress, seemed as firmly entrenched in the hearts and minds and purposes of the American people as any law which one can recall. But it was assailed as viciously and falsely by foreign nations as if it had of itself been an attack upon them instead of an effort to bring peace and security to our own people.

What will be the situation should the embargo law be repealed? This first step will have been taken in our entrance into the European war. We will be furnishing arms to one side, intentionally so, and, as arms, munitions, and implements of war are vital factors in war, we will have become a part of the war. The second step will call for further cooperation, as it is euphoniously called.

One of the leading journals of the British Empire states the matter succinctly when it says: "The arms-embargo clause of the Neutrality Act will be repealed for a starter, and the United States of America will be in the war along about the middle of next January." Thus is stated briefly as investigation will show the views entertained throughout the British Empire.

In a letter written by an English father, which I had the opportunity of reading, it is said: "Why should the American boy be considered in any different light than the English boy? The English boy is fighting for civilization. Why should not the American boy take his place alongside of him? He should, and I venture to say he will before long, take his place in this war alongside of the youth of Great Britain. We are all fighting to save democracy."

In another letter written to me from Surrey, England: "This fight is as much yours as it is ours. And may you be forgiven—referring to me—for your betrayal of mankind, not only now, but in the past." Another letter to me from London says: "You evidently suffer under the illusion that the United States is already a Nation. That is not so. She is at present but a commercial institution, as was proved in the last war. Were she a Nation, she would be now fighting by the side of the Allies."

From public men, from private citizens, from the press, the sentiments and the opinions in both England and France are to the effect that we should, after repealing the embargo, move at once with our forces of manpower and do, as one of our distinguished Senators on the floor said a few days ago, end the controversy quickly.

The same influences, the same British leaders, the same argument, the same basis of reasoning, organized and used against our determination not to send arms to Europe, are already organized and will be used persistently against our determination not to send men to Europe.

We do not need to wait and watch these influences, these forces, get into action. They are already in action, and experience and observation ought to have taught us long ago that the power which they exert is not to be lightly regarded. It is true we now declare we will not send our boys to Europe. But can we make a more solemn pledge not to send our boys to Europe than the pledge which we made not to send arms to Europe? The pledge not to send arms to Europe was because we thought it would help to avoid sending men to Europe. If we now repeal the law, have we not removed one of the barriers which we solemnly declared was erected for the purpose of keeping our boys out of Europe? It is true that men will stand up and say: "I will never vote to send our boys into another European war." But is it not equally true they stood up and declared and voted we would never send arms to Europe. When we surrender the first post, we make it more difficult to hold the second post. When we begin sending arms, we make it more difficult not to send men. What war, and the propaganda for war, will do to high-minded and determined men no one can guess. By repealing the embargo for the purpose of aiding England and France, we pledge in moral effect whatever it is necessary to provide in order to insure the victory of England and France.

But in another respect the situation will be deeply aggravated, and our security greatly endangered by repeal. So long as the embargo stands, we have done our utmost to invite the retaliation of no nation. We permit the shipment of arms to no people. But when the embargo is lifted, we permit the shipment of arms but permit the shipment to one group of nations only. No one longer disputes but that under the terms of the pending bill and the facts the lifting of the embargo operates to the advantage exclusively of one group, and that that is the purpose of the bill. Nevertheless, men will grimly declare: Neutrality is untouched.

What is it we are shipping, or permitting to be shipped, to this one group? It is things fit for nothing on earth except to maim and to kill. We are shipping, or permitting to be shipped, among other things, poison gas and such things as are peculiarly fitted for the destruction of women and children. What does that mean? It means hate; it means retaliation; it means that in the hearts and minds of 80,000,000 people we are to be just as bitterly hated as are those who fire the guns upon the field or in the trenches. We are inviting trouble, such trouble as is most likely to rush our young men to the battlefield, as happened 20 years ago. The ruthless retaliation of the Germans and the shrewd and persistent propaganda of the British could put us into the war overnight, and largely by reason of the very things which we are doing in the way of taking sides in the controversy. Why invite such a situation? Why take the chances? Why ask a million young men to commit their future, their health, their hopes and aspirations, their lives, to such chances thus aggravated by our own willingness to gamble on the question of whether we can keep out of the war after we are part of the way in? What, in the name of reason, in the name of a just God, drives us to take such chances with those whom fate and circumstances have for a brief season entrusted to our care and committed to our protection? Hitler—yes; he can gamble with the happiness and the lives of his 80,000,000 people. Stalin can place his 160,000,000 human beings in pawn while he trifles with their destiny. You have doubtless observed with horror, as I have, the trading of peoples about in Europe, lining them up in one place or the other, like dumb, driven cattle on the way to the pens of slaughter. In such way and in such fashion men who have seized power carry on in the sight of the world at the present time. But not so in a republic or a democracy. There the people have a right to speak and in time they will.

There came to my office here in Washington last Wednesday a committee from one of our great eastern colleges. I observed they displayed on their vests some kind of a button. I asked what this button represented. They said it represented independence. I inquired: Independence of what? They said: Independence of Europe. We want a chance to establish our own principles, to live our own lives, without being constantly threatened and harassed by the schemes and ambitions of those to whom we owe no allegiance. I thought it magnificent, and, after complying with their request, sent them on their way. I hope they will organize every precinct in the United States. If we are to escape being drawn into these imperialistic wars of Europe, it will only be through the eternal vigilance of our young men, those who must bear the burden if we become involved.

There is another phase of this subject to which I am bound to call attention tonight. It may be regarded as too late to have further relevancy. But for my own satisfaction I wish to speak of it. Last week there issued from an investment securities firm at 120 Broadway, New York City, a business pamphlet containing, among other things, the following: "Without steel modern war would be impossible—airplanes, tanks, artillery, armor plate, battleships, shells, torpedoes, barbed wire are all principally made of steel. * * * Steel companies, during the last war, were swamped with business which proved highly profitable to them and to their stockholders. * * * Steel stocks have always been among the first to respond to the stimulus of war buying. * * * We have prepared reports on three very attractive steel stocks."

There you have it. The making of money, winning huge profits, building palatial homes out of the suffering, the sacrifices, and the blood of our fellow men and at a time when we have no war with anyone. Whatever else results from repeal—there may be disputes about other things—but that by repeal we return to the war-profit business, the manufacture and sale of armaments for mass murder, there is, there can be, no dispute. That is one of the indisputable results of repeal.

We rejoiced in 1937, the people rejoiced, when we declared that never again would our peace-loving, Christian people seek to make profits out of the wars of other peoples. But we are going back to the old business. And for what? Why? Is this in the interest of the morals, the safety, the security, or the honor of the American people?

During the debate on the pending bill constant reference has been made to nazi-ism, to its teachings and practices, and its menace to civilization. It has been argued that we should send arms and munitions to Europe to destroy nazi-ism and do away with its leader. We may send munitions and arms to Europe, but they will not be used to destroy nazi-ism. They will be used to settle questions of territory and of power. Propaganda may succeed in making nazi-ism the issue of this war in the United States. But it is not the issue in Europe. It never has been the issue in Europe. I venture to believe it never will be. It serves well as an argument with some to justify our sending arms and munitions to Britain and France. But both Britain and France make it perfectly clear that these arms and munitions will not be used in dealing with nazi-ism, wiping that stain off the map, as is contended, but in holding territory and in retaining political power. Reading the replies of Daladier, the Prime Minister of France, and of Chamberlain, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, to Hitler's proposal for peace, the issue becomes perfectly clear. It is territory, it is political power, not nazi-ism. Nazi-ism has had no better friend since coming into power than the Government of Great Britain. I do not include France, because France has often held back in favoring nazi-ism. Neither do I mean to say that the English people believe in the philosophy of nazi-ism.

But I do mean to say, and most sincerely assert, that from the first entrance of Hitler and his theory of government upon the scene in Europe, they have had the friendliest support of the British Government until the break came over questions of territory and power. Openly and repeatedly the British Government has declared, or made plain, that the questions of "isms" and ideologies and Nazi theories of life and government are not the issues in this controversy. Mr. Chamberlain so declared in plain terms. The British Government connived at the repudiation by Hitler of the military provisions in the Versailles Treaty. It especially agreed to the starting of the building of the German Navy. It urged France to disregard its treaty for the protection of Czechoslovakia that Hitler might obtain Czechoslovakia. It not only consented to, but connived at, Hitler's seizure of Austria. I repeat, this friendly relationship never ceased until the break came over the questions of territory and power. Even at the time we were writing and passing the present neutrality law, Great Britain and Germany were upon the friendliest of terms. The moral question, the question of liberty, or democracy, were never involved during all this period. Of all of these things and for all of these doings, for all this harlotry with the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi Government, it would be irrelevant, if not improper, to speak, because they are none of our concern, if it were not for the fact that we are now urged to regard the issue as Hitler, as nazi-ism, as democracy, as liberty. When it comes to crying out against nazi-ism for obvious purposes in the United States and as a justification for our sending arms and munitions—and later will be made a justification for sending our boys—we are fully justified in resolving the controversy into its real issue. What we are really doing is mixing in a purely territorial, or power, problem in Europe.

Yes; destruction of nazi-ism, of the preservation of democracy and liberty and of free government, are telling subjects with which to arouse the American people. They love liberty and are devoted to free government. But these things as issues in this conflict do not extend beyond the 3-mile limit. It is wholly a foreign war in its origin, in its nature, and in its objective. We are being controlled by wholly foreign problems and foreign conditions—not American problems; not American interests. We are plunging into the very heart of Europe and seizing hold of European problems, to take part in those ancient quarrels and controversies and wars which have divided and torn that continent for decade upon decade.

It was the conviction of two of the greatest statesmen the world has ever known, Washington and Jefferson, that to involve this Nation in European political problems was to undermine and ultimately destroy the whole scheme of our free institutions. They made this conviction the basis of our foreign policy. They regarded such a foreign policy as essential to our independence and to the liberty of our people as the Federal Constitution itself. Give us an American policy, a policy suitable to American institutions and conforming at all times to American ideals. Within its scope and sublime purpose may be found one of the guaranties of independence and security for our own Nation and every duty and obligation we owe to every other nation.

History of Embargo Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY W. B. HESSELTINE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by W. B. Hesseltine, associate professor of history at the University of Wisconsin, entitled "How Much History Does Franklin Roosevelt Know?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW MUCH HISTORY DOES FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT KNOW?

(By W. B. Hesseltine, associate professor of history, University of Wisconsin)

President Roosevelt, speaking for repeal of the embargo, told Congress 3 weeks ago that American policy to belligerent nations had, "with one notable exception," been based on international law. Assuming the role of historian—which he has often done before—he informed the assembled lawmakers that:

"The single exception was the policy adopted by this Nation during the Napoleonic wars, when, seeking to avoid involvement, we acted for some years under the so-called embargo and nonintercourse acts. That policy turned out to be a disastrous failure. First, because it brought our own Nation close to ruin, and, second, because it was the major cause of bringing us into active participation in European wars in our own War of 1812. It is merely reciting history to recall to you that one of the results of the policy of embargo and nonintercourse was the burning in 1814 of part of this Capitol in which we are assembled."

Mr. Roosevelt, in "merely reciting history" to bolster his argument, lays himself open to two questions: First, is he correct in drawing a parallel between the present and the Jeffersonian embargo law, and second, how much history does he know?

What Mr. Roosevelt neglected to tell Congress was that the Embargo Act of 1807 was Thomas Jefferson's contribution to American diplomacy. Mr. Roosevelt has not hesitated to identify himself as the spiritual heir of the founder of the Democratic Party. Moreover, President Roosevelt failed to point out that the only similarity between the embargo of 1807 and the arms embargo of 1935 was in the name. In purpose, in provision, and in operation the two acts were totally dissimilar.

In 1935, when the present arms embargo was enacted, the nations of Europe were nominally at peace, and the congressional enactment was the product of careful consideration. In 1807, when Jefferson proposed an embargo, England and France were locked in mortal combat. Napoleon, whom the British regarded in much the same light as they now consider Hitler, had established himself as master of continental Europe. England, weak on land, had constituted herself the all-but-undisputed mistress of the seas.

Since neither England's Army nor Napoleon's Navy was able to strike an effective blow, the two belligerents settled down to a long economic warfare. England planned to starve France by cutting off all trade with the rest of the world. Napoleon, believing that the English were a nation of shopkeepers, thought he could destroy England's commerce by closing continental ports. In the situation thus created American shippers saw an opportunity, and for a time they profited enormously. But as the lines of battle became tighter the Americans found their commerce in a bad way. The English maintained a "paper blockade" of the coast of France, while Napoleon seized any American ship which escaped the roving British blockade squadron.

Contrary to Mr. Roosevelt's statement, the American position was not a departure from international law. President Jefferson protested to both belligerents against the restrictions they imposed upon legitimate neutral commerce. Moreover, the short-handed British Navy began to impress American seamen. When, in June 1807, a British man-of-war, the Leopard, overhauled the American frigate Chesapeake and took off four sailors, the American people demanded war.

But Thomas Jefferson had a deep-seated aversion to war, and he believed that since both belligerents (Britain and France) were dependent upon neutral trade, they would withdraw their illegal regulations. In no sense was this policy a departure—as Historian Roosevelt implies—from traditional American practices. It was an effort to use economic pressure to enforce international law. The embargo was Jefferson's alternative to war and was an attempt to use reason and economic pressure instead of arms as instruments of national policy.

In the Embargo Act of 1935 Congress forbade the shipment of arms and munitions from the United States to any belligerent. Jefferson's embargo stopped all shipping—with fellow neutrals as well as with belligerents—of all American products. American ships might not leave port. These regulations brought hardships upon the shipping centers. Federalist New England began to cry that the Jeffersonian policy was ruining the country; that too many sailors were thrown out of work; and that grass was growing on the wharves in New England. After the election of 1808 Congress repealed the embargo.

The repeal of the Embargo Act immediately brought confusion. The mistake of the embargo had been that it stopped all foreign trade. Under President Madison's leadership, Congress enacted a nonintercourse act which opened trade with the rest of the world but prohibited it with France and England. Under this act American commerce sought new markets, increased trade with Latin America, and enterprising captains sought new routes to the Orient. But after a year of nonintercourse neither England nor France had yielded to the American pressure. Impatient for immediate results, Congress passed an act known as Macon's bill No. 2, which opened trade with both belligerents but authorized the President to reestablish nonintercourse for either of the warring nations if the other would withdraw its restrictions on American commerce.

The mistake of Macon's bill No. 2 was that it descended from the high plane which the embargo and nonintercourse had occupied and offered the aid of the United States to whichever belligerent would withdraw its restrictions. Napoleon deceived the United States by pretending to withdraw his decrees. That he secretly restored them was unknown to President Madison. Under the unwise law, Madison had no choice but to restore nonintercourse with England.

The effect of this unneutral act was to anger the English, but they at once attempted to reopen negotiations with the Americans, who, however, insisted upon a complete withdrawal of the orders in council. England refused on the ground that Napoleon had not really withdrawn his decrees. Finally, however, the American policy, vacillating as it had been, began to have the effect which Jefferson had foreseen. The British began to feel the loss of American produce and food. So on June 16, 1812, the Cabinet withdrew the orders in council. The policy of Jefferson was vindicated. Economic coercion as an agent of national policy had brought the mistress of the seas to recognize American rights.

This is the policy which Mr. Roosevelt told Congress "turned out to be a disastrous failure." It was a failure, says the President, "first, because it brought our own Nation close to ruin; and, second, because it was the major cause of bringing us into the War of 1812." Once again President Roosevelt proves to be an inaccurate historian. Had he even consulted that good Democratic historian, Claude G. Bowers, the President would have discovered that most of the "ruin" brought on by Jefferson's embargo existed in the minds of the Federalist Party. More grass grew upon the wharves in Federalist campaign speeches, according to Bowers' Jefferson in Power, than ever grew on Boston's water front.

But there was a war of 1812. On that point Mr. Roosevelt is absolutely correct. But there is not a reputable historian in America who does not know that the embargo and nonintercourse were not "the major cause of bringing us into active participation in European wars."

Drafting Wealth in Time of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CHAN GURNEY, OF SOUTH DAKOTA, OCTOBER 22, 1939

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a radio address delivered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] on October 22, 1939, on the subject of the Lee bill, providing for drafting wealth in time of war.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

First of all I would like to say that in the event our country is ever attacked—which I seriously doubt—there will absolutely be no difficulty in raising sufficient money to adequately defend our shores. By passing this bill, Congress would admit there would be difficulty and that would be an admission that our system of government is a failure. For a defensive war, you know and I know, that all the resources of every man, woman, and child would be immediately volunteered.

I am wondering if this proposed system of compulsory loaning is anything but a system of state socialism. The government takes what it wants from your farm, factory, home, or savings, and then tells you you can live and support your family on what remains. If this bill were passed and ever called into use, would it not be but a short step for the Government to take absolute control of your person and worldly goods and dole back to you the bare necessities of life? Let us not try to cover it up by the use of fine-sounding phrases such as "promoting peace" and "strengthening our national defense"—things we all want. As for me, I believe the American people want, and are determined to keep, their system of free enterprise and individual liberties.

The bill provides "the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time determine the sums that will be necessary to prosecute to a successful conclusion, any war, etc." When are we to determine when any war is to be successfully concluded? Is any war successfully concluded when an armistice has been declared, or is it when a treaty of peace has been signed, or is it when the armies have been demobilized, or is it when the last veteran of the war has died and the last pension has been paid? If the latter is to be the standard, then we have not yet successfully concluded our last three wars.

The bill declares, of course, that the compulsory borrowing power shall not be exercised after the President proclaims the termination of the war. This is just another sweeping delegation of power to the Chief Executive. I do not believe the people want any President to have such a tremendous amount of power. What if a President did not choose to proclaim the termination of the war? Could Congress compel him to do so? Can we be certain we would ever regain our liberties if this act were adopted?

We have heard many noted men say that strength in arms is not always decisive in war; that the higher the morale of the people, the greater the chances of their eventual success. This bill, with its compulsory liquidation of individual property, would strike directly at our national morale.

We can never lose sight of the fact that we must have a sound and smoothly functioning economy in order to supply our soldiers at the front and our civil population at home. To me this bill would so seriously upset our domestic economy that we would be unable to supply our troops with food, clothing, armaments, airplanes, and in fact, all the things that are vitally necessary in conducting a war.

Our people should study this bill from all angles and not be swayed by emotional appeals such as "if we can draft men, we must draft dollars," and "dollars are no more valuable than the life of a mother's son." Of course, dollars are not, and no man says they are. We must study this bill on the basis of determining what effect it will have on our national welfare, and not from the viewpoint of achieving an elusive ideal.

The bill we are talking about is intended to force the purchase of Government bonds at the beginning of a war. I believe it is not necessary and would not in any way tend to keep us out of war, which could be the only real reason for its enactment. I personally believe a much stronger preventative and a necessary measure for the proper financing of a defensive war would be a fair income-tax measure, taking for the Government's use a great portion of excessive war profits.

The census of property and its appraisal would be tremendously costly. Then various agencies for appraisal would be open to all sorts of political graft and corruption. The cost of administration would be far greater than the difference in interest rates provided for the new bonds and the interest rates paid for bonds purchased on a voluntary basis. The Government in all past wars has been able to raise all the money necessary for their conduct. By method of circular reasoning, the Lee bill accomplishes nothing more than the reduction of interest rates on Government bonds.

I think one of the best ways of showing up the fallacies of this bill is the fact that drafting dollars is not new; taxation is a drafting of dollars

The putting into effect of the provisions of this bill would cause disruption of our stock exchanges in forced liquidation. Further, it would be very unfair to have the appraised value taken as of one date and then the bond buyers forced to liquidate in a sellers' market.

In conclusion, let me say this bill should not even come up for consideration by Congress or the people at this time, because it is based entirely on the erroneous supposition that Congress may declare war. Right now there is a firm resolve held by all our people that we are not going to declare war. This sentiment is also held by every Senator and Congressman in Washington today.

Emergency Executive Powers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

TELEGRAM FROM FRANK GANNETT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a telegram from Mr. Frank Gannett addressed to several Senators, under date of October 2, 1939.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In view of the Senate's unanimous call for an official summary of the emergency powers of the Presidency, the National Committee To Uphold Constitutional Government considers it appropriate to give to Members of the Congress these observations and conclusions. The committee has been for some time searching the statutes covering the emergency powers.

Its research, completed September 23, disclosed unrepealed Executive powers shockingly inconsistent with peacetime needs in a democracy.

We commend the Senate for initiating what we hope will be an immediate and thorough reexamination of those powers. We urge both Houses of Congress to hasten action toward repealing all grants of power which might be used by the Executive to get the Nation into war without consent of the people's representatives.

The President, acting within one of these unrepealed grants, has declared that an emergency exists. He describes it as a "limited" emergency. However, there is no statutory authority for a "limited" emergency. Any emergency proclaimed by the President is legally a complete emergency.

It shocked us, as it will shock the American people, to discover that, by declaring that an emergency exists, the President now can take advantage of a clause in the Federal Communications Act of June 1934. Under that act, in a state of emergency, the President has absolute, unlimited power to stop free speech over the radio at home. He can take over the entire radio broadcasting of the Nation. He can suppress public discussion by radio of views contrary to his own. He can seize any or all broadcasting stations and turn them over to any department of the Government, for example, to Secretary Ickes, to be run as instruments of administration propaganda.

Hitler has the same power, and no more, over radio in Germany, and he used it to gain a dictator's throne. Stalin has the same control in Russia, Mussolini in Italy. Control of radio has been a stepping stone to dictatorship in Europe; it is too dangerous to be permitted in America, and especially so when decisions vital to the Nation must be made, as now.

Besides seizing and operating or suppressing any or all radio stations, the President, under the most important of his present emergency powers, can do any of the following:

Close all banks in the Nation.

Close every stock exchange and forbid for 90 days at a time the sale of all stocks and bonds.

Prohibit the export of coal or other war materials.

Restrict travel between the United States and foreign countries.

Suspend the 8-hour law on Federal contracts.

Within certain limits, further revalue the dollar.

Reduce the weight of the standard silver dollar.

Commandeer all silver now in the hands of the people, as gold was commandeered in 1934.

Regulate the rates of exchange of all foreign currencies and the amount of such currencies that American citizens may acquire.

The President has already stated that he may prevent shipment of certain war materials such as manganese, crude rubber, and tin. This comes under the power to prohibit export of coal and other war material. The authority is in an unrepealed joint resolution of April 22, 1898. The President has not asked to have this power taken away from him, although he asks Congress to surrender to him its power to embargo shipments of war materials.

It is a debatable but not a constitutional issue whether return to international law would lessen or increase the chances of drawing the United States into war. We are not discussing it here. But we are positive in our conviction that the surest safeguard for American peace is in a Congress responsive to the will of the people. No matter who the President may be, he should not have the unlimited powers which these unrepealed statutes leave in his hands.

As a group of citizens pledged to uphold constitutional government, our present concern is with keeping our country out of war. For we know that war must be prosecuted with dictatorial power, and the tide toward dictatorship is running so strong throughout the world that we fear to surrender our liberties even for a period of emergency, the end of which no one can foresee.

Therefore we repeat our urgent request for reconsideration and prompt repeal of all Executive powers not essential to national defense. The fact that any one man possesses absolute dictatorial power over radio in America has, in our judgment, created a national emergency more immediate and far more dangerous than any other emergency the Nation now faces.

FRANK GANNETT,
Chairman, National Committee To Uphold Constitutional Government.

Mink Imports

OF
HON. STEPHEN BOLLES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 23, 1939

LETTERS FROM CONSTITUENTS

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, one of the important industries of the United States is that of the propagation of animals for fur. We have built up in the last few years a very large business in the raising of mink. This industry, however, is in great danger because of the importation of mink skins from foreign countries, particularly from Canada. I ask that two letters on the subject be placed in the RECORD.

Hon. STEPHEN BOLLES,
Janesville, Wis.:

I would like to call your attention to the fact that large shipments of mink skins are made from foreign countries.

These mink skins will be shipped to this country in tremendous quantities and will be dumped on our markets, causing fur prices to slump to very low levels, and ruining our mink and fur industry, which has grown to be quite important to our State.

Immediate or decisive action should be taken to put a tariff on mink skins in order to save the industry and keep it on a paying basis.

Mink imports for the first 6 months of 1938 were 631,945 skins—almost three times as many as were raised in the United States in 1938. It costs from $7 to $9 to raise a mink for pelt. And the average mink pelt sold through the American National Fox and Fur Breeders Association brought $10.04.

Now, with the European war in progress France and England, no doubt, will not be buying furs. Therefore they must all be used in this country.

Hoping you will help us all you can, I remain,

Very cordially yours,

LOUIS HORSTMAN.

OCTOBER 20, 1939.

Hon. STEPHEN BOLLES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I am writing you at this time to protest the fact that under the Canadian Trade Agreement raw mink pelts are listed as one of the items on the free list. You probably will know that the mink-ranching industry in the United States is in a very precarious condition at the present time, due mainly to overproduction, and if the estimated crop of 175,000 Canadian ranch mink pelts are allowed unrestricted entry into this country it will throw the whole industry into a state of chaos and probably will result in absolute disaster to thousands of our deserving American mink ranchers.

Therefore we appeal to you and beg that you use your offices to the end that a fair limit or quota be placed upon such imports from Canada, these figures to be based upon a fair average of Canadian imports of mink pelts into this country during the 5-year period preceding and up to December 31, 1938, as per official records of the United States customs.

Very sincerely yours,

F. LAURENCE QUINN,
109 South Fourth Street, Delavan, Wis.

Transfer of Alaska to the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, October 24, 1939

ARTICLE BY CLARK SQUIRE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Clark Squire, of Seattle, Wash.:

Seventy-two years ago today the flag of Russia was flying for the last time on the American Continent, where it first had been planted in 1741 by that daring Dane, Vitus Jonassen Bering, explorer for Peter the Great and for Empress Catherine.

After waving for 131 years over Russian America, the imperial emblem bearing a double-headed eagle was hauled down from a 90-foot pine pole and was replaced by Old Glory, with its 37 stars.

The exchange was made at 3:30 p. m. on October 18, 1867, at New Archangel, now known as Sitka.

Afterward the territory which the United States bought for $7,200,000, and which had been known as Russian America, was designated officially by Congress as Alaska.

The ceremony was held in the presence of the United States and Russian commissioners, Brig. Gen. Lovell H. Rousseau and Capt. Alexis Petschouroff, of the Russian Imperial Navy, who had traveled together from Washington, D. C., via Panama and San Francisco.

Unaccustomed to ocean voyages, the general found it to be a tough trip. "I suffered greatly from seasickness," he confessed in his official report to Secretary of State William H. Seward, explaining why the course of the U. S. S. Ossipee was changed to the inside passage.

PLEASANT PASSAGE

Back in Portland on December 5 he wrote the Secretary as follows:

"After a pleasant passage, taking it altogether, we cast anchor in the harbor of New Archangel on the 18th of October at 11 o'clock a. m., where we found the troops and supplies had preceded us several days.

"The day was bright and beautiful. We landed immediately and fixed the hour of three and a half o'clock that day for the transfer."

At 3 p. m. 250 soldiers, commanded by Gen. Jefferson C. Davis, went ashore from the U. S. S. Jamestown and the U. S. S. Reseca and marched up the hill to the residence of Prince Dmitri Maksontoff, thirteenth successor to Alexander Andreevich Baranof, as chief manager of the Russian American company. A company of Russian soldiers marched up and took a position at the left of the flagpole.

Then a color guard, consisting of a lieutenant, a sergeant, and 10 men, came forward with a flag which General Rousseau had brought from Washington.

SIX AMERICAN WOMEN

Russian and American citizens and some Indians moved in close. Among those witnessing the ceremony were six American women (wives of officers) and as many Russian women, including Princess Maksontoff.

Arrangements had been made for the firing of national salutes, the Ossipee and a Russian battery on the wharf to fire alternate shots.

"The troops, being promptly formed, were brought to a present-arms, the signal given to the Ossipee, and the ceremony was begun by lowering the Russian flag," General Rousseau continued in his report. "As it began its descent down the flagstaff, the battery of the Ossipee, with large 9-inch guns, led off in the salute, peal after peal crashing and re-echoing in the gorges of the surrounding mountains, answered by the Russian battery.

FLAG GETS STUCK

"But the ceremony was interrupted by the catching of the Russian flag in the ropes attached to the flagstaff. The soldier who was lowering it, continuing to pull at it, tore off the border by which it was attached, leaving the flag entwined tightly around the ropes. The flagstaff was a native pine, perhaps 90 feet in height.

"In an instant the Russian soldiers, taking different shrouds attached to the flagstaff, attempted to ascend to the flag * * * but they soon became tired * * * and finally came to a standstill."

The general described how one Russian was hoisted in a "boatswain's chair." Upon freeing the flag the man dropped it below and it fell on the bayonets of the Russian soldiers.

Then the Stars and Stripes was hoisted, and the salutes were repeated, the Russian battery firing first.

FORMAL TRANSFER

"The salutes being completed," the general's report continued, "Captain Petschouroff stepped up to me and said: 'General Rosseau, by authority from His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, I transfer to the United States the Territory of Alaska,' and in a few words I acknowledged the acceptance of the transfer and the ceremony was at an end. Three cheers were then spontaneously given for the United States flag by the American citizens present, although this was no part of the program, and on some accounts I regretted that it occurred."

For nearly three-quarters of a century that flag, with an increasing number of stars, has continued to fly over a Territory which has entertained hope of being represented by the forty-ninth star. Until recent years virtually no effort was made to provide for its defense.

Today, however, with modern Russia carrying her red flag westward in Europe and along the shores of the Baltic, the question is being raised whether she may not some day covet the rich Territory she sold for the cost of a couple of modern submarines. Adequate defenses for Alaska now are being demanded.

Also, an international highway to the Territory is under consideration. Survey parties have been collecting data. Commissions from the United States and Canada have been making studies. Congressman WARREN G. MAGNUSON points out that the project would cost less than a modern cruiser.

And from the standpoint of defense alone the highway would be of immensely greater value.

Congress may see fit to act at the coming regular session and keep America for Americans.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES L. GIFFORD

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Hon. A. Lawrence Lowell:

SEPTEMBER 30, 1939.

Hon. CHARLES L. GIFFORD,
Washington.

DEAR MR. GIFFORD: Any suggestions I have to make to you about the Neutrality Act are of little value, but you asked me to write them to you in Washington, and I do so for what they may be worth. I have thought much about the matter and have now read the bill prepared by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate.

There are three possible objects of such a bill:

(1) To keep us out of war. This desire is well-nigh universal among American citizens;

(2) Not to cut off arbitrarily from the free governments all possibilities of obtaining such supplies as it has hitherto been customary for belligerents to obtain from neutrals in time of war;

(3) To maintain so far as possible the status of neutrals in war. This last is, probably, out of the question at the present time, for there are now no recognized neutral rights whatever; and it is notable that since the close of the World War we have made no serious attempts by international negotiation to establish any such.

It may be observed that no statute or regulations can absolutely prevent the possibility of events that might cause our citizens to regard war as less evil than the alternative presented by some belligerent. The object of an act to keep us out of war should be to reduce the danger of wanton injury to our citizens and their property to the practicable minimum, and it seems to me that the proposed bill does so, for it makes the risk of maltreatment of our ships as small as possible unless they are restrained from going to sea at all.

On the other hand, to forbid entirely the customary purchase of munitions here by belligerents, although they pay for them, and carry them off under the cash-and-carry principle, although appearing equal is in fact detrimental, and practically hostile to the belligerents that control the surface of the sea. Such a trade is habitually carried on by most neutrals without causing reprisals, it cannot give rise to incidents that may lead to war, and to prohibit it would be under the circumstances a mistake. Therefore, it seems to me, for our country, the provisions of the first two sections of the bill are essentially wise; and I think, on reflection, the American public will, if they do not now, so believe.

As to some other less important provisions of the bill I have some doubts. For example: In Section 3 it is very well to forbid, that is to make unlawful, the travel of an American citizen through the combat areas in such a way that he has no claim to protection from our Government, but to impose a penalty on him for so doing seems to me going too far.

Section 4 as drawn seems to me unfortunate. It appears to prohibit the transportation by the American Red Cross of medical personnel, medical supplies, food and clothing for the relief of human suffering, unless a safe conduct is granted by the belligerents on both sides.

Again, in section 11, submarines and armed merchant vessels are placed on the same footing. In fact, submarines are only for attack, whereas the arms of merchant vessels are only for defense. It may be that there should be a method of regulating to some extent the armament of merchant ships leaving our ports, but they stand in quite a different position from submarines.

The proposed act confers less discretion on the President than its predecessor, and I think there are many things which had better be done by statute than by executive discretion. However, all these details are of slight importance compared with the main principle of the act, particularly the second section, which seems to me much worth adopting.

If I might make a further comment, which is not practicable politics at present: There might have been certain advantages in not trying to embrace the provisions for this war in a universal statute to apply to cases where they may not be applicable. There might be advantages in beginning a statute in some such way as this:

"Whereas, there exists a state of war between England and France on one side, and Germany on the other; and

"Whereas, it is the universal desire of the citizens of this country not to be drawn into the conflict: Now therefore

"Be it enacted, That during the continuance of the said war, etc., etc."

Yours very sincerely,

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.

Address at Annual Fathers' Dinner, Junior Cavalry of America

OF

HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND, OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me recently at the fathers' dinner of the Junior Cavalry of America:

It is indeed a pleasure to be invited to appear at the annual fathers' dinner of the Junior Cavalry of America, a bill for the incorporation of which I had the honor to sponsor in the Congress of the United States. I have always been and am vitally interested in boys' work and believe in the theory that the boy of today is the citizen of tomorrow. The training and ideals instilled in the minds of the youth while in the plastic stage will be reflected in those who will be charged with the carrying on of our country in the future when our job is done. Discipline, love of country, and respect for law is an undefeatable weapon in the combatting of foreign "isms" and crime. I only hope that in the years to come this organization will grow to be one of the outstanding boys' groups of the country and live to carry on its fine work. Again, might I say I am proud to be in the position to sponsor a bill for the Federal incorporation of this organization, formed and carried on by my good friend and commanding officer, Col. R. Potter Campbell, and you men who have unselfishly given of your time, money, and services.

In considering boys' work I know of no time since 1917 that the boys' future has been so vitally at stake. An error at this time might plunge this country into conflict and take away from us the very boys of whom we are now so proud. I refer to the pending neutrality legislation before the Congress of the United States, and in considering this question I do not want to appear to anyone to be speaking from a partisan angle or in any way influenced by partisan politics. In a question of the safety of our Nation politics have no place, because if war should occur, and God forbid that it does, we will all be soldiers of the United States fighting for a common cause and not members of a political party.

Before we can intelligently discuss the question we must first consider a brief history of neutrality. In 1937 the President exerted his influence to pass a bill known as the neutrality bill of that year, and it was acclaimed by all as legislation ideally worded and intended to keep us out of any conflict which might occur. That bill, briefly, provided that when the President shall find a state of war exists, he shall immediately issue a proclamation levying an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. I criticized that legislation, much against the protest of many of my friends, and criticized it mainly because it placed in the hands of the President the sole right to determine when powers might be at war. If you will recall, China and Japan, so far as we are concerned, have never been at war. They are only fooling, and therefore we can continue to ship arms, ammunition, and implements of war to either or both sides. I further criticized the bill because it left in the hands of the President the right to determine what the definition of "implements of war" might include. However, that bill was acclaimed by all as the last word in neutrality legislation and held by the President as the greatest move this country has made toward avoiding foreign entanglements. Yet within a short time after the present war broke out and the President saw fit to invoke the embargo, he issued a list of what he considered implements of war. Shortly thereafter an American ship was stopped by a German submarine and advised that if the ship carried contraband it would of necessity have to be sunk, and immediately Germany and England both issued a list of contraband, which included many more commodities than those listed by our President. This leaves us at the present time in a position of being able, so far as the law of this country is concerned, to ship commodities which might cause the sinking of an American boat.

In the spring of this year House Joint Resolution 306—known to the public as the Neutrality Act of 1939, to us in the House as the Bloom bill, and to the Senate as the Pittman bill—was introduced. That bill practically reenacted the present neutrality legislation with several changes, the main change being that it repealed the arms embargo and gave to the President the right to extend credit for a period of 90 days, in his own discretion, and to establish combat areas. It further prohibited American ships from entering the territorial waters of any belligerent country. In the opinion of a great many of us, this bill again gave to the President entirely too much power—and when I say President, I do not mean the present administration particularly, but any President, because, after all, it will be a law, if passed, and might be on the books for a long time to come, and it is too much power not only for the present President but for the President who will take office in 1940. We in this country talk of democracy and hold our heads high that we are under a democracy and criticize totalitarian states. Yet by our own act we turn around and give to our Chief Executive unprecedented powers. We have seen in Europe the fallacy of allowing one man too much power. Had it not been for that, there would be no war today. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have the sole power to declare war and to promulgate laws concerning embargoes, and why should the Congress deliver this power into the hands of one man? Washington and the framers of the Constitution realized that were this country to survive, it would be necessary to give such questions, going to the very root of our freedom and peace and prosperity, into the hands of the representatives of the people rather than to the executive department.

This bill passed the House in June of this year by two votes. It, however, carried three major changes. There was added in the first section the words "or Congress," where it provides that the President shall levy an embargo when he finds foreign nations at war. It also included an embargo on arms and ammunition only, and it struck from the bill the discretionary power given to establish combat areas. That bill was held up in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and in the extraordinary session just called the entire bill after the enacting clause was stricken and an ostensibly new bill presented, which was in substance the bill presented by Mr. BLOOM in the early spring with the House of Representatives amendments stricken from it.

Let us briefly consider the bill as it now stands. There is no embargo on any goods whatsoever, which leaves it open to this country to sell anything to the belligerent powers—arms, ammunition, poison gases, airplanes, or any weapon known to modern warfare. It does, however, restrict it from being shipped on American boats. You know and I know that Germany does not have available the ships to come over to our country to take delivery of anything it may purchase, yet Germany will not allow goods to be delivered in its enemies' ships for destruction of its own nationals, and the result would be in all probability sabotage and the blowing up of ships—true, not American ships, but, nevertheless, ships within sight and hearing of our own shores. Let us consider further, with the discretionary powers in the hands of the President to define and declare combat areas, he might, were he so inclined, declare a combat area around Italy but not around Canada, which in my humble judgment would be a decided unneutral act. There is another section in the bill that provides that title must pass to a foreign nation before goods can leave this country.

You who are lawyers will know that immediately upon payment for any commodity title passes to the purchaser, and there is nothing in the act to the contrary which would prevent Mr. Hitler, for example, from purchasing arms and ammunition, paying cash, taking title, and then advising that he cannot come over in his ships to procure such commodities, and suggesting that the vendor deliver such goods on American ships to Italy, where Mr. Hitler can procure them. Italy not being a belligerent, it is perfectly legal for our ships to make such delivery. You know and I know that England would not allow the delivery of arms and ammunition to her enemy, and for her own protection it would be necessary to take means to prevent such delivery, which might be entirely against the liking of some of our American citizens.

No Member of the House, including myself, has any idea of what form this bill may take before it reaches us, and it would be fallacy on my part to prejudge the case before it is presented. Therefore I am retaining an open mind upon the question until I see the bill in its final form.

I don't care what walk of life any of you come from or what your pleasures may be, but at one time or another, and perhaps even now, all of you enjoyed a football game, basketball, baseball, wrestling, or boxing, and whether you knew the contestants or not, or knew the organizations which they represented, as you watched that conflict you unconsciously, motivated by what you do not know but nevertheless definitely, let your sympathies go to one or the other and immediately made that side your champion. Maybe it was the type of uniforms they wore, the way they played, or maybe just the type of contestants, but nevertheless, as the game progressed, you became more and more in favor of that particular side and more and more incensed against imaginary wrongs committed by the other side, and finally, when the game was over, you were either cheered or depressed, depending upon whether your champion won or not. But, after all, it was only a game, and no matter which side you were on, it made no difference to the contestant.

No one was killed or injured, and the only ill effects suffered by anyone was perhaps your own sore throat from yelling lustily in favor of your own contestant or against his opponent, and today, with this tragic conflict seething abroad, everyone in this room, whether he will admit it or not, has unconsciously taken sides with one side or the other of the nations at war. As time goes on, you are cheered in your own heart when you read in the newspaper that something has occurred to benefit your champion, and you are incited into rage when you read of atrocities committed by the opponent of your champion. But friends, let us not forget that war is not basketball, football, boxing, or wrestling. It does not involve an athletic team—it involves the lives of humans, and if enthusiasm goes too far, it involves the lives of your friends and my friends.

Back in 1917, how many of us read the glaring posters on every corner, Join the Army and Save the World for Democracy, or A War to End Wars, and how many of us, inspired with that great principle, went down to the street corner and enlisted, and how many of the boys who were your neighbors and my neighbors marched down the main street in a nice new uniform with trumpets blaring and drums rolling to martial music, and crowds on the street corners waving flags and believing these boys were heroes, going to war to save you and me? And not many years afterward, how many of those people stood on the street corners and cheered when those boys came home? The ranks were thinned considerably, but nevertheless, in the eyes of those people, they were heroes. They had saved the world for democracy and had completed and won a war to end all wars, and yet, as those boys passed on and went into the next block, how many of those people who had cheered, forgot they even passed. Today, how many of those same people go to the veterans' hospital at Lyons, N. J., or Bath, N. Y., and go in and look at those cripples and slap them on the back and say, "Fellow, you did a good job."

Those kids had a future ahead of them, everything to live for, and they gave all they had. But nobody goes down there now; nobody pays any attention to them. That was in the past. How soon we Americans forget, and when veteran legislation was presented to care for those boys, what a cry went up in protest. It is fine to march down the street in a good-looking uniform, with a bright, shiny, new gun on your shoulder, and your heart full of conviction that you are doing the right thing. How stirred your breast is with the glamour of waving of flags and the cheering of crowds, but how soon that glamour is lost and you are lying in mud, filth, slime, and dirt, wondering whether the next bullet that comes over the trench has your name on it. There is no more glamour then. It is a grim reality. How cheap life is in the trenches. Many of you have seen it, many of you have been through it, and many of you wouldn't want to see it again.

I am a Reserve officer, as many of you are, and I am willing and ready to go if my country needs me. Europe has been at each other's throats since the beginning of the world in the fight for supremacy, and as long as we have 3,500 miles of deep blue ocean between us there is no reason why we should sacrifice our young manhood for someone else in their struggle for supremacy and greed for territory. Don't be misled by propaganda, and don't let your emotions carry you away. These kids, of whom we are so proud today, we must keep home and not send over to be slaughtered and sacrificed on the field of battle in a foreign nation.

Let us all give this question unbiased consideration with only one thought in mind—that we must not do anything that is going to cause our neighbors' kids and our kids to fight in a war that is at the present time none of our business.

The New Deal and the Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

EDITORIAL FROM THE HENRY COUNTY (OHIO) SIGNAL

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Henry County Signal, of Napoleon, Ohio:

[From the Henry County Signal (Napoleon, Ohio) of October 19, 1939]

As horrible and hateful as war is, many new dealers believe they see a silver lining in it for them. This is particularly true of the New Deal agricultural theorists and experimenters. To them the war seemed an avenue of escape from the devastating results of their own fallacious thinking and foolish acts.

In brief, these New Deal lads who have tried to make a guinea pig out of the American farmer rubbed their hands in glee over the prospect that the European war would pull them out of the hole into which they had fallen. Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace was so jubilant that he could not restrain himself from running to the radio and proclaiming, in effect, that "we planned it that way."

The first flush of jubilation within the Roosevelt administration inspired by the belief that the European war would solve our economic and agricultural problems, however, has worn rather thin. The hard and fast rules of economics—which the new dealers always disregard—have come into play, and it becomes apparent that these problems remain with us.

WHEAT PRICES STILL LOW

For instance, at this writing, the price of wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade is about 85 cents. So badly has the New Deal managed our agricultural economy that not even the impact of 1 month of a European war could raise wheat prices to a decent level. A price of 85 cents at Chicago is at least 10 cents more than it is on the farm, and a farm price of 75 cents a bushel for wheat is much less than the "dollar wheat on the farm" which the Democratic propaganda spokesman so glowingly promised last spring.

The price of corn at Chicago at this time hovers around 50 cents a bushel. Such a price is not even sufficient to loans of the last several years without loss. The same situation exists in regard to other major agricultural products. Perhaps the European war one of these days will get these prices up but it will be in spite of Henry Wallace's A. A. A. Nevertheless, we will hear the same old "hooey" about how the New Deal's farm program is succeeding.

Before the picture becomes blurred by the false claims of the New Deal propagandists it might be well to take a look backward and see exactly what the New Deal has done to the American farmer. In doing so, let's turn to an objective, nonpartisan source to get the facts.

FARMERS LOST TWELVE BILLIONS

Richard A. Staderman, president of the American Good Government Society, finds that during the "7 lean years" of President Roosevelt the American farmer has lost in income approximately $12,000,000,000, compared with the "7 fat years" before the advent of the Roosevelt New Deal. And heaven knows that several of those so-called fat years were none too fat for the farmers. Yet in spite of that the farmer fared far better before the Roosevelt administration than after.

Using figures of the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Mr. Staderman compiled the following table:

Total gross farm income, 1926 to 1932, inclusive	$73,718,000,000
Total gross farm income, 1933 to 1939, inclusive, and taking the maximum possible estimate for 1939	[1] 61,000,000,000
Total loss to American farmers during 1933–39, at least	12,718,000,000
Average loss to farmers per year since 1933, about	2,000,000,000

[1] This total included over $2,000,000,000 of Government payments to farmers during 1933–39.

"This is a most astonishing result: Over $12,000,000,000 loss to farmers during the last 7 years," writes Mr. Staderman. "Had it not been for payments by the Government to farmers this loss would have been $15,000,000,000 since 1933. While the conditions necessitated some Government aid for farmers, this was obviously at the expense of the general taxpayer.

RESULTS NO TESTIMONIAL FOR NEW DEAL

"The interesting point is that, in spite of Government payments larger than ever before, farm income declined. The results do not show up auspiciously for the combination of trade agreements, restriction of production, and commodity loans.

"It would seem far better to revise our policies so as to restore the higher farm incomes of the years 1926 to 1932, which included both prosperity and depression and hence a normal average income. If we could restore the 1926 to 1932 farm incomes, the farmer would have more income without asking for Government payments. Farmers are upright, independent citizens who prefer asking no favors of anyone, but they do insist upon their right to supply the American market with American-raised farm products."

Little more need be said in way of comment on Mr. Staderman's findings. His figures cannot be disputed and they speak for themselves. The loss in income cited by him means approximately $1,800 for each farm family in the land. Looking back over the last 7 years, what could you, Mr. Farmer, have done with $1,800 to improve the comfort and happiness of your family?

Importation of Foreign Pulp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

EDITORIAL BY CHARLES F. DAVIS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pulp & Paper Mill News of October 6, 1939:

[From the Pulp & Paper Mill News of October 6, 1939]

STOP FOREIGN IMPORTATION OF PULP

(By Charles F. Davis, president, Pacific Coast Pulp and Paper Mill Employees' Association and Capital Local 230, I. B. of P. M.)

Why the sudden prosperity in the pulp and paper industry on the Pacific coast? That is the question being asked by many thousands of employees in the pulp and paper industry on the Pacific coast, employees who have had part-time jobs, some having had no work in this line for the past 2 and 3 years. Why the sudden prosperity?

The answer generally accepted is that one Herr Hitler and his submarines are disrupting shipping of the foreign producers of cheap products and in this way the American manufacturers of pulp and paper on the Pacific coast have taken over the business that was formerly held by these foreign invaders, which rightfully belonged to the American manufacturer and American labor.

Was it necessary to have a war in order to have prosperity in the pulp and paper industry on the Pacific coast? Is there no way possible to stop foreign producers from dumping their cheap product on the American market in competition with American industry and American labor?

The year of 1937 witnessed the largest imports of wood pulp, paper, and paper products on record. Imports of wood pulp in 1937 increased 5.1 percent in tonnage to 2,394,539 tons, valued at $98,298,022, to set a new record for the third consecutive year.

Within 5 years United States wood-pulp imports have risen almost two-thirds in tonnage, and more than doubled in value. For a number of years past there has been a steady increase of pulp imports to America. Are we going to stand idly by and let this condition continue to exist in the future, permitting these foreign invaders to import their cheap product into America, forcing the American manufacturer to close his doors, placing the employees on relief rolls?

Accepting the war as the answer to why we are enjoying prosperity at the present time in the pulp and paper industry on the Pacific coast, do not overlook this point—war is only temporary; so goes our prosperity, also temporary; then what, after the war? Are we going to stop work again, and wait for another Hitler to come along and start another war?

It is my belief that we should make some effort to stop this foreign importing of pulp in the future, by asking Congress to take some action to correct this mistake, enacting legislation that will protect the American manufacturer and the American workman against these foreign producers. For, Mr. Businessman, and many thousand employees in the pulp and paper industry, that which hurts the pulp and paper industry also hurts you, for this is one of the largest industries on the Pacific coast. Are you in sympathy with such a move? We believe you are. Then let us get busy now, for the war may soon be over, and so will our prosperity.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

ARTICLE BY S. A. BALDUS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by S. A. Baldus, managing editor of Extension magazine, published in Chicago, Ill. The article appears in the November issue under the caption The Time Has Come and is as follows:

THE TIME HAS COME

WASHINGTON'S WARNING

"It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal, against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern; some of them in our own country, and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be, in any particular, wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance, in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can, at any time, yield." (From Washington's Farewell Address.)

On October 2 Senator PITTMAN submitted the House Joint Resolution 306, entitled "Neutrality Act of 1939," to Congress. It is known as the administration bill, and in it are incorporated the views and wishes of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull. The President has called Congress into extraordinary session for the specific purpose of enacting the bill into law.

It is possible that before what is written here appears in print, action, favorable or unfavorable, may have been taken by Congress. But even so, discussion of some of its essential features is opportune and important, for I do not recall any bill in the past 25 years that had so many fateful implications for the American people; nor a bill that contained so many confused points—so many angles, so many contradictions, so many obscurities and twistifications. Needless to say, I cannot enter upon a discussion of the bill in its entirety; I can at most touch briefly on a few of the more vital points.

To begin with, the President and the Secretary of State have declared that if the Pittman bill becomes law it will keep the United States out of the present European war. That may be their honest belief; a belief from which it is my privilege to dissent. Nor am I alone in this dissent, for a formidable number of Senators and Congressmen are on record as being opposed to the bill, basing their opposition on an equally honest belief that the Neutrality Act of 1939 instead of keeping us out of the European war will inevitably help to put us into the war. For if the truth must be told, the bill offered is not a neutrality bill, its apparent motive and undisguised purpose are to enable the United States to aid and abet the one side (Great Britain and France) as against the other (Germany and its potential allies). There can be no doubt on that score, for the President of the United States, the Secretary of State (and the author of the bill and its proponents), have practically admitted this; and, had I the time, I could advance an overwhelming array of unneutral actions and utterances that would prove this conclusively.

WHAT IS NEUTRALITY?

In international law neutrality is defined as "the complete abstention of a state from giving material aid or encouragement to either belligerent in an existing war. Legally a neutral state is a friend to both belligerents and endeavors to maintain peaceful relations with each * * *."

"Among the obligations of a negative character resting upon neutrals may be mentioned the duty of abstaining from furnishing money, ships, troops, or munitions to either belligerents * * *" (The New International Encyclopedia).

How do the commentators on international law define neutrality?

Let it be understood that I am not posing as one deeply versed in the subject of international law. I have some volumes dealing with the subject in my library, and every now and then when a question arises which makes it necessary that I consult such books, I give whatever time I can to their perusal and study. Thus I have gone over some of the volumes of John Bassett Moore, LL. D., who is rightly considered one of the ablest and most scholarly American commentators on international law. I have before me as I write volume VII of his monumental Digest on International Law. This one volume alone contains 1109 pages and is an exhaustive treatise on all questions involved in the present neutrality legislation: War, maritime war, contraband, blockade, neutrality, etc.

Another work that has intrigued me is the Treatise on International Law by L. Oppenheim, M. A., LL. D., Whewell professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, member of the Institute of International Law, and honorary member of the Royal Academy of Jurisprudence at Madrid. The volume before me as I write is volume II (710 pp.) entitled "War and Neutrality" (2d ed.), published in 1912. (I understand that a later edition (revised) has been published. But, even so, I prefer the earlier work, for the reason that it was written before the League of Nations tried to create a new world order and establish new principles of international law.)

Oppenheim's definition of neutrality makes a nice distinction between international law and international politics:

"Such states as do not take part in a war between other states are neutrals. The term 'neutrality' is derived from the Latin neuter. Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality adopted by third states toward belligerents and recognized by belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial states and the belligerents. Whether or not a third state will adopt and preserve an attitude of impartiality during war is not a matter for international law but for international politics" (Italics, Oppenheim's).

"The question of remaining neutral or not is, in the absence of a treaty stipulating otherwise, one of policy and not of law" (p. 362).

(Parenthetically, it may be stated here that much of the confusion that has arisen over the subject of neutrality could be cleared up if, instead of prating about international law, we would call the thing by its right name—international politics. That is the crux of the whole question, and should be insisted upon by all debaters.)

Generally speaking, in international law the act of supplying arms and munitions of war to the parties to an armed conflict is considered an unneutral act. The following few passages from John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law, not only stress the unneutrality of selling war materials of whatever kind to belligerents, but also set forth that individuals engaging in such traffic place themselves beyond the pale of the law and forfeit the protection of their governments.

"The supply of materials of war, such as arms and ammunition, to either party to an armed conflict, although neutral governments are not obliged to prevent it, constitutes on the part of the individuals who engage in it a participation in hostilities, and as such is confessedly an unneutral act. Should the government of the individual itself supply such articles, it would clearly depart from its position of neutrality. The private citizen undertakes the business at his own risk, and against this risk his government cannot assure him protection without making itself a party to his unneutral act. * * *

"Says Kent, 'the principal restriction which the law of nations imposes on the trade of neutrals is the prohibition to furnish the belligerent parties with warlike stores and other articles which are directly auxiliary to warlike purposes.'

"'If the neutral (government),' says Woolsey, 'should send powder or balls, cannons or rifles this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from a neutral position' * * *" (vol. 7, p. 149).

THE ARMS EMBARGO

The pivotal point of the administration's "neutrality" bill is the sale and shipment of materials to belligerents. Under the present neutrality law the President is required to place an embargo on the exportation of arms, munitions, and implements of war to nations at war with each other. He wants the embargo removed. Lifting the embargo and substituting what is popularly called a cash-and-carry plan, or, as the Pittman bill provides, "credit and carry," would, theoretically, leave the United States free to sell war goods, not only arms, munitions, and implements of war, but all kinds of materials and accessories entering into the conduct or pursuit of a war, to both belligerents. Actually, and since we know for certain that only one of the belligerents could or would under existing conditions buy such goods from us and carry same home in its own ships in comparative safety, it requires no stretch of the imagination to see that the whole proposal is a rather one-sided arrangement.

But, waving that aside, assuming for the moment that it were possible to sell successfully to both belligerents, where does that leave the President, who has repeatedly declared that he hates war and that he wants to travel the road that leads to peace? May I remind the President that the road that leads to peace is not strewn with dragons' teeth? I find it hard to understand how one can proclaim himself an apostle of peace and in the same breath insist that he be free to send arms, munitions, and implements of war to both, or, more accurately speaking, to one, of the belligerents. It doesn't make sense.

A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT

I have read over again—for the third time—Secretary of State Hull's passionate appeal to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (July 14, 1939) to enact the neutrality legislation so ardently desired by the President before Congress adjourned. It is the sort of address that should be taken apart and analyzed sentence for sentence and point for point. Obviously, I haven't the time to do this. But let us look at a paragraph or two. In his statement on peace and neutrality, Secretary of State Hull put forth this novel and naive argument:

"Those of us who support the recommendations formulated for the elimination of the embargo are convinced that the arms embargo plays into the hands of those nations which have taken the lead in building up their fighting power. It works directly against the interests of the peace-loving nations, especially those who do not possess their own munitions plants.

"Our refusal to make it possible for them (the peace-loving nations and small countries in particular) to obtain such means of self-defense in a time of great emergency, would contribute solely toward making more helpless the law-abiding and peace-devoted peoples of the world."

Oppenheim has something to say on that point which Secretary of State Hull ought to take to heart:

Strict impartiality—"the duty of neutrals to remain impartial," that was the theory and practice agreed upon as far back as the eighteenth century. Vattel, writing in 1758, defined neutrality as follows: "Neutral nations during a war, are those who take no one's part, remaining friends common to both parties, and not favoring the armies of one to the prejudice of the other."

Twenty-one years earlier Bynkershoek, according to Oppenheim's International Law (vol. II, p. 351), maintained that "neutrals had nothing to do with the question as to which party to a war had a just cause; that neutrals, being friends to both parties, have not to sit as judges between these parties, and, consequently, must not give or deny to one or other party more or less in accordance with their conviction as to the justice or injustice of the cause of each."

CASH AND CARRY

One of the provisions of the present Pittman bill is to sell anything, including arms, munitions, implements of war, materials, and accessories to any belligerents on condition that the parties involved pay cash for the goods purchased (even giving them 90 days' credit) and carry the goods purchased away in their own ships. It is to be observed here that the legislation called for by the Pittman neutrality bill (to enact which the President convoked Congress into extra session as soon as the present European war had begun), specifically covers definite belligerents—namely Great Britain and France on the one side, and Germany (and potentially Russia and Italy) on the other. We will sell to both these warring groups says the bill in effect; we will not discriminate; therefore we claim that we are neutral.

But actually as it would work out and as the President and Secretary of State well know—only one side (Great Britain and France) would be in a position to take advantage; and, therefore, we will be unneutral.

This seeming distinction could be argued at great length, for which, however, I have neither the time nor the space. Instead I choose to quote a few relevant paragraphs from Oppenheim's International Law:

"The duty of impartiality must prevent a neutral from supplying belligerents with arms, ammunition, vessels, and military provisions. And it matters not whether such supply takes place for money or gratuitously. A neutral who sold arms and ammunition to a belligerent at a profit would violate his duty of impartiality, as also would one who transferred such arms and ammunition to a belligerent as a present. This is a settled rule so far as direct transactions regarding such supply between belligerents and neutrals are concerned" (p. 426).

Again:

"If a state remains neutral, it violates its impartiality by furnishing a belligerent with troops or men-of-war. And it matters not whether a neutral renders such assistance to one of the belligerents or to both alike. Whereas convention V does not mention the furnishing of troops to belligerents on the part of neutrals, article 6 of convention XIII enacts that 'the supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever, is forbidden' " (p. 389).

Again:

"Since neutrality is an attitude of impartiality, it excludes such assistance and succor to one of the belligerents as is detrimental to the other, and, further, such injuries to the one as benefit the other. But it requires, on the other hand, active measures from neutral states. For neutrals must prevent belligerents from making use of their neutral territories and of their resources for military and naval purposes during the war. This concerns not only actual fighting on neutral territories, but also transport of troops, war materials, and provisions for the troops, the fitting out of men-of-war and privateers, the activity of prize courts, and the like" (p. 362).

"Neutrals in their own country, may sell to belligerents whatever belligerents choose to buy. The principal exceptions to this rule" (I shall state only the one exception which is ad rem) "that neutrals must not sell to one belligerent what they refuse to sell to the other * * *." (John Bassett Moore, vol. VII, p. 1108.)

Now, under the proposed "neutrality" legislation we declare ourselves ready to sell to both belligerents; knowing, however, that only one belligerent can take home the goods bought from us.

Furthermore, anything we might sell to the other belligerent has already been declared contraband by the British Government and under international law, "contraband of war is always subject to seizure when being conveyed to a belligerent destination" (Moore).

How nicely our "neutrality" legislation fits into the British scheme of things may be seen from the following item:

On September 4 King George VI of England issued a proclamation specifying articles to be treated as contraband of war, which included the following:

All kinds of arms, ammunition, explosives, chemicals or appliances suitable for use in chemical warfare and the machinery for their manufacture; fuel of all kinds, tools, implements, maps, pictures, currency, bullion, metals, food, forage, coin, clothing, and all means of communication and transport, including animals.

MORE POWER FOR THE PRESIDENT

But the salient point of the Pittman bill is that it seeks to confer on the President an extraordinary power and for which there is no warrant in the Constitution. Section 1 of the bill provides that when the President (or Congress) finds that there exists a state of war between foreign states the President shall issue a proclamation naming the belligerents. We need go no further than that. One thing is certain, that, considering the bestowed, implied, assumed, or arrogated powers the President already possesses, he will beat Congress to it. He will issue the proclamation without the advice or consent of Congress (especially if Congress happens not to be in session); for he actually did this very thing with regard to the present war in Europe. Nay, he did more. He called Congress into extra session on the presumption of authority granted to the Chief Executive by the National Defense Act of February 16, 1914, which permits the President to do many things he otherwise cannot do, "upon the outbreak of war, or when, in his opinion, war is imminent."

My interpretation of that grant of authority is that the United States must be actually involved in the outbreak or imminence of a war before the President has a right to act. However, President Roosevelt seems to interpret it differently, namely, that he has a right to act "upon the outbreak of war or when, in his opinion, war is imminent"—whether in Europe or in any part of the world. Which being the case, we may be sure that he will go further. Not only will he name the belligerents, he will declare who the aggressors are. As a matter of fact, he has already done so on several occasions. Vide his speeches and messages in which he speaks of quarantining "aggressors"; and "acts of aggression" already accomplished or contemplated.

The President is avid for power and jealous of his authority. Discussing an earlier neutrality bill (1935) which contained provisions to which the President objected, John T. Flynn in the New Republic (October 11, 1939), says:

"The President refused to endorse the bill. Instead he took the position, which he still holds, that Congress should not pass any such bill; that it was an invasion of the rights of the Executive; that this had to do with our foreign relations, which were entrusted by the Constitution to the Executive; and that the Executive should be permitted to handle the question of neutrality under international law."

Speaking for the group of Senators who are opposed to the administration's so-called neutrality bill, and who pledged themselves to fight "by every honorable and legitimate means" against the repeal of the embargo, Senator JOHNSON of California said in July 1939:

"We are unalterably opposed to the repeal or modification of the present neutrality law prohibiting the sale or exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war to nations engaged in war. We are against any discretion being lodged in the hands of any Chief Executive to determine an aggressor or aggressors during any war abroad."

The Founding Fathers were careful not to place too much power into the hands of the President, especially with regard to the subject of war.

SEC. 2. "The President shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States * * *.

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls * * *."

The increase of power the President is seeking can be bestowed only by an amendment to the Constitution.

THE POWERS OF CONGRESS

The Constitution emphatically declares that "Congress (not the President) shall have power to declare war." The Constitution, with great particularity, enumerates the powers of Congress. Among other things, it confers upon Congress the power to provide for the common defense, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to declare war, and to call the militia into the service of the United States—"to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." It empowers Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

Nowhere do we find that any of these powers have been or shall be delegated to the President; yet we find that Congress, especially during the past 22 years, under the stress of emergencies, has passed scores of laws handing over to the President extraordinary and plenary powers which today are coming home to roost; especially those having to do with war. It is under these clearly unconstitutional powers that the President called Congress into extra session and declared that a national emergency exists.

If Congress now proceeds to enact another law (the Pittman bill) conferring on the President the power, in case war arises in Europe or any part of the world (war in which we are not directly involved) it will have raised the Presidency to a virtual dictatorship. In the language of the Pittman bill, whenever he "shall find that there exists a state of war between foreign States * * * the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved; and he shall, from time to time, by proclamation, name other states as and when they become involved in the war."

The enactment of the Pittman bill into law will confer upon the President of the United States all the powers possessed by military despots. Hitler's tyranny proceeded directly from his seizure of military power; the President is demanding of Congress that all military power be vested in himself. Will Congress accede? The fight is between the President and Congress. Will Congress surrender? The destiny of the American people is in the hands of Congress. Will Congress betray the confidence of the people?

Don't deceive yourself. If you bestow upon the President of the United States the power to declare not only who is the aggressor, but against whom the aggression has been committed, you have bestowed upon him the power to plunge our country into war on the side of one of the belligerents—whichever side he may decide. This is the power that President Wilson usurped—and as a consequence he put us into the war without asking "the advice and consent of Congress."

Let us go back 22 years. Did Congress declare war on Germany? No. In the message he read to Congress (April 2, 1917) President Wilson declared that a state of war already exists.

"* * * I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States. That it (Congress) formally accept the status of belligerent which has been thrust upon it and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense, but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the government of the German Empire to terms and end the war."

The President had declared that we were at war with Germany. Cheering and tumultuous applause greeted this declaration—shouting, clapping, and waving of American flags. The propaganda that had been at work for the previous 3 years had been effective—the propaganda plus the stupid "diplomacy" and truculence of the German Government. However, I am not concerned with those things at this moment. The one point I am trying to stress is that actually the President, and not Congress, had declared war. It was not until 4 days later that the Senate and House of Representatives in a joint resolution formally declared war.

This must never again be permitted to happen. Let Congress stand by its guns.

BEATING THE DEVIL AROUND A BUSH

The President and our Secretary of State at the present moment seem to favor the entire abolition of all neutrality legislation and a return to that nebulous thing called international law. On this point I can only say briefly, without arguing the matter (for that cannot be done in brief form), that that seems to me the easiest way of becoming involved in war—if we want to get into war on the side of Great Britain and France; and that, I regret to say, it appears to me, is the real objective of the administration.

As a matter of fact, there is a lot of hypocrisy about this whole neutrality legislation business. For, whether the Pittman bill is passed as written, giving the President everything he asks for, or whether the embargo is retained and strengthened, the President knows, and the Secretary of State knows, and you know, and I know that, in either case, goods, whether forbidden or declared contraband, will reach the stronger side. Purchases will be made by neutrals and individuals and shipped to neutral ports, reaching the belligerents, perhaps, by a somewhat circuitous route. In like manner a cash-and-carry or credit plan could and would be frustrated. Loans and credits can be extended to individuals instead of governments. Whatever legislation may be enacted it can be circumvented; whatever rules we may lay down can be evaded and made of no avail. Let's be honest about it! Let us not lay ourselves open to the charge of knavery. It is no secret as to where the administration stands.

WHY?

Why, then, if it doesn't make any difference one way or another; if, whether we pass or do not pass the Pittman so-called neutrality bill, Great Britain and France (keeping the present war in mind) will be able by hook or by crook to avail themselves of our resources and stores of goods—should anyone be opposed to the legislation demanded by the administration?

To that question there are several answers.

1. Because it would confer on the President a power which no President should have—the power to put us into any foreign war he chooses. For, keep this outstanding fact constantly before you: all negotiation with regard to our relationship with foreign governments is in the hands of the President and the Secretary of State; and these negotiations, for the most part, are secret. Even the two Foreign Relations Committees (Senate and House of Representatives) do not know what is secretly going on. These two—the President and the Secretary of State, aided and abetted by selected and interested individuals—can so maneuver as to make our entrance into any foreign war a matter of course.

Have we forgotten how we got into the last war? Four men actually put us into that war. They were President Woodrow Wilson; Secretary of State Lansing; Walter H. Page, American Ambassador to Great Britain; and President Wilson's private ambassador, Col. E. M. House. This is not a gratuitous statement. Read the several books written about President Wilson by Ray Stannard Baker and others, and the President's own statements; the Memoirs of Robert Lansing; the Life and Letters of Walter H. Page; the Intimate Papers of Colonel House; and scores of other books establishing this one point—that these four favored and worked for our entrance into the World War—beyond dispute.

2. But this, to my way of thinking, is the most important point at this time: If we enact the Pittman bill into law it is equivalent to serving notice on one of the belligerents in Europe (Great Britain and France) that we are on their side. It will encourage them to continue the present war, confident that, at the crucial moment, we will come to their help by sending an army to help them crush the aggressors—which, by that time, may be not only Germany but also Russia.

Our best contribution to peace in Europe is to let Great Britain and France know that they need expect no help of any kind from us. And this we can do by keeping the embargo on the shipment of all war materials of whatever kind.

By insisting that the embargo be lifted and that we adopt a cash- (or credit) and-carry plan, President Roosevelt is like a man who, holding a flaming torch in his hand, rushes into a powder magazine to look for a leak in a gas pipe. That sentence may sound screwy, for it is more than likely that there are no gas pipes in powder magazines. But I will let it stand because it conveys the idea of an inevitable and terrific explosion—and that's the one thing I want to emphasize. An inevitable and terrific explosion.

The C. I. O. and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, many times on the floor of this House have I charged that John L. Lewis and the C. I. O.'s were using the Communists and the methods of the Communists—that is, violence and disregard for the law and the civil liberty of our citizens—to establish Lewis as a labor dictator. Communists, likewise, have been using Lewis and his C. I. O. to accomplish their purpose of destroying this Government by force.

The President permitted his campaign managers to accept, and he was evidently very glad to get, the support of the C. I. O. and the campaign contribution of Lewis' United Mine Workers of $470,000. Somewhat later Lewis called upon the President to repay this political debt and to a certain extent Franklin D. Roosevelt did so by sitting idly by and permitting his Governor of Michigan, Frank Murphy, to do the same, while Lewis and the C. I. O. defied the law, drove thousands from their jobs, and raised "hell" generally in Michigan during the sit-down strikes.

Earl Browder, and his communistic gang, likewise endorsed the President and so far as I have heard the President never refused their support or stated that he would not avail himself of their endorsement for a third term.

Sometime ago we learned through the testimony given before the Dies committee that Browder had been using a forged passport to go back and forth between the United States and Soviet Russia on his visits to his international Communist friends.

Yesterday we learned that a Federal grand jury in New York had indicted Browder for a violation of the criminal law growing out of the use, it was claimed, of forged passports.

In Michigan not very long ago, Frankensteen, head of a C. I. O. affiliate, assisted in holding up Government orders for parts which were necessary in the production of airplanes to be used for national defense.

Murphy, the present "glamour boy" of the administration, will have to do something pretty soon about Browder and his Michigan friend, Frankensteen, whom he appointed to aid in distributing relief funds in Michigan not so long ago. It certainly would be a cheering spectacle to see Murphy, as United States Attorney General, prosecuting his friend and political appointeee, Frankensteen, for a criminal conspiracy to subvert by force our Government; to watch him prosecute Browder whose organizations endorsed him for Governor of Michigan. When this comes about Murphy will be forced to agree with Lincoln's statement that, "You cannot fool all of the people all of the time."

So too some of us will watch with a great deal of interest Lewis in his announced drive to throw the Communists out of the C. I. O. Doubtless Lewis has reached the conclusion, so long evident to many of us, that the Communists are a liability in any movement in this country.

It is regrettable that the administration has not come to the same conclusion here in Washington. With that thought in mind let me quote this editorial from the Chicago Tribune of yesterday:

MR. LEWIS' PURGE

John L. Lewis, it is reported, is getting ready to run the Communists out of the C. I. O. This will no doubt prove embarrassing to some of Mr. Lewis' more starry-eyed admirers, who have been contending valiantly that there were no Communists in the C. I. O. Their forthcoming explanations may be awaited with the same interest that greeted recent efforts of the American Communists to explain Comrade Stalin's doings.

There is nothing surprising in Mr. Lewis' action. It has been predicted in labor circles ever since he put the "reds" to work for him. No one has accused him of being a Communist. He was a Herbert Hoover Republican in 1932. He was a $500,000 Democrat in 1936. The only ideology to which he has remained faithful is that he ought to run things. That happens also to be Stalin's ideology, but that doesn't make Lewis a Communist, or Stalin either, for that matter.

Lewis put the Communists to work in 1937 because he could use their considerable talents. They were accomplished "hell raisers," and he was out to raise hell. They were the most experienced saboteurs and revolutionaries on the American scene, and he saw sabotage and threatened revolution as the quickest road to the power he seeks.

Mr. Lewis accordingly invited the Communists into bed with him. Having got them in, he may find it not so easy to kick them out. On that problem Mr. Lewis might well consult David Dubinsky, of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, who parted company with him last year.

Mr. Dubinsky knows all about Communists. Some years ago they got into his union. He didn't invite them in, but they got in, anyway. He set out to expel them, and finally did so after several years. But the fight nearly wrecked his union, and would have wrecked it if the American Federation of Labor hadn't come to Mr. Dubinsky's aid with several hundred thousand dollars.

Since Stalin embraced Hitler and sent word to Comrade Browder that when Browder was talking about Fuehrer Kuhn, of the bund, he really meant Prime Minister Chamberlain, the Communists have been the kiss-of-death boys in the ranks of American radicals. Mr. Lewis is not the only one who has been trying to go respectable by repudiating them. The American Labor Party in New York is running a purge also.

But down in Washington the Communists still pursue their happy way, planning for the revolution and sabotaging the machinery of capitalism whenever they get a chance. The Dies committee says there are 2,500 known Communists and fellow travelers working for President Roosevelt. When is the President going to start his purge?

National Welfare Officer of Order of Purple Heart Supports Proposed Referendum on Foreign Wars

---

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

Monday, October 23, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, there is tremendous interest throughout the country in the resolution I have introduced—House Joint Resolution 89—which proposes to amend the Constitution so as to give the people the right to vote on proposals to send our boys abroad to fight and die in wars overseas.

While the interest in the proposed amendment is general it is especially noticeable among former veterans, who know from experience what war means and who see in day-by-day developments what appears to them to be a repetition of influences and circumstances that led to our participation in the world holocaust 22 years ago. I will venture to say that if a free and untrammeled expression could be had of the rank-and-file membership of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and every other organization of veterans, the verdict in every instance would be overwhelmingly in favor of my proposed referendum on foreign wars, just as it was in this House on January 10, 1938, when on a roll call nearly all of the veterans in this body supported my proposal.

There is no veterans' organization in existence that is more entitled to the respect and affection of our country than the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Inc., because it is composed exclusively of veterans who were wounded in action. No veteran, unless he received wounds in the service of our country, can secure membership in this honored organization. As an interesting and important contribution to the discussion of my proposed constitutional amendment I submit for printing in the RECORD the following letter I have received from R. G. Patton, the national welfare officer of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Inc.:

THE MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART,
NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
1172¾ NORTH WESTMORELAND STREET,
Los Angeles, Calif.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUDLOW: I am in receipt of a copy of House Joint Resolution No. 89, which you presented to the Seventy-sixth Congress at its first session.

It is a pleasure for me, speaking individually and as the national welfare officer of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, to compliment you on your courage in presenting such a resolution at this time. First, complimenting you on the bill itself, I do so because it would certainly seem to any reasonably informed person how idiotic it would be for us (United States) to engage overseas in another one of those periodic massacres which the people in Europe and Asia seem to love so much. Is that the only outdoor sport known over there? How can a single Congressman not concur with you in such a policy of remaining aloof from entangling alliances with countries in those war-infested lands? I should think every loyal American Congressman and citizen would rush to support your amendment if they understood it. But, sad to say, I realize the majority of citizens do not understand your proposed amendment and the reason for same, in my humble opinion, is that a great number of newspapers in our country do not print the true text of this proposed amendment. Actually, Congressman LUDLOW, most of the people to whom I have talked have an idea that your bill by giving a referendum vote to the people would prevent the President and Congress from declaring war even if this country were attacked. Yes; the people actually feel that we could be in the midst of an election determining whether we should enter war, while at the same time bombs from an enemy were dropping on our defenseless cities.

Of course, there are reasonable citizens who know your bill would not become effective if it were a case of invasion by an enemy of our homeland, or of our territorial possessions, or even of any country in the Western Hemisphere. Those of us who read and take an interest in our country know that the President and Congress have such wide powers that even the Monroe Doctrine is not affected by your bill, but for some reason clarification of your amendment in the fullest sense is not being made by those who oppose it. I, for one, want to know why this issue is being confused by its opponents.

I was dumbfounded to read a double page editorial in the last issue of the American Legion national monthly taking such a crack at your amendment. At the same time not a word was said about the wide latitude of power given the President regarding countries in the Western Hemisphere. Nearly all of my buddies in my Legion post to whom I have talked regarding this amendment had no idea that this bill is purposely designed only "to keep us out of foreign wars" unless the people as a whole decide that they alone are ready and desirous for it. Also at a Disabled American Veterans district meeting a few nights ago I brought the matter on the floor for a general discussion. Two past national commanders of that organization spoke on it. Both had the idea that your amendment would become effective if we even desired or intended helping a country in the Western Hemisphere outside of our own shores. In fact, one of them said he was against the measure due to the fact that it would violate the Monroe Doctrine policy. When I explained the true purport of the bill every man in the meeting was for it.

In my opinion, before another soldier leaves these shores for Europe or Asia with the purpose of assisting so-called doubtful democracies, I say emphatically let the people vote on it, and we can rest assured that we won't go. Surely we cannot be hoodwinked into another racket like the one perpetrated on us in 1917—all in the name of democracy. Let me tell you, Congressman LUDLOW, that the combat wounded of those famous combat divisions, the combat men who were not wounded as well, know what war was, too. We may not have actually seen the fields run with blood, as did some of the back-of-the-lines observers, but we did see many of our buddies die, others become maimed for life, others lose their reason that will never return, and for what now appears to have been a useless mission. Surely our fine Congressmen assembled there in Washington will not listen to the propaganda flooding our country at present for the purpose of getting us on one side or another, but we are all human—even Congressmen and Senators—and they can be swayed as well as others. Like yourself, and you are certainly honest in your own conviction when you suggest that it might be easier to sway 500 Congressmen than to sway 40,000,000 citizens, I certainly feel the same way about it.

I congratulate you on your courage in the face of such tremendous opposition in not only proposing but in fighting for what my wounded comrades and I think is the most sensible and humanitarian bill ever presented in the House of Representatives. We got medals for taking lives. If your bill goes over, you should get a Distinguished Service Cross for saving lives by the wholesale. You have my permission to print this in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or wherever you please.

Yours very truly,

R. G. PATTON,
National Welfare Officer,
Military Order of the Purple Heart.

Summary and Conclusions of the Federal Trade Commission in Recent Motor Car Industry Inquiry

---

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

STATEMENT BY THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the Federal Trade Commission on the motor-vehicles industry:

MOTOR-VEHICLES INDUSTRY—SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

(Report prepared and submitted pursuant to H. J. Res. 594, 75th Cong., 3d sess. (Public Resolution No. 87), approved April 13, 1938)

Summary

CONCENTRATION IN THE MOTOR-VEHICLE INDUSTRY

There is a high degree of concentration in the motor-vehicle industry. This degree of concentration is greater in the manufacture and sale of passenger automobiles than in the sale of commercial vehicles. In the Commission's inquiry, a field examination was made of the seven leading passenger automobile manufacturers. In 1937 these seven manufacturers sold 98 percent of the total number of new automobiles sold by American manufacturers, and 93 percent of the combined unit sales of passenger cars, trucks, and commercial vehicles. In 1938 these seven concerns sold 99 percent of the new passenger cars registered.

Three companies, namely, Chrysler Corporation, Ford Motor Co., and General Motors Corporation, acounted for 89 percent of new passenger-car sales in 1937 and for 85 percent of the combined number of new passenger cars and commercial vehicles sold in that year. In 1938 these three companies sold slightly more than 90 percent of the new passenger cars registered.

In 1937 General Motors sold 39.7 percent, Chrysler 23.2 percent, and Ford 21.9 percent of all motor vehicles in the domestic and export trades of the United States, and, in 1938, General Motors had 44.8 percent of new passenger-car registrations in the United States, Chrysler was second with practically 25 percent, and Ford third with 20.5 percent.

The bulk of motor vehicles sold in the United States is in the low-priced class. In 1937 the three lower priced motor vehicles made by Chrysler, Ford, and General Motors, namely, Plymouth, Ford, and Chevrolet, combined, accounted for approximately 57 percent of the total unit sales in the domestic and export markets of the United States. In 1938, of total new passenger-car registrations, Chevrolet had 24.6 percent, Ford 19.2 percent, and Plymouth 15.1 percent.

PHENOMENAL GROWTH AND PROFITS OF LARGE AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS

During about 34½ years from June 16, 1903, to the end of 1937, Ford Motor Co. manufactured nearly 27,000,000 automobiles and sold them for a little under $14,180,000,000. The aggregate profit was nearly $978,900,000. Of this, nearly $262,540,000 was distributed in cash dividends, nearly $106,265,000 was paid as premiums in the retirement of the stock held by minority interests and more than $610,095,000 was retained in the company's treasury or was used in expanding the production and distribution facilities of the enterprise.

Starting with a capital of $100,000 in 1903, the capital employed by Ford Motor Co. was built up by the end of 1937 to $636,155,735, an increase of nearly $636,056,000; and of this, only $14,663,444, representing employees' investments of savings out of their wages, constituted borrowed funds. The remainder consisted either of profits retained in the company's treasury or used in expansion of facilities, or of the products of the investment of cash dividends by the Fords in other Ford enterprises, coal mines, and the like. The company acquired the Lincoln motor business at receiver's sale, and the assets of several parts manufacturers. However, the great bulk of the growth in magnitude of this enterprise represented the use of profits for expansion from within, rather than the consolidation of formerly independent enterprises.

In 1908, General Motors Co., predecessor to the present named corporation, was organized by William C. Durant and associates. Immediately thereafter the company began acquiring the more important manufacturers of motor vehicles and motor vehicle parts and accessories. A controlling interest was quickly acquired in 12 important manufacturers of motor vehicles and parts, including Buick, Olds, Cadillac, and Oakland. Negotiations were conducted with a view to acquiring Ford Motor Co., Reo Motor Co., Willys-Overland Co., and the E. R. Thomas Co. of Buffalo. Except for the lack of cash demanded by the sellers, it is more than probable that General Motors would have acquired these manufacturers. Most of the earlier acquisitions were made through an exchange of stock, but Henry Ford and R. E. Olds of Reo demanded a substantial part in cash and the deal fell through. When the Dodge Brothers properties were put on the market in 1925, General Motors submitted a bid through J. P. Morgan & Co., but the sale was made to Dillon, Read & Co.

In all, General Motors, during its corporate existence, has acquired either the entire interest or a substantial interest in the capital stock or assets and properties of approximately 70 formerly independent corporations. As consideration for these capital stocks, assets, and properties, it gave approximately $500,000,000—mostly in valuation of General Motors capital stocks given in exchange. At the close of 1937 the capital employed by General Motors Corporation, after eliminating appreciation, goodwill, and other intangibles, amounted to $895,247,000.

In later years the expansion and growth of General Motors in the motor-vehicle field has been through the development and expansion of the Cadillac, LaSalle, Buick, Oldsmobile, Pontiac, and Chevrolet lines of cars rather than through the acquisition of established lines. In earlier years the corporation acquired each of these lines, except LaSalle, and, in addition, it acquired not fewer than 12 other lines of cars the production of which was subsequently discontinued. From its very beginning it was active in acquiring manufacturers of accessories and parts and by the close of 1937 it produced practically every finished part needed to build a motor vehicle except rubber tires, window glass, and upholstery.

During the 29 years of operation, 1909 to 1937, inclusive, General Motors made net profits amounting to $3,013,013,048 before payment of income taxes. After setting aside $402,127,492 for payment of income taxes there remained a balance of $2,610,885,556. This balance was disposed of by paying cash dividends to common-stock holders amounting to $1,653,153,244; by paying cash dividends to preferred-stock holders amounting to $164,510,372; by increasing the par or stated amount of common-stock accounts by the sum of $164,189,635 and issuing common stock as stock dividends; by setting aside $3,212,519 for outstanding minority interests; by paying $168,336,996 to executives and employees through profit-sharing plans. The balance remaining after paying dividends and bonuses was used for general corporate purposes or retained in the business. Including the sum added to the par or stated amount of common-stock accounts, the total profits retained in the business were $558,979,376.

During 1937 General Motors Corporation built approximately 40 percent of all motor vehicles built in the United States and approximately 35 percent of all those built in the world. It built motors for virtually every use, from the one one-hundredths horsepower midget for electric fans to the 6,000 horsepower Diesels that pull streamlined railway trains. It not only built motors and motor vehicles, but a long line of refrigeration equipment, air-conditioning equipment, heating equipment, small lighting plants and equipment, electric household appliances, and numerous allied items of equipment. It has substantial investments in Bendix Aviation Corporation, North American Aviation, Inc., Ethyl Gasoline Corporation, Yellow Truck & Coach Manufacturing Co., and in motor-vehicle dealerships. Through other subsidiaries it finances users in purchasing motor vehicles on partial-payment plans and engages in insuring motor vehicles.

General Motors earned more profits for its stockholders during the 11-year period, 1927–37, inclusive, than any other manufacturing corporation in the United States, but its total assets of $1,566,000,000 at the close of 1937 were slightly exceeded by a few other domestic corporations. Its year of greatest earnings was 1928, when a profit of $330,216,167 was earned before provision for Federal, State, and foreign income taxes. In three other years, namely, 1927, 1929, and 1936, its annual profits, on the same basis, ranged from $283,961,144 to $297,341,859. In no year during the 11 years, 1927 to 1937, inclusive, did the corporation fail to show some profit. The year of lowest profit was 1932, when a profit of $10,600,194 was shown on the total operations; however, there was a loss of $1,340,430 on manufacturing operations. This remarkable record in view of the experience of most corporations during the economic depression, was made possible through General Motors' ability to obtain such a large proportion of the motor-vehicle business at substantial profits on unit sales. During the 27 years, 1911–37, General Motors sold approximately 22,000,000 automobiles.

The Chrysler Corporation developed to its present position as one of the largest three manufacturers in the motor-vehicle industry largely through taking over and developing the plants and facilities of Maxwell Motor Corporation, Chalmers Motor Corporation, and Dodge Bros., Inc. The facilities of the three corporations were acquired by exchanging new stocks for the old stocks outstanding of these corporations or assuming their debts. In addition, Chrysler Corporation extended and improved these facilities by reinvesting $82,733,702 of profits. The growth of Chrysler Corporation has been rather remarkable, when it is considered that the corporation sold 134,478 cars in 1925, that its sales had grown to 1,113,900 cars in 1937, and totaled approximately 6,200,000 in the period 1925–37.

During the 13 years of operations, from 1925 to 1937, inclusive, Chrysler Corporation made net profits amounting to $355,049,438 before payment of income taxes. After setting aside $53,831,494 for payment of income taxes, there remained a balance of $301,217,944. This balance was disposed of by paying $174,273,429 in cash dividends to the common stockholders, $6,238,341 in cash dividends to preferred stockholders, and $18,730,000 to officers and executives through profit-sharing plans. The balance remaining after these payments was used for general corporate purposes or was retained in the business.

PROFITS REALIZED BY SEVEN MOTOR-VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS

During the 11 years, 1927 to 1937, the largest seven manufacturers of passenger automobiles realized profits amounting to more than $2,375,000,000 before provision for income taxes. Of this total, General Motors alone accounted for 79.7 percent, Chrysler Corporation accounted for 11.6 percent, Ford Motor Co. 0.10 percent, and the four smaller manufacturers examined together accounted for 8.6 percent.

The profits of General Motors came from the three general divisions of its operations. The motor-vehicle divisions, consisting of the six lines of cars, produced about 61.4 percent of the total, the accessories and parts divisions produced about 22.4 percent, and all other products produced about 16.2 percent of General Motors' profits.

RATES OF RETURN FOR THE LARGEST THREE MANUFACTURERS

The profits of the motorcar manufacturers have varied greatly according to time and circumstances. The path of the industry's growth is strewn with scores of companies that have failed, while on the other hand a considerable number has been absorbed by Chrysler Corporation and by General Motors Corporation, chiefly the latter.

Since 1927 three great companies—General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler—have comprehended a proportion increasing from about 59 to approximately 85 percent of the industry; and they have obtained an even larger share of the profits. Ford, however, has been less fortunate in this respect than the other two, experiencing heavy losses in the severe depression years and also in 1927 and 1928 when changing models and reconstructing his factory.

The profits of General Motors and Chrysler in the 11-year period 1927–37 were very large, and notwithstanding the extremely large investment of capital involved, the rates of return on their investment in manufacturing operations were generally extraordinarily high.

Thus for General Motors the rates of profit from 1927 to 1937, inclusive, averaged no less than 35.5 percent per annum and have ranged from a loss of 0.28 percent in 1932 to a profit of 66.24 percent in 1928. During the same period the average for Chrysler was a profit of 28.59 percent, and the range was from a loss of 9.75 percent in 1932 to a profit of 74.46 percent in 1936. The average rate of return for Ford during the same period was a loss of 0.80 percent, and the return ranged from a loss of 13.89 percent in 1932 to a profit of 15.26 percent in 1929.

RATES OF RETURN FOR SMALLER OR INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURERS

The smaller manufacturers are commonly referred to in the automobile trade as independents. Of the hundreds of manufacturers that have made passenger automobiles, only 11 are active today—the big 3 and 8 independents. In their struggle to maintain or improve their place in the industry, independent manufacturers have been forced to make important contributions to the development of motor vehicles.

In comparison with the above-stated rates of return for Chrysler Corporation and General Motors Corporation, the rates of profit of the leading four important manufacturers, during the same 11 years, were as follows. The return to Hudson Motor Car Co. ranged from a loss of 17.33 percent in 1932, to a profit of 41.39 percent in 1927, and averaged a profit of 9.40 percent per annum. For Nash Motor Co., the range was from a loss of 33 percent in 1934, to a profit of 75.63 percent in 1927, and the average was a profit of 36.90 percent per annum. The return to Packard Motor Car Co. averaged 21.25 percent per annum and ranged from a loss of 29.14 percent in 1934, to a profit of 65.61 percent in 1928. For the Studebaker Corporation the return averaged 6.13 percent per annum and ranged from a loss of 6.59 percent in 1932, to a profit of 16.21 percent in 1928.

NET MARGINS OF PROFIT ON SALES OF ACCESSORIES AND REPLACEMENT PARTS

Numerous dealers complained that the largest three manufacturers coerced and forced them to purchase large stocks of accessories and replacement parts. The examination of the records of the larger manufacturers shows that they made much larger margin of profit on accessories and parts than on cars. For illustration, during 6 of the years of the period 1929–37 the motor-car divisions of General Motors Corporation made an average net profit of 24.85 cents on every dollar of accessories and parts sales as contrasted to 7.18 cents on every dollar on sales of new cars. Chrysler Corporation made an average net profit of 17.3 cents on every dollar of sales of accessories and parts during the 9-year period 1929 to 1937, inclusive, as contrasted to 6.6 cents on sales of new cars. During the last 9 years, 1929 to 1937, Ford Motor Co. lost an average of 0.36 cents on every dollar of new car sales but made 12.07 cents on every dollar of sales of accessories and replacement parts.

The replacement parts and accessories business is an important source of profit to motor-vehicle manufacturers. During the 9 years, 1929–37, approximately $21,655,000 out of $221,628,000 of profits made by Chrysler Corporation in motor-vehicle manufacturing came from sale of parts and accessories. During the same period, Ford Motor Co. netted a loss of $13,085,000 on motor vehicle sales, but had a profit of $49,194,000 on parts and accessories. During 6 years of the period 1927–37, General Motors Corporation netted profits in motor-vehicle operation aggregating $497,662,000; and of this nearly $117,943,000 came from the parts and accessories sales.

PRICES OF PASSENGER CARS

A comparison of factory prices of reasonably comparable four-door sedans, covering roughly the period since 1923, as submitted by each of the seven companies examined by the Commission, shows a net decrease in the price of such motor-vehicles. In general, prices reached the lowest point during the depression years following 1929, but increased somewhat in more recent years. For example, a Chrysler four-door four-cylinder car of 38 horsepower, less Federal tax, sold for $1,095 f. o. b. factory in June 1925, as compared with $708 for an 82-horsepower Plymouth six-cylinder car in September 1938; a 38-horsepower, four-cylinder Nash sold for $1,445 in July 1923 as compared with $1,025 for a comparable six-cylinder car of 105 brake horsepower in October 1937; and a Studebaker six-cylinder of 50 horsepower sold for $1,595, f. o. b. factory in August 1924, as compared with $973 for a six-cylinder, 90-horsepower car in September 1938. Prices of other manufacturers showed a similar trend.

Based upon the cost per maximum brake horsepower and the cost per pound of car weight, the price reductions are even more impressive; for example, for the cars mentioned the reductions were from $29.48 per brake horsepower in 1925, to $8.85 in 1938 for the Chrysler-Plymouth, and from $39.40 in 1923, to $10 in 1937, for the Nash.

In addition to this substantial price reduction, every manufacturer gave the car user greater beauty, comfort, efficiency, and safety.

THE FINANCIAL RECORD OF THE MOTOR-VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS

For many years the automobile industry was regarded as highly speculative and the manufacturers, to a very large extent, had to finance expansion through reinvestment of profits rather than by borrowing. In this respect the industry has furnished a better example than have some other industries. While there have been occasional lapses from sound accounting policies as, for example, in the write-up of property accounts, this factor, at least in recent years, has not been a significant one. It is true that these companies did not have the same incentives to misrepresent their assets, as companies that are generally subject to regulation, as respects rates or charges for services. The large companies have seldom in recent years needed to borrow heavily, thus preserving more securely their financial independence.

PROFITS OF MOTOR-VEHICLE DEALERS

The Commission's data on the profits of motor-vehicle dealers reported to it are neither as comprehensive nor as representative as was desired, because of the failure of many of the 5,600 dealers addressed to make the returns which were sought. Such returns were requested on the basis of cooperation. The authority of the Commission to require reports does not extend to individuals or partnerships nor to corporations engaged solely in intrastate business.

Several hundred retailers addressed were unable to furnish data because they were out of business, in receivership, or in process of liquidation. Usable answers were confined to about 525 concerns, many of which were partnerships or sole proprietorships. Among this sample 25 percent of those reporting for 1935 and 1937 and 17 percent for 1936 had losses. Notwithstanding this fact; the results for all reporting dealers indicated a substantial average rate of profit for the group.

Reports by retail dealers and dealer-distributors, which were not audited by the Commission's accountants, support their claim that they sell their new cars at little or no profit on account of excessive used-car allowances. The showing of retail dealer reports covering 119,131 new cars of all makes sold in 1937 is that the dealer's average net operating profit per new car sold was entirely derived from sales of parts, accessories, supplies, and services that represented only 15 percent of their total business. For distributor-dealers, whose business combined both wholesaling and retailing, the showing was that nearly 97 percent of their profit of $13.10 per new car sold was derived from sales of parts, accessories, supplies, and service representing less than 12 percent of their total business.

HIGH COST OF INSTALLMENT PURCHASING OF MOTOR VEHICLES

Approximately 60 percent of retail motor-vehicle sales are effected on the installment plan, mostly of 12, 18, and 24 months duration. Prompt financing of these sales, as well as of dealers' purchases, is important from the viewpoint of the effect upon the manufacturer's volume of sales and production and ability to compete with other manufacturers. So also is the minimization of the differential between the time and cash prices of these vehicles. To this end, General Motors Corporation organized General Motors Acceptance Corporation, Ford Motor Co. organized Universal Credit Corporation, Chrysler Corporation acquired an interest in Commercial Credit Co. and entered into special contracts with it, and other manufacturers made special financing arrangements with Commercial Investment Trust Corporation.

Basic finance charge rates of one-half of 1 percent per month on the entire original unpaid purchase prices, including the retail premiums for the insurance protection, of automobiles purchased on the installment plan became generally prevalent in 1936; and these rates constituted a reduction of about 25 percent from the previously prevailing basic rates. These rates, however, imply interest paid by the car purchasers at about 0.91 percent per month, or 11½ percent per annum, on the monthly unpaid balances of the cash purchase prices of their automobiles and insurance. Not all of this is net profit to the finance companies, however, due to the participations in the finance charges that are paid to the vending dealers as loss reserves and bonuses, and to the not inconsiderable operating expenses of the finance companies themselves. During the 3 years 1935 to 1937, inclusive, the average rate of net profit on the total capital employed in the business was 5.94 percent per annum in the case of General Motors Acceptance Corporation, 7.48 percent in the case of the other two finance companies of comparable magnitude, and 8.67 percent in the case of 26 so-called independent finance companies.

Actual finance charges frequently fall below the basic rate because of dealers' errors or special concessions and because the averaged retail insurance premiums charged the car purchasers are frequently less than the actual premiums; and instances have been found in which, consequently, the time prices were actually somewhat less than the cash prices.

Actual finance charges frequently exceed the basic rate because: (a) the actual retail insurance premiums are frequently somewhat less than the averaged premiums charged the car purchasers; (b) in transactions in which the insurance on the car is not placed through the finance company the regular finance charges are often augmented to compensate the finance company for its loss of insurance commission; (c) in some regions the basic finance charges are augmented by documentary-stamp taxes, recording fees, and notary fees—the last being especially large in Louisiana, where the notaries public, appointed for life and limited in number, frequently charge $10 or more per transaction; (d) of the customary addition to the basic charges of a flat charge per car in installment sales of used automobiles; and (e) of additions to the basic charges, or "packs," made by the vending dealers for no extra service rendered. These "packs" are facilitated by the practice of many finance companies in providing the dealers with two or more rate charts based on different rates of charge, so that a dealer can use a chart based on a high rate when dealing with a car purchaser, but will use the chart based on the minimum rate when determining the discount at which to sell the installment contract to the finance company. Some dealers vending automobiles claim that they are specially motivated to insert such "packs" in order to recoup overallowances, forced by keen competition for sales under pressure from manufacturers, on used cars taken in trade. A 12-month new-car transaction was found with a finance charge of 28.25 percent, equivalent to interest at 4.05 percent per month, or 61.03 percent per annum; the insurance was not placed through the finance company. A 12-month used-car transaction was found with a finance charge of 52.87 percent, equivalent to interest at 7.27 percent per month, or 132.15 percent per annum; with an unpaid cash purchase price of only $91.84, the vending dealer added not only the customary flat charge of $7.50 but also a "pack" of $36.55. Such "packs" would largely be prevented if automobile purchasers were so instructed that they could compute the finance charges themselves. The transactions just given were not made by manufacturer-preferred or manufacturer-controlled finance companies.

Commissions consisting of large percentages of the retail premiums for insurance on motor vehicles, sometimes more than 50 percent, are an important source of profit to most of the finance companies—so much so that one finance company stated that the profit, in the financing business, is in the insurance. The system offers opportunity for providing the automobile purchasers with less protection than that for which they are charged; and at least one finance company, among the 30 examined, does this systematically.

Manufacturers' measures in favor of Commercial Credit Co., Commercial Investment Trust Corporation and its controlled Universal Credit Corporation, and the factory-controlled General Motors Acceptance Corporation gave these finance companies such effective advantage over their competitors that they have attained about 78 percent of the business of financing motor-vehicle distribution as compared with about 18 percent done by several hundred independent finance companies and 4 percent done by commercial and small loan banks.

MOTOR VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATIONS

The Commission's examination of the records and files of the associations of motor-vehicle manufacturers did not disclose price agreements, or other cooperative activities, that appear to be contrary to the antitrust acts. The apparent absence of price agreements among motor-vehicle manufacturers, particularly passenger-car makers, is partly because their products are commodities so individual in character that they are not easily adapted to price fixing by the ordinary methods; and partly because of the lack of sufficient unity among manufacturers. The reaction of the rest of the industry to the attitude of the Ford Motor Co. was aptly described by R. M. Grant, of the General Motors Corporation, who, as the sales managers' committee of the Manufacturers' Association meeting of December 9, 1932, stated:

"Mr. Ford, who won't play, is pretty much the price-setter in this industry. I'll bet if Mr. Ford's cars were $50 higher ours would be $50 higher."

The Association of Licensed Automobile Manufacturers, one of the predecessor associations, for a time continued in virtual control of the automobile industry and its articles of agreement provided that no licenses should be granted by the Electric Vehicle Co., which had an exclusive license from the patentee, G. B. Selden, without the unanimous consent in writing of the executive committee of the association. The apparent domination of the automobile industry by this association was ended in January 1911 by a United States circuit court of appeals decision in favor of the Ford Motor Co.

The National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, Inc., now the Automobile Manufacturers Association, Inc., comprising most of the important automobile manufacturers, excepting the Ford Motor Co., established a common use of patents in 1915, which made it possible for each member of the cross-licensing agreement to go ahead with the use of any of these patents covering the design and construction of motor vehicles as he deemed most acceptable to the public, without having to worry about patent infringements and infringement suits. It appears, however, that this benefit may have been largely due to the avoidance of controversies pertaining to patents, as the Ford Motor Co., a nonmember, continued the development of its product and today is one of the three leading automobile manufacturers.

It appears that the present agreement pertaining to the common use of patents by most of the members of the Automobile Manufacturers Association, Inc., is an instrument of lessened value when compared with the original agreement. The present agreement, which was executed in 1935, includes only patents acquired prior to January 1, 1930, and also exempts patents held by certain divisions or corporations controlled by parties to the agreement, and as time goes on the number of patents included in the agreement will become fewer and fewer until ultimately there will be no patents included under the cross-licensing agreement.

It appears that the association, through its legislative department, has at times been overenthusiastic in its effort to defeat certain State legislation. A case is cited where the chairman and secretary of that department urged the veto of a measure which had been passed by both branches of a State legislature. In other cases, the association conducted its activities through member manufacturers who were requested to ask their dealers to present certain views to their State legislators. This practice of working through dealers does not appear commendable, as it leaves the impression that the dealers may have been coerced, through fear of manufacturer reprisals, into taking a stand otherwise contrary to their best interests.

The association has been active in furthering highway safety through plans for the disposal of obsolete automobiles which were considered dangerous on the highways. Under some plans, the manufacturers allowed dealers a bonus to apply on their allowances for junked automobiles.

AUTOMOBILE DEALERS' TRADE ASSOCIATION ACTIVITIES

The survey made of the activities of a limited number of State and local dealer associations indicate that although dealers' associations have not been able to accomplish all of their objects respecting improvement in dealer profits and operating conditions; they have, however, accomplished a number of things desired by their members, especially through legislative activities. The Wisconsin and Iowa associations, for example, have been successful in obtaining the enactment of legislation which they desired. Similar associations in many other States have actively sponsored laws to regulate trade in used cars, especially by limiting the importation of used cars and taxicabs. Also, State associations have sponsored the formation and activities of local dealer associations with varying degrees of success.

Various State associations are affiliated nationally to form the National Automobile Dealers Association which conducts on a national scale various legislative and other activities intended to benefit the interests of dealers. At most, however, the National Automobile Dealers Association represents directly only about 10 to 15 percent of the 40,000 or more automobile dealers of the country. Possibly this is due, in part at least, to the fact that in the past some manufacturers have objected to their dealers becoming members of State and local associations.

In further explanation of this apparent lack of interest of dealers in the national association, a number of dealers have pointed out that many of the key positions among the executive officers and directors of both State and local associations have been occupied by wholesale distributors and manufacturer-controlled dealers. It is further alleged that the interests of such dealers parallel those of the manufacturers with whom they are affiliated, rather than those of the large majority of independent dealers who are not so affiliated. Dealers dissatisfied with the past conduct of the national association claim that the influence of manufacturers, exerted through such key-position dealers, prevented it from really representing the interests of dealers.

BASIS OF MANUFACTURER-DEALER RELATIONS

The larger automobile manufacturers, especially, exerecise extensive supervision over many of their dealers. This statement applies to conditions at the present time as well as in the past, although during 1938 the methods of supervision employed were less direct than in former years. Many instances which were disclosed by the Commission's inquiry confirm complaints of the types made to the Congress at the time the inquiry was under consideration. Under threat or fear of cancelation, some dealers have reported they felt compelled to operate their businesses in such a manner that their profits were wiped out and even their investments were largely dissipated.

This investigation disclosed some cases in which the dealer, upon cancelation of his contract, not only had nothing in prospect but also was burdened with a substantial investment in buildings, leaseholds, equipment, stocks of used cars, accessories, and parts in the liquidation of which he often sustained a heavy loss. Some dealers reported that in fear of cancelation or refusal to renew contracts, faced with such injurious consequences, have, against their best business judgment, accepted terms and adopted policies dictated by the manufacturer.

Many of the dealers have complained of the following provisions in manufacture-dealer agreements:

(1) That the dealer shall make a capital investment that is satisfactory to the manufacturer; that no capital withdrawals may be made without the consent of the manufacturer and that, if the manufacturer so indicates, the dealer must leave in the business such part of the profits thereof as may be necessary to increase the investment to a point satisfactory to the manufacturer.

(2) That the dealer shall at all times maintain salesrooms, service facilities, and signs satisfactory to the manufacturer.

(3) That the dealer shall develop his sales territory to the satisfaction of the manufacturer, including the maintenance of sales and service personnel approved by the manufacturer.

(4) That the dealer shall comply with all of the manufacturer's policies, whether set out in the agreement, or in addenda thereto, or communicated by letters, or even by oral statements of his field agents who make most of the contacts with the dealers.

(5) That in carrying out these policies, the dealer places orders that are binding upon him, but are not binding upon the manufacturer until accepted.

(6) That the manufacturer disclaims all financial responsibility for the dealer's commitments, even though they may have been made at the instance of the manufacturer's field men, who, by the terms of the agreement, cannot bind the manufacturer in any way by statements, promises, or understandings that are not reduced to writing, signed by designated officials of the manufacturing company, and made a part of the dealer's written agreement.

(7) That the dealer must either sell exclusively the line of the manufacturer signing the agreement, or that another, or competing, line may not be handled by the dealer without the consent of the said manufacturer.

(8) That an agreement may be canceled by the manufacturer upon short notice, compared with the dealer's ability to readjust his investment and financial obligations.

Notwithstanding the fact that the dealer agreements, particularly of the three large manufacturers, have been revised since the commencement of this investigation, not all of the bases for dealer complaint have been eliminated.

The manufacturing companies give wide authority to their field representatives, and their general officers may not always be fully aware of the frequency and extent of dealer complaints or the bases therefor. Provision, however, has been made by one of the large companies for appeals to a board, composed of higher company officials.

Some of the smaller manufacturers have recently featured claims of friendliness and fairness as characterizing their attitude toward their dealers and have cited changes in their 1939 contracts as indicating a better deal for dealers under which dealers of independence are given an opportunity to successfully build their businesses on a permanent basis without intrusive factory interference.

PRESSURE ON DEALERS TO TAKE CARS, PARTS, ACCESSORIES, TOOLS, AND EQUIPMENT

This inquiry developed the fact that there has been pressure, especially by the largest three manufacturers, on many dealers, to take and sell new cars. Some manufacturers have canceled the contracts of dealers who do not attain desired volume of sales. This pressure has been less severe since this inquiry was ordered.

Demand for increased volume originates with the manufacturer and apparently increases with successive steps from the manufacturer through the manufacturer's branch and zone selling organizations to the dealer. A practice of manufacturers is to establish sales estimates and, on the basis of these estimates, to assign to their branches or zones more or less definite sales quotas. The branch or zone managements break down these quotas among distributors or dealers, thus assigning these distributors or dealers their quotas. In order to attain the quota assigned them the branch managers exert pressure on their field representatives who in turn press the dealers to take sufficient cars to sell the quotas assigned them or at least to maintain the manufacturer's percentage of new car registrations in that market.

Cases were reported in which dealers were influenced to take such large numbers of cars near the end of the model year that the losses sustained entirely offset the dealers' profits during the following year and in some instances led to the financial failure of dealers. This year-end pressure in general has not been as severe in recent years, and was rarely reported at the end of the 1938 model year.

Conditions similar to those described in connection with forcing dealers to order cars also were found to exist in varying degrees in respect to inducing dealers to purchase unwanted parts, accessories, tools, and equipment. This complaint of dealers, especially with respect to parts and accessories, is closely related to the manufacturers' service policy under which dealers are required to handle and use only "authorized" repair parts and accessories in order to assure satisfactory service as a means of protecting the interest of the car user and manufacturer. Enforcement of this policy may require the dealer to use exclusively authorized repair parts and accessories of the car manufacturer on which the dealer makes a smaller profit than would be made if parts and accessories were purchased from other sources. In addition, some manufacturers have objected to the practice of some dealers of charging prices for accessories that are higher than the manufacturers' suggested resale prices when such accessories are sold with new cars, because the prices charged are regarded as such as to interfere with the sale of the new cars.

MANUFACTURERS' USED-CAR POLICIES AND PRACTICES

For many years there has been a steady increase in the number of new-car buyers who offer used cars for trade as part payment in the purchase of new cars. The records of manufacturers show that in their desire to have their dealers sell the maximum number of new cars, consideration has been given to used-car merchandising as a competitive factor affecting both the number of new cars sold and the profits of retailers who sell them. Manufacturers, especially the larger ones who are the leaders in industry, have had various policies at different times respecting the handling of used cars by their dealers.

Prior to 1925, Ford Motor Co., recognized that the amount of allowances made by dealers on used cars taken in trade could be made the means of indirectly cutting the suggested prices of new cars which Ford Motor Co. wished dealers to maintain, and that competitive overallowances for used cars reduced dealer margins and profits through losses in subsequent merchandising of used cars. Ford Motor Co., therefore, took the position that its dealers should buy and sell used cars on a basis yielding a merchandising profit, or at least no loss, and enforced this policy by canceling as price cutters, dealers who made overallowances on used cars. Later, this position was abandoned in favor of one under which the dealer should so conduct his used-car business as to result in a maximum of new-car sales. Recognition was given to the fact that to do this dealers must often overallow on trade-ins in order to make sales, and the percentage of dealer margin on new-car sales was increased from 17½ to 22 percent in 1930, and later to 25 percent in order to provide larger gross profit on new cars to enable dealers to make larger allowances for trade-ins without suffering loss on the total business done in both new and used cars.

General Motors, on the other hand, as early as 1925, took the position that its dealers should not get business by consistent overbidding for used cars but that in certain instances it might be better to handle used cars taken in trade at little or no profit, or even at a small loss, rather than to lose new-car sales. Somewhat later in the year 1925, the minutes of the general sales committee of General Motors Corporation indicate that it was the concensus of opinion of members of the committee that no definite policy should be adopted respecting encouragement of dealers to make more liberal allowances for used cars taken in trade. It also was concluded that sufficient funds should be provided by the dealer to carry the requisite number of used cars, as well as new cars, over the winter months.

In 1930 General Motors also gave attention to what might be done to reduce dealer mortality due to used-car trading without decreasing the volume of sales of used and new cars. As the result of this study, the chairman of the general sales committee of General Motors Corporation stated that, in his opinion, it was necessary for each selling division of the corporation to take a positive stand on the subject of used-car trading and, at the same time, to initiate a strong new-car sales promotional effort to offset any tendency of this policy to decrease new-car volume. Used-car policies of other manufacturers have developed along similar lines.

Another method of assisting dealers was through junking plans pursued partly as a matter of safety on the highways and partly as a means of removing from the market the maximum number of used cars as they approached the end of their utility as safe and economical transportation. Extensive accounting and statistical studies also have been made the basis for formulating used-car merchandising plans to be followed by their dealers.

Some of the manufacturers' plans for the merchandising of used cars by their dealers, when considered in connection with pressure claimed to have been exerted to bring about the sale of the maximum number of new cars, have been the subject of dealer complaint to the effect that they were not permitted by their manufacturers to conduct their businesses in accordance with their own best judgment.

EXCLUSIVE HANDLING OF ONE MANUFACTURER'S LINE

For years it has been the general policy of each motor vehicle manufacturing company to limit its dealers to the exclusive handling of its line of cars. This, in general, is true of both large and small manufacturers. Various conditions, however, may make it inadvisable to follow this practice strictly in every instance because the volume of business for a single line may be insufficient to support a dealership. This situation was met during the depression by the establishment of a considerable number of dual dealerships handling the productions of more than one manufacturer. With the return of more normal times there has been a marked decrease in the number of such dual dealerships. This is true of both dealerships handling more than one line made by a particular manufacturer and of dealerships handling more than one line made by different manufacturers.

In setting up multiple-line dealers, the large manufacturers such as General Motors, Chrysler, and Ford, that manufacture several different lines covering a wide price range, have a distinct advantage over their smaller competitors in that they can set up multiple-line dealerships handling only their own lines.

Facts developed in this inquiry indicate that Chrysler Corporation, Ford Motor Co., and General Motors Corporation are the most emphatic in their demands that their dealers shall handle no other manufacturer's line. Some dealers have been canceled by these concerns because they either took on additional makes of cars or refused to discontinue other makes already handled.

Also, General Motors Corporation has advocated the placing of their lines with dealers already handling other manufacturers' lines with the express purpose of eventually eliminating the competing lines. If the dealerships required the handling of more than a single line to operate profitably, the General Motors policy was to replace the line eliminated with a second line of its own. It appears that Chrysler Corporation has pursued a somewhat similar policy in forcing out other manufacturers' lines.

MANUFACTURERS' POLICIES AND PRACTICES RESPECTING DEALER ACCOUNTING

Among the principal interests of the manufacturers in accounting systems of dealers is the question of adequacy of these systems in furnishing the manufacturer with uniform information concerning the details of the dealer's business. This is evidenced by the fact that while some of the manufacturers exert pressure to some extent upon dealers to adopt their prescribed accounting systems, the principal insistence of the manufacturer is that, whatever system is used, it must be capable or supplying the information required by the manufacturer.

The information obtained in audits and in reports required of dealers has been reported to have been used sometimes by some of the leading manufacturers as the basis for pressure on their dealers to increase investments, facilities, and personnel, and otherwise to carry out merchandising plans and policies intended to increase volume of sales of new cars and accessories.

TRANSPORTATION CHARGES IN EXCESS OF AMOUNTS ACTUALLY PAID

Some manufacturers often bill their dealers for transportation in amounts in excess of the actual cost of delivering automobiles to the dealers. It appears that the greatest number of dealer complaints concerning excess freight charges pertain to the manufacturers' practice of shipping automobiles to dealers from nearby assembly plants and requiring the dealers to pay for transportation in an amount equivalent to or even greater than the rail freight rates from the factory to the dealers' delivery points.

The 1938 dealer agreement of the Chevrolet Motor Division of General Motors Corporation provides in part that the manufacturer has the right to ship by whatever mode of transportation and from whatever point he may select, and that the dealer agrees to pay a transportation charge to be determined by the manufacturer based on the all-rail freight charge from Flint, Mich., to the dealer's delivery point. Other General Motors divisions have similar provisions in their dealer agreements. The Ford Motor Co's transportation charges are based on the carload rate from Detroit, Mich., to destination. Both the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Co. have assembly plants in various parts of the country.

Transportation charges in excess of the actual amount paid apparently are not confined to deliveries from assembly plants.

Some dealers regard excess transportation charges as a manufacturer's "pack" and, as the dealers generally pass them on to the consumers, it appears that these excess charges operate especially to the disadvantage of those consumers who reside at points most distant from the factories.

SALES OF DRIVEN CARS AS NEW CARS

The inquiry developed that some manufacturers allowed dealers to take cars from the factory or assembly plants and drive them to distant places for sale to users as new cars. These cars were reported to have been driven with speedometers disconnected, frequently at high rates of speed and even pulling a second "new" car. It was contended by some manufacturers that the regularly constructed passenger cars were not built with sufficient power and strength to pull another car and that if this was done an injurious strain was thereby placed on the towing "new" car. It was further contended that the towed car was not guided, but instead skidded around turns and corners and that this was injurious to the tires and chassis of the towed "new" car.

In numerous instances it was developed that new cars that had been used by dealers as demonstrators or by manufacturer or dealer officials, sometimes driven distances up to 4,000 miles or for a period not exceeding 3 months, were then sold to users as new cars.

Conclusions

The main features of this report that directly affect the conclusions and recommendations that may be of public interest concern three branches of economic activity and their relations to each other, namely, the motor-vehicle manufacturers, the motor-vehicle dealers, and the companies financing the purchase of motor vehicles on installment payments. The conclusions to be considered in this connection relate especially to the competitive conditions and the extent of, or trends toward, concentration, and any abuses prevailing in these fields in the nature of unfair methods of competition or unfair or deceptive acts or practices.

CONCENTRATION IN THE MOTOR-VEHICLE INDUSTRY

The Commission finds that a high degree of concentration prevails in the motor-vehicle industry, there being in 1938 only 11 companies (or company groups) producing passenger cars regularly, and 3 of them had no less than 89 percent of the total unit sales of passenger cars; that among these 3 leading motor-vehicle manufacturers there prevails, apparently, a condition of active competition.

The Commission finds that in the early stages of the industry, when there were many small motor-vehicle manufacturers, the General Motors Corporation had an advantage resulting from the acquisition and combination of several of the leading companies making distinct lines of motor vehicles, some of which included two or more types of cars of different price classes; and that the company now known as the Chrysler Corporation to a less extent obtained a similar advantage through the purchase of the Dodge line, but it was also greatly aided by its development of the Chrysler and Plymouth cars.

On the other hand, the Ford Motor Co. development was characterized substantially by a concentration of its efforts on developing a single line of very low-priced motor vehicles, which for a time put it in the forefront of the industry in unit production.

COMPETITION IN PRODUCTION AND PRICES

There is strong competition for business in the automobile industry both among manufacturers and retail dealers. Price competition in motor vehicles, however, is naturally different from that in commodities that are of the same, or standardized, description and quality for producers generally. The constant effort of a motor-vehicle manufacturer is to emphasize the superiority of his car and the special features it has as a justification for this claim. The retail prices of motor vehicles are widely advertised by the manufacturers, and the dealers are expected generally to conform to them, except in connection with allowances for "trade-ins." In some instances, however, where a low-priced car, for example, of one manufacturer has been reduced, a competing manufacturer has made a corresponding reduction for his car in the same price class; price reductions on current models are sometimes made also for the higher-priced cars just before the annual change to new models.

Competition of manufacturers with respect to passenger cars in the low-price class is more in volume than in prices, though prices are potentially important.

With reference to any question of price fixing in other price classes, the nature of the demand is such, and consumer preference such a vital element of demand, that it would be difficult not only to fix prices but also to establish any quota system of production, even if the retail dealers could be brought into effective cooperation for that purpose.

Policies with respect to exclusive handling of the product of a particular manufacturer by a dealer having a dealership agreement with him tend to restrict competition by making it more difficult for the smaller manufacturers to obtain adequate dealer representation, because in many markets they are unable to establish exclusive dealerships with sufficient volume to operate profitably. Such restriction of competition perpetuates the high degree of concentration already existing in the hands of the three large manufacturers.

Active competition among automobile manufacturers, although some of them have made very large profits, gave to the public improved products, often at substantially reduced prices. In the automobile industry this has been especially true of those manufacturers who are able to obtain large volume of production through competitive improvement in motor-vehicle construction, style, performance, and safety, particularly in the low-priced class. Such competition has been the basis for the remarkable growth of the industry.

Consumer benefits from competition in the automobile-manufacturing industry have probably been more substantial than in any other large industry studied by the Commission.

COMPETITION AMONG MOTOR-VEHICLE DEALERS

The Commission finds that the retail motor-vehicle trade is competitive in the sense that the individual dealer generally pushes actively the sale of the particular make of motor vehicles which he is under contract to sell, and that the prices thereof, as advertised by the motor-vehicle manufacturer, though quite generally adhered to in appearance, are frequently cut by allowances for "used cars" quite generally "traded in" as part payment for new cars. These allowances are sometimes excessive in the sense that, when reconditioned and sold, the prices obtained for them are substantially below such allowances. In a number of instances the Commission found evidence of local combinations among motor-vehicle dealers to prevent competition regarding such allowances made on used cars "traded in."

"PADDING" NEW- AND USED-CAR PRICES

It is also concluded from the study that the practices of dealers of "padding" new-car prices and "packing" finance charges falls most heavily on the minority of automobile buyers who have no used cars to trade. The majority of car buyers who have cars to trade also suffer in case the amount of consumer price enhancement is greater than the overallowance made by dealers.

DEALER PRICE-FIXING ACTIVITIES

The Commission finds that local associations of motor-vehicle dealers in various parts of the country have engaged in the following practices to fix or maintain prices: (1) Fixing minimum prices on new cars, often by means of uniform maximum discounts from the manufacturer resale prices in transactions where no trade-ins are involved; (2) establishing maximum purchase prices or allowances for used cars taken in trade; (3) regulating bidding on used cars taken in trade by means of uniform minimum increases on all bids subsequent to the original bid, or by requiring all bids subsequent to the original bids to be less than the original bid; and (4) adopting published used-car price guides as a basis for maximum allowances for used cars.

The Commission found that in certain instances and in varying degrees General Motors Corporation and Ford Motor Co., or representatives of these companies, cooperated with dealers in the formulation or operation of dealer plans to fix retail prices and limit dealer competition. Ford Motor Co., however, in its 1939 dealer agreements requires its dealers "to avoid in every way such trade practices in connection with dealer's competition with other Ford dealers and in selling company products to the public as are injurious to company's good name and good will or are detrimental to public interest."

LEGAL ASPECTS OF USED-CAR VALUATION OR APPRAISAL BUREAUS

The Commission found that many local associations operate used-car valuation or appraisal bureaus that are essentially combinations of dealers in particular localities who are bound by agreements to restrict competition in used-car trading. A plan in effect in a large city in 1938 entirely eliminated competitive bidding if the prospective buyer obtained his first bid on his used car from the dealer in whose zone, or trading area, he resided.

The question as to whether Federal jurisdiction exists respecting such local association activities depends upon whether interstate commerce is involved. In complaints before the Commission in which cooperation with local combinations of dealers to control used-car trade-in allowances was a factor, upon investigation it was found that interstate commerce was not involved to a sufficiently substantial extent to establish jurisdictional requisites. Consequently, cases have either been closed subject to the Commission's right to reopen them, or dismissed without prejudice. In general, therefore, the regulation of the activities of such local combinations of dealers becomes a matter to be handled by the law-enforcement agencies of the various States, acting under their respective State laws, the terms of which vary greatly among the approximately 40 States that have enacted State antitrust acts.

UNFAIR METHODS OF MOTOR-VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS IN THEIR RELATIONS WITH THEIR DEALERS

The Commission finds that motor-vehicle manufacturers, and, by reason of their great power especially General Motors Corporation, Chrysler Corporation, and Ford Motor Co., have been and still are imposing on their respective dealers unfair and inequitable conditions of trade by requiring such dealers to accept and operate under agreements that inadequately define the rights and obligations of the parties, and are, moreover, objectionable in respect to defect of mutuality; that some dealers, in fact, report that they have been subjected to rigid inspections of premises and accounts, and to arbitrary requirements by their respective motor-vehicle manufacturers to accept for resale quantities of motor vehicles or other goods deemed excessive by the dealer, or to make investments in operating plants or equipment without adequate guaranty as to term of agreement or even supply of merchandise; and that adequate provisions are not included for an equitable method of liquidation of such investments, sometimes made at the insistence of the respective motor-vehicle manufacturer.

MANUFACTURERS' TREATMENT OF DEALERS

In the opinion of the Commission, this inquiry has demonstrated that inequities exist in the terms of dealer agreements, and in certain manufacturers' treatment of some dealers, calling for remedial action.

It is recommended that present unfair practices be abated to the end that dealers have: (a) Less restriction upon the management of their own enterprises; (b) quota requirements and shipments of cars based upon mutual agreement; (c) equitable liquidation in the event of contract termination by the manufacturer; (d) contracts definite as to the mutual rights and obligations of the manufacturers and the dealers, including specific provision that the contract will be continued for a definite term unless terminated by breach of reasonable conditions recited therein.

ABUSES OF INSTALLMENT FINANCING

The Commission finds that in the methods employed by some of the companies engaged in financing the purchaser of a new motor vehicle serious abuses have developed not only in permitting dealers to impose exorbitant charges but also in serious deception, or even direct defraudation, of the purchaser.

In the more general practice by the larger companies, the principal objection was that in the original advertising of the so-called 6-percent plan it was not made clear that the finance-charge rates were not interest rates and that the interest rates implied in the charges were nearly twice as much as 6 percent per annum on the money borrowed. However, the application of this plan constituted a substantial reduction from the rates of finance charge and interest that were in general use just previously.

The more serious deceptions have been engaged in generally by the dealer, often in connivance with a finance company. The practices here referred to relate to the so-called "packs" (padding), which are additions made, for no extra service, by the dealer to the regular finance charges provided in the finance company's minimum rate chart; and certain finance companies provided their dealers with the instrumentalities for such deceptions by furnishing them with two or more rate charts based on different rates of charge.

The Commission found, among the 30 finance companies examined, 1 finance company that systematically failed to afford car purchasers a portion of the insurance protection for which they were charged.

ITEMIZED INVOICE NEEDED FOR CONSUMER PROTECTION

In order that the automobile purchaser may be protected against overcharges, there is need of regulation requiring retail automobile dealers to furnish each retail purchaser with an itemized invoice showing in detail the components of the cash-sale price—stating separately the charges for accessories, Federal excise tax, State or local sales tax, transportation, advertising, "handling charges," service, motor-vehicle license, motor-vehicle title registration, and each other charge included in the cash-sale price of the vehicle as delivered—and the components of charges added to the cash-sale price by reason of the fact that the vehicle is sold on time—the amount and components of the retail insurance premium and the extent of the coverage to be provided for each component, the amounts respectively charged for recording fee, notary fee, and documentary stamp tax, and the amount of the finance charge.

DECEPTION IN CHARGES FOR TRANSPORTATION OF MOTOR VEHICLES

The frequent practice of either motor-vehicle manufacturers or dealers of adding to the factory price a transportation charge to a certain point of delivery based on the published railroad rate, but which is greater than that actually incurred by the manufacturer or dealer because of differing methods of transportation and delivery, is, in the opinion of the Commission, an unjustifiable imposition upon the purchasers of such vehicles, which should be eliminated.

SALE OF DRIVEN CARS AS NEW CARS

The practice of some retail dealers in selling as new cars those which have been towed or driven from the factory or used as demonstrators, unless the full facts, including the miles driven, are disclosed to the purchaser is deceptive and unfair and should be eliminated.

By the Commission.

R. E. FREER,
Chairman, Federal Trade Commission.

Hands Off the U. S. A.!

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 24, 1939

ARTICLE BY J. G. JOHNSTON

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "Hands Off the U. S. A.!" by J. G. Johnston, which appears in the October issue of Canadian Business, a trade magazine circulated in the Dominion of Canada. In view of the pending neutrality issue, I consider this article interesting and important. It should be read by every Member of Congress.

The article is as follows:

[From Canadian Business for October]

HANDS OFF THE U. S. A.!

(By J. G. Johnston)

SELF-RESTRAINT NEEDED

It is hoped that Canadians refrain from telling the United States that that country ought forthwith to declare war on Germany. If the United States ever does join in what we Canadians believe is a fight for the liberties which the United States enjoys and must preserve, it will not be because Canadians have told them what to do. They will join of their own accord, if they join at all. Intimations that they are derelict in their duty are more likely to restrain the United States than to urge them forward.

SHELLS FOR ISOLATIONISTS

A most important thing is that Canada continue to have the friendship and understanding of the people of the United States. The tendency of a section of the press to take sides against the isolationists did not help those who were anxious, as a first step against Hitlerism, to enable Britain and France and Canada to buy munitions produced in the United States. On the contrary, Senator BORAH could have cited Canadian criticism of him as an evidence that the Allied cause desperately needed what he opposed.

UNCLE SAM'S OWN REASONS

After all, we Canadians have no right to tell our friends what stand they should take on the war. And it is execrable taste. One does not tell a neighbor how to conduct himself. One may hope that a neighbor might join in helping catch a burglar who has happened to make an entry into our house instead of his, but there is no obligation for him to do so. To excoriate him for his failure to volunteer is merely to impair a friendship. The neighbor may have a fairly good reason, from his point of view, for not helping at once.

COUSINS NOT BROTHERS

In the earlier part of the last war I wrote editorials on a pro-Ally newspaper in the United States. I saw the metamorphosis of United States opinion from a neutral, almost pro-German and almost certainly anti-British attitude, to the uprising of indignation when the Lusitania was sunk. I went through the "He kept us out of war" campaign of Woodrow Wilson and I was not yet in my Canadian uniform on that April morning when a state of war was declared to exist between the United States and Imperial Germany.

The excuse for the reminiscence is to give some slight authority to the thought that I may be able, as a borderer to interpret United States thought in Canada and vice versa. On both sides of the boundary we are apt to think that because we wear the same clothes, talk the same slang, and indulge in the same amusements, we are the same people. If we were the same people, it would be easier for a business in one country to be managed in the other. But under the skin we are different.

CANADA'S FAMILY TIES

I am not predicting that the isolationist sentiment will prevail, but it will be understandable if it does, and it should not impair our good relations with our friends across the border. George Washington advised his young country to stand aloof from Europe's quarrels and his words are still highly regarded by the many who do not see, as clearly as we think we see, that the world has grown so small that America today is almost as close to the continent as England was in the eighteenth century.

That is one thing. Another is that even the people of British descent in the United States have not maintained the same family and social ties with Britain that Canadians of comparable length of time on this continent have maintained with relatives and friends in Britain. To the average English-speaking person in the United States the prospect that English homes and English children may be bombed and gassed from the air is horrible and criminal but hardly more personal than the bombing of Warsaw. We must remember that citizens of the United States may be Anglo-Saxon in mentality but that for more than 150 years they have consciously been creating a tradition which is non-British.

"PEACE" WILL COMES FIRST

The views of many sincere isolationists certainly are not today pro-German or Fascist. They are not anti-British views, for the professional Irishman has shot his bolt and is discounted where not discredited. The average citizen is likely to support the Borah view—if he does support that view—for reasons similar to the apparent reasons that gave Mr. Chamberlain the hope that he came back from Munich with a permanent peace. In my view, we cannot blame the United States if it stays out of the war and if it succumbs to the Borah view that the neutrality law, as it has stood for the last 2 or 3 years, is one way of guaranteeing peace in our time in their own country.

In any event, the less we Canadians have to say as to what we might think is their duty the better for all concerned.

Controlling War Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, OF WYOMING

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this afternoon I had the privilege of participating in a forum conducted by the New York Herald Tribune. The subject of the discussion was Controlling War Profits. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If we are to deal with realities this afternoon, we shall have to begin by changing the title of this talk. Not "Controlling War Profits" but "Preventing War Losses" is our problem, for modern war holds nothing but death and disaster for everyone it touches. Belligerents and neutrals alike suffer under its blight.

One would scarcely imagine that in a generation which has not yet recovered from the effects of the World War there would be a single, intelligent person capable of believing that another great international conflict could be really profitable to anyone, yet the sudden sharp rise of commodity prices in this country in the weeks immediately following the outbreak of the present European war was a demonstration that in some quarters at least the hope of great profit was entertained. The more recent cessation of these advances may be a sign of a growing comprehension of the real character of modern war, and, if so, it will be our greatest safeguard in what may easily be humanity's most critical emergency.

WAR NOW THE CLASH OF PEOPLES

Science and invention, which have transformed the whole economic scene, which have abolished time and distance, eradicated boundaries and lifted man out of narrow localities, opening whole nations and continents to the scope of his activities, have also changed war from the conflict of professional armies to the clash of whole peoples. When war was carried on with hand-made implements, its effects were as circumscribed as its campaigns, and the masses of the people, unless they found themselves in the immediate theater of conflict, were frequently undisturbed. Certainly, at all events, there were no such dislocations of the entire structure of society and commerce as those which are produced by modern war.

The machine-made weapon has succeeded the comparatively simple implements of war which were in use as late as our own Civil War. The navies of the air and the sea and of the regions under the sea, the monster guns which fortify the lines of concrete and steel that mark the Franco-German frontier, can be produced only by the concentrated activity of whole peoples. The modern nation which turns to war must be content to mobilize all its resources, both human and natural, for the sole purpose of destruction, the disastrous effects of which are felt not alone along the battle front but by every person and every nation, belligerent or neutral, which has contributed to the erection of the war machine.

It is because the people of America have comprehended the frightfulness of modern warfare that there has risen from every section of this country an unmistakable demand that we shall not become involved in the European war. It is the same comprehension, I firmly believe, that is restraining the high command on both sides in Europe from initiating a major offensive. It may be too much to hope that this restraint will continue until unforeseen developments save Europe, and we must, therefore, consider the effect upon our own economy if and when wholesale destruction is unleashed in Europe.

HAZARDS OF TRADE GREATLY INCREASED

He who looks for a profit in supplying materials to belligerent nations—and all materials are war materials in the modern world—is overlooking the facts, first, that the American people are decreeing that no credit shall be extended for the purchase of these materials; and, second, that all American ships are to be withdrawn from trade in the war zones. This means that both the expense of trading and the hazards of payment for the trade will be vastly increased. Moreover, he overlooks an elementary characteristic of all trade; namely, that in the last analysis exports can be paid for only by imports. Trade between nations, like trade between individuals, is the exchange of goods and services. Money is but a symbol, useless in itself save when it can command goods and services; but when two powerful nations clash in modern warfare they undertake to destroy their capacity to produce the goods and services in which alone payment can be made. This is the reason why the debts of the last war have not been paid. It must be obvious, therefore, that when the property which any belligerent now owns in this country has been exhausted, the power of that country to offer anything in exchange for the supplies it needs will also have been exhausted. It is, therefore, only a limited market that the European conflict opens to American business, limited, first, by the capacity of the belligerents to pay; and second, by the will of the people of America not to permit war trade to involve us in a foreign war.

That there will be a considerable demand for exports from the United States to belligerents nations, and to other nations which were formerly supplied by the belligerents, is nevertheless to be expected. The record of the years from 1914 to 1918 will, however, be scarcely a safe criterion upon which to base expectations. Twenty-five years ago 63 percent of all our exports went to Europe. Today only slightly more than 40 percent of our foreign shipments are destined for that continent. Shipments to Asia have increased from 5 to 17 percent and Latin American shipments have grown to such an extent that they now approximate 19 percent of all our exports. It is true that shipments to the United Kingdom were about 27 percent greater in September than they were in August, but in the same period shipments to France declined by more than 45 percent.

These figures indicate an underlying trend which can only be accentuated by the considerations which I have already mentioned, namely, that the belligerent nations will have comparatively little cash and no credit with which to carry on their trade with us and that the American merchant fleets will no longer sail into European ports.

REACTION BRINGS GREAT LOSSES

Whatever may be the effect of these circumstances upon our trade with Europe, however, it will be a short-sighted policy if manufacturers and exporters yield to the temptation to allow prices to reach speculative levels. The reaction from such levels brings in its wake losses far greater than the temporary profits reaped by the short-sighted trader who chooses to ignore the characteristics of modern war. The fall of the commodity price index from 167 in May 1920, to 96 in May of the following year, a collapse which was registered in a sharp rise of the number of bank and commercial failures, tells the story of an experience which neither business nor government can afford to forget.

Factory wage payments which had risen to high levels during the war tumbled from over $12,000,000,000 in 1920 to only a little over $8,000,000,000 in 1921, and even during the good years of 1924 and 1925, defaulted bonds were telling the story of war inflation—an inflation which did not bring its full and final effects until 1929. If prices are permitted to increase at a rate out of all proportion to increased production, it will be impossible to escape such a rise in the cost of living as was experienced during the Great War; and this, in turn, would lead inevitably to irresistible demands for Government price fixing and stringent laws against profiteering.

The brief experience we have had during the past 6 weeks with price increases has resulted in an avalanche of complaints to the Federal Government. From every corner of the country—from farmers and from housewives, from public officials, from trade unions, from citizens' associations, and from businessmen—the complaints have poured into the Department of Justice of allegedly unjustifiable price increases accompanied by demands for punitive action. I am told that as many as 1,500 of these petitions have already been received, and that they are still coming in at the rate of 100 every week.

PROFITEERING MAY MEAN REGIMENTATION

This is a demand for control, and "control" is the verb which was used in the subject assigned to me today. "Control," in this sense, means Government action. It means the exercise of Government authority to restrain and direct the activity of the citizen. Such authority would involve either the enactment of a criminal statute to prohibit profiteering or the establishment of a civil tribunal to fix prices. The obvious difficulties of establishing an adequate standard by which to differentiate between reasonable and unreasonable prices only serve to emphasize the arbitrary nature of the control that would have to be assumed. This is the condition quite properly described as "regimentation"—a condition which authoritarian states have deliberately imposed upon their people as a matter of policy, and to which democratic states are compelled to turn in the emergency of war. It brings in its train effects from which it is difficult ever again to escape, as witness the fact that among the governmental relics of our participation in the World War we still have at Washington an Alien Property Custodian, a Director General of Railroads, a United States Housing Corporation, and a War Minerals Relief Authority.

Obviously, if a neutral nation like the United States is to avoid such regimentation as a necessary result of existing on the same planet on which a great war is in progress, such a nation must develop a formula for self-organization to protect and preserve its own prosperity and its own democracy. This I hold to be self-evident that a democratic nation cannot be organized upon a punitive basis. The laws of democracy must represent the will of democracy. In a country like ours, no course of action can be imposed by law which the people themselves do not naturally and voluntarily adopt.

EXPLOITATION CAN YIELD NO REAL PROFIT

To protect ourselves, therefore, from the losses of war and likewise from some form of unwelcome government control, we must learn, all of us, whether in business or in government, employer or employee, farmer or artisan, industrial executive or commercial trader, that in the modern world successful business cannot be based upon exploitation. Modern war is a conflict of peoples only because modern industry has outgrown the old local and individual bounds. Over and over again it has been stated that the economic frontiers of our generation have abolished practically all geographical frontiers. The result of this is that our economic life is a unit and that no part of the population can prosper permanently if any part of the population is depressed.

I am deeply sensible of the fact that management in modern American industry is now more keenly alive to its responsibilities to consumers, to workers, and to investors than it ever has been. There is a broader recognition now than ever before that profits are not to be made out of exorbitant prices, but out of increased production and increased distribution, a condition which cannot possibly be brought about under any system of profiteering. Enlightened self-interest, therefore, will prompt every person who has anything to do with the charges which are made for commodities at any stage between the production of the raw material and the sale of the finished article to keep those charges from rising above a justifiable level. The avoidance of exploitation of consumers through profiteering is the only sure and certain way to prevent the development of an irresistible demand for Government control. The price structure today is in private hands. It will stay there if it is not abused, for private power passes to public hands only if its exercise results in wrongs, for which the public insists upon a remedy.

DEMOCRACY AND SYSTEM OF PRIVATE PROPERTY CLOSELY ALLIED

The most important lesson for our people to take to heart in this great emergency—and this applies particularly to the leaders of business—is that the institution of private property and the political principles of democracy are so closely interrelated as to be parts of the same concept. Democracy is the principle of individual sovereignty, individual freedom. The institution of private property is based upon the right of the individual freely to labor and freely to possess the fruits of his labor.

Both democracy and the institution of private property are under attack whenever any individual, group, class, or any government undertakes a program of exploitation. It is clear, therefore, that the profiteer who, by a combination with his fellows or who by independent action of his own, attempts to take advantage of a great emergency to levy unconscionable charges upon the public is an enemy both of democracy and of the capitalistic system.

Given a clear comprehension of the realities of the economic situation on the part of all who play a controlling part in our economic life, I think it is quite possible for our Government, by gathering and coordinating available statistical information and by directing attention to the clear mandates of the antitrust law, to aid business to avoid the ills which will inevitably follow from speculative and indiscriminate price rises. Never before was there a greater need for intelligent, patient, and tolerant cooperation among all classes of our citizens to develop our own resources and to distribute them for the benefit of all. If we would indeed prevent the losses of war, we should make up our minds to put profit into peace. This would mean an end to exploitation and an end to class antagonisms and the beginning of a great democratic movement to distribute equitably among all our people the abundance which Nature provides.

When we look out upon the world and see the manner in which men organize for the tragic and destructive ends of war, surely it must compel us, who proudly call ourselves the leading democratic nation of the world, to organize for the ends of peace.

The first step in such a program will, it seems to me, be a realization that in the modern world business is carried on by huge corporate organizations before the powers of which men as individuals are lost. Too frequently it is overlooked that the powers of government here and throughout the world have expanded in direct ratio to the growth of the modern business corporation.

It is the concentration of economic power in giant corporations that has resulted during the last generation in the gradual transfer of authority from private to public hands. It is a trend that must be acknowledged to be at variance with our traditional belief that government authority over the citizen should be restricted within the narrowest possible bounds, but it is a trend that cannot be stayed so long as the power of economic organizations to dominate the economic life of the masses continues to expand.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM OUR GREATEST NEED

The present problem of price control in a world at war only emphasizes the need of new corporate standards of public authority and responsibility, to be expressed in a national corporation law, standards which shall set business free from arbitrary government control by setting the masses free from arbitrary private control. If we really believe in democracy and the preservation of the institution of private property, we shall immediately set ourselves to the task of making certain that economic democracy is regained.

Make certain of this: Political liberty cannot long endure without economic freedom, and the establishment of new standards for the preservation of economic freedom in a world which science has remade is the greatest need of our times.

Graves of United States War Dead in France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY LORENZO MARTIN

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, there has been a misunderstanding throughout the country about the French Government charging us rent for the graves of our soldiers buried in the soil of France. It has been stated over the radio, I think, by Father Coughlin, and in certain publications that that was true.

Representative COCHRAN, of Missouri, wrote to General Pershing, who is the Chairman of the American Battle Monuments Commission, and General Pershing has given his reply to the effect that there is no truth in this statement.

Mr. Lorenzo Martin, the Louisville Times Washington correspondent, has prepared an able and comprehensive article dealing with this subject. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAVES OF UNITED STATES WAR DEAD IN FRANCE EXEMPT FROM RENT

(By Lorenzo Martin)

Statements that the French Government requires payment of rental or concession fees for ground where American soldiers are buried in that country have been branded as false by Gen. John J. Pershing, who commanded the American Expeditionary Forces during the World War, and who is now Chairman of the American Battle Monuments Commission.

Investigation by The Times Washington Bureau of the origin of the recent circulation of such statements, which have caused concern to the French Embassy in Washington and aroused suspicion in some quarters of Nazi propaganda, indicates the source as a misleading press statement issued by the American Legion during its annual convention last month in Chicago. The misleading statement contained in this American Legion press release is reported later to have been reiterated in substance in a radio broadcast by Father Charles F. Coughlin.

Representative JOHN J. COCHRAN, of Missouri, brought the matter to the attention of Congress in an extension of remarks published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. "In these critical days," said Mr. COCHRAN, "when appeals are being made to arouse our citizens on the question of neutrality, many statements are made not based upon facts.

"In a recent address a very well-known clergyman, who uses the radio weekly, made the statement that France charged our Government rent for the ground where American soldiers are buried in that country. I knew the distinguished clergyman was in error, but to make sure I was correct, I wrote a letter to Gen. John J. Pershing, Chairman of the American Battle Monuments Commission."

Mr. COCHRAN then quotes the reply he received from General Pershing. It reads:

"In reply to your inquiry of October 4, I wish to state that the United States Government does not pay rent on the graves of our American dead who are buried in France. In fact, the French Government has exempted us from the payment of taxes or duties of any kind whatsoever on the land on which our cemeteries and memorials are located and on the materials which we have sent to France for these establishments."

The American Legion press statement which appears to have started the circulation of such reports as that mentioned by Representative COCHRAN called attention to the fact that the Overseas Graves Decoration Trust grew to $200,000 during 1939 and, in part, said:

"Under French law a concession fee becomes due on every grave every 15 years. When the first time limit expired following the World War it developed that the bodies of many American soldiers, sailors, and marines faced the possibility of being exhumed and burned in lime pits unless the grave concession fees were paid."

Inquiry by the Times at the War Department, before General Pershing's letter to Representative COCHRAN was made public brought the following information from the Army General Staff:

An agreement between the French and United States Governments, signed July 27, 1922, slightly more than 5 years after the United States entered the World War, made provision for donation by the French Government of grounds for establishment of American military cemeteries there for the burial of American war dead.

Article 2 of this agreement reads:

"The French Government hereby grants to the Government of the United States the free and perpetual use of the grounds so acquired."

Article 3 of the same agreement reads:

"Should the Government of the United States evacuate these cemeteries in whole or in part, the grounds thus evacuated shall be sold by the French Government and the net proceeds of such sales be paid by the French Government to the Government of the United States."

Under the terms of this agreement there are six permanent American military cemeteries in France, and under similar agreements there are two others, located, respectively, in Belgium and England.

The land on which the American military cemeteries in France are located was acquired under a special grant by which the French Government gave to the United States the right to use this land in perpetuity, without payment of taxes or duties of any kind, as a burial place exclusively for members of the armed forces of the United States who lost their lives during the World War. Interment in French civilian cemeteries, of course, is subject to general French law. Tnis provides that a permanent plot called a "concession à perpétuité" may be purchased or that a plot may be rented for a limited number of years with a right to renew.

An indication that it is in reference to American soldiers who remained in France and died after the war that the Overseas Graves Decoration Trust chiefly operates is given in a court authorization obtained by the American Legion in Indianapolis in 1937.

The complete text of the American Legion press statement concerning the Overseas Graves Decoration Trust, issued during the Chicago convention, also tends to substantiate this explanation of the matter. It points out, for example, that only 10 American World War dead were disinterred and reburied with the use of the funds of this trust during 1939.

Several years ago the American Legion, aided by the French authorities and American consular officers, made a thorough census of the graves in French civilian cemeteries of former American soldiers and a considerable number were located. The American Legion then started a project for a Legion plot in the new Neuilly Cemetery, which was chosen as it is in the immediate suburbs of Paris and a considerable number of American ex-soldiers already were buried there. It also is the place of burial for persons who die at the American Hospital of Paris, which is located in Neuilly.

Some burials have already been made, and ex-soldiers, sailors, or marines who served during the World War are eligible for burial in this plot, regardless of whether or not they held membership in the American Legion. Working in cooperation with its Paris post, the American Legion has been engaged in the concentration in its vaults in the Neuilly Cemetery of the bodies of American ex-service men buried in French civilian cemeteries, and it is in this connection that considerable expenditures from the Legion's Overseas Graves Decoration Trust have been made.

"Of the 81,067 American soldiers, sailors, and marines who gave their lives in Europe and European waters during the World War, the number who still remain 'unknown' is 4,431," says an official statement of the American Battle Monuments Commission. "This number includes 1,643 who are buried in unidentified graves in the permanent American military cemeteries in Europe; 1,537 whose grave is the sea; 1,250 whose remains have never been found, and the Unknown Soldier who is buried at the Arlington National Cemetery.

"At the time of the armistice there were approximately 2,400 places in Europe in which American dead were temporarily buried. After hostilities ceased, provision was made for the permanent burial of these bodies in accordance with the expressed wishes of the nearest relatives concerned, and the eight permanent American cemeteries in Europe were established. These cemeteries, with their 30,902 burials, now contain the graves of all members of the American forces whose bodies remain in Europe except as follows: Forty-two men whose bodies were left in their original graves outside the cemeteries at the request of relatives; 18 who are buried beneath the Lafayette Escadrille Monument at Garches, near Paris, where 21 of their former comrades of the Escadrille also are buried; those whose bodies were released to relatives for private interment, and those whose remains have not been found."

At the request of nearest of kin, approximately 46,000 of the American World War dead overseas were returned to this country for final interment.

There are now buried in permanent American military cemeteries abroad 30,902 American World War veterans, of which 368 are in the Flanders Field Cemetery in Belgium and 468 in the Brookwood Cemetery in England, while 30,066 are buried in the 6 such cemeteries in France, as follows: Fourteen thousand two hundred and forty in the Meuse-Argonne; 6,012 in the Oise-Aisne; 4,157 in the St. Mihiel; 2,288 in the Aisne-Marne; 1,833 in the Somme, and 1,541 in the Suresnes.

"The work of removing bodies to their final graves from the 2,400 American burial places which existed at the time of the armistice," says an official publication of the Battle Monuments Commission,

"began shortly thereafter and was completed in 1922. These removals were made in such a way that the relative sizes of the battlefield cemeteries now give a good idea of the comparative importance of each of the principal American operations with respect to the others."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM PITTSBURGH PRESS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Pittsburgh Press (Scripps-Howard) of Sunday, October 22, 1939. I am sure the majority of my colleagues on the other side will enjoy reading this editorial when they notice the title: "James Runs for President at Public Expense."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of October 22, 1939]

JAMES RUNS FOR PRESIDENT AT PUBLIC EXPENSE

The advertisements which the James administration is running in national periodicals, at a cost of nearly $11,000 per month to the taxpayers, border on outright dishonesty.

Not only do they contain half-truths and un-truths, but the nature of them is obviously political—intended to boost the national reputation of Gov. Arthur H. James.

If you do not believe this, we ask you to turn to page 87 of the current Saturday Evening Post and see for yourself, and then to send for the booklet described in the advertisement and also to examine it.

This administration, which has so bitterly attacked the honesty of the previous Democratic regime, is using taxpayer's money in a method which we charge is immoral and unfair.

We call your attention to a story on page 1 of today's Press by Robert Taylor, our Harrisburg correspondent, which analyzes the claims made in the latest James advertising and compares them with the actual facts.

Everybody knows that Governor James is running—or thinks he is running—for the Presidency. He even has a Presidential campaign manager, Col. Carl L. Estes, a Texas newspaper owner and oil man, who moved to Harrisburg to direct his Presidential boomlet.

And now it develops that the Governor also has a Presidential publicity bureau, operating under the name of the newly created department of commerce, which has a $113,700 advertising fund for the type of material now appearing and another $227,700 for advertising designed to attract tourists. So, in addition to the copy now appearing, you may soon expect to see some tourist advertising containing the Governor's picture and telling how he has improved the beauty of Pennsylvania.

Four hundred thousand dollars was taken from the State motor funds—formerly used exclusively to build and maintain highways—to finance the new department which has been turned into a James publicity bureau.

The claims contained in the current advertisement are amazing. Among them is a contention that State pay rolls have been cut 17 percent and administrative expense has been cut 20 percent.

There's just one answer to such extravagant claims: If true, then why did the James administration reenact every one of the $163,000,000 of emergency taxation imposed by the Earle administration, and which the Governor attacked during his campaign as driving business from the State? Why, if true, is Pennsylvania now faced with a special legislative session to raise through new taxation an additional $150,000,000 in relief funds not provided for at the regular session?

The advertisement declares that 175,000 persons were taken off relief rolls from January 7 to June 3—but the records of the department of public assistance shows 704,999 on State relief January 7 and 717,835 on State relief June 3—an actual increase.

The Pennsylvania booklet recently prepared by the Department of Commerce starts off with a full-page picture and message of Governor James, and then proceeds to tell of great industrial developments during his administration, among which are construction of the Carnegie-Illinois Co.'s Irvin works and the new J. & L. strip mill and the electrification of the Pennsylvania Railroad—all of which took place under the Earle administration, but for which neither that nor any other administration was entitled to any credit.

Such things as this, we contend, are false and misleading; and the expenditure of State funds to boost the personal stock of the Governor is a gross misuse of public money.

Dedication of Calvin Coolidge Bridge

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS, OCTOBER 12, 1939

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by my colleague the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] delivered on the occasion of the dedication of the Calvin Coolidge Bridge at Northampton, Mass., on Columbus Day, October 12, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The name of Calvin Coolidge cannot be emblazoned too often or in too many places throughout the length and breadth of this Republic. It stands for and represents all that is best in good citizenship and for all that is outstanding among the attributes that make for an honorable public official.

Particularly fitting it is that here in his home city of Northampton we should dedicate a bridge to his memory—the solid material and strength of which so well typifies the strong and incorruptible character of the man. Even more appropriate, it seems to me, is the erection of this beautiful arch across the Connecticut River. While Calvin Coolidge spent most of the years of his life as a resident, honored citizen, and faithful public official of the city of Northampton, he belonged in a very special way to New England. He typified those fine qualities that men everywhere associate with the New England stock from which he sprung—industry, thrift, caution, prudence, a profound conception of the dignity of citizenship, and a rigid compliance with the trusteeship of public office.

Most appropriately, I repeat, do we emblazon the name of Calvin Coolidge across the Connecticut River. This beautiful stream in the very heart of New England, sweeping down from the mountaintops, its waters on the way to the sea kissing the shores of four of the New England States, winding its course through rocky hills, fertile valleys, and wooded fields, reflects a real picture of New England. On its banks were unfolded the life of those sturdy pioneers of New England early days, the men and women who converted its rocky pastures into cultivated fields. Here along its banks were harnessed the rushing waters that provided the necessary power for the establishment of New England's early industries. Here in the distance from this bridge can be seen the smokestacks belching out huge clouds of smoke, indicating the presence of the many industries wherein men and women toil in the present-day struggle to earn a livelihood for themselves and their children under the mass-production methods of our day. Small villages, large cities, the homes of the poor, the mansions of the rich, the struggles of the farmer, the problems of the toiler, all the problems that represent American life are here. Calvin Coolidge embraced and knew them all in his long years of service and sacrifice for his fellowmen. This majestic river over which this bridge has been built will embrace for generations all the hopes and all the aspirations of the free people of New England, and we must seek as he did to solve them rightly in our day.

Almost the entire life of Calvin Coolidge was given to the public service. He moved in a steady course from the simplest and humblest position in the service of his fellow men to the highest in State and Nation. A public career that is a striking example of the equality of opportunity that Americans consider one of our priceless heritages under our free institutions. I like to think of Calvin Coolidge, and I am sure that people of America like to think of him not only as a great American and executive but as a man whose sterling character elevated any office which he held to exceptional heights of dignity and respect. As President he is to be particularly praised for his instincts of sound finance and economy, which marked his whole career from beginning to end and which were bred deep in his New England character. He was transparently honest, genuinely cautious, courageous, but not blatantly so; modest, laconic, the antithesis of demagoguery. All of these fine traits in the performance of his official trust won for him the respect of all who knew him.

No man of our time has made a more marked impression on his fellow men, largely due to his simple tastes, his unpretentiousness, personal modesty, and his personal probity. His name will be a gospel and inspiration to future generations. This bridge dedicated to his memory will help not only to perpetuate his memory but will be an incentive and inspiration to all who pass here to emulate his fine qualities that we have inherited from his sterling career. May the spirit of Calvin Coolidge guide and direct us to preserve his ideals, to live his fine public virtues, and to bequeath to posterity a record as glorious as his.

Subversive Activities in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

STATEMENT BY REV. REMBERT GILMAN SMITH

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I think the Dies committee of the House is doing a good job. I am for it. I am glad they are turning the light on subversive activities in this country. They have my full support in that effort. I hope they will continue to tear the mask from all the Communists and Fascist organizations in this country. Furthermore, I hope they can bring to light and have discharged such Government employees, if any, who support un-American activities.

In that connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement from the Reverend Rembert Gilman Smith, representing the Oklahoma League Against Communism, Nazi-ism, and Fascism.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPEAL THE EMBARGO!

(By Rev. Rembert Gilman Smith, Tulsa, Okla.)

The Congress should at once repeal the embargo against the sale of war materials to warring nations of the earth, and we should sell all we can make to nations that have the money with which to buy them and ships in which to carry them from our ports.

To do this would not be a violation of neutrality as a principle, to which our Government is now committed. Though the repeal of the embargo would likely help Great Britain and France, such repeal would not be a violation of the neutrality of our Government, which cannot justly be blamed for the naval inferiority of Germany and Russia, and their greater distance from our ports. It is neutral to sell to none, and equally so to sell to all.

The manufacture and sale of war materials would improve our financial condition. Millions now idle would be put to work, and dividends would increase. We have done all in our power to prevent the outbreak of war, but in vain. It is likely that the European war will last for years, and our business may well adjust itself to this reality.

The repeal of the embargo may be of decided aid to Great Britain and France. Their ability to get war materials in this country might even be the factor which would make their victory possible. Our Government is neutral, but our citizens are not, and, as President Roosevelt (with more wisdom than President Wilson showed in 1914, when he asked for neutrality in thought) admitted that such neutrality is impossible. There are citizens who wish the victory of Germany and of Russia, but they are very few in number. Most of our people are in favor of Great Britain and France.

The success in arms of Great Britain and of France would safeguard our peace, but that of Germany and Russia would endanger it. Nazi-ism and communism are avowed and active enemies of our traditional political doctrine. By propaganda and by organization, planted within our country, they have been and are seeking to sabotage and to destroy our freedom. In this diabolical work they have secured the aid of certain deluded or corrupted citizens, some in places of prominence in church, state, education, and business. They are the descendants of Simple Simon or of Benedict Arnold. It is high time to purge the influence of these traitors to American representative democracy. Those who were born in Germany, or in Russia, ought to go back, carrying with them every acquired American comrade. Russia and Germany have not declared war on the United States pro forma, but communism and nazi-ism are waging a shrewd and sinister war on our principles and institutions.

European dictators not only strive to destroy representative democracy, they lust with insatiable appetites over our vast wealth. Hitler stole $400,000,000 from the Jews, and $58,000,000 out of the banks of Prague; Stalin plans and plots to take property away from persons and corporations that now own it in all capitalistic nations, and to put it in the possession of a small number of commissars who will rule with ruthless cruelty. No other nation equals Russia in the matter of the highly concentrated control of wealth. They mockingly call this communism, and some fools even call it democracy.

Servants of Hitler and Stalin are working with shrewdness and zeal in the United States. They are supposed to be deadly enemies, but they will likely become allies here, at the psychological moment, as in Europe.

The embargo should be repealed so that Great Britain and France can get war materials here. In contrast with Russia and Germany, they are not invading this country with propaganda and spies; they are not disturbing and destroying the loyalty of our weak-minded or money-loving citizens. There are no organizations which display at the same time the Stars and Stripes and the flags of Great Britain and France; there are organizations which float the swastika and the hammer and sickle above the Stars and Stripes.

If Great Britain and France win the war, our peace and safety will be confirmed; if Germany and Russia win it, our peace will crash. The opinion that our first line of defense is not in France is correct whether or not we send a single soldier to Europe. Communism and nazi-ism have programs for the penetration of the United States by propaganda, by spies, and by organization, and they are being carried out. These programs would be continued if Stalin and Hitler were to die today. The bibles of these two systems are the Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engels, German Socialists, and Mein Kampf, by the furious Fuehrer himself.

Hitler and Stalin are endangering civilization as it has not been endangered since Charles Martel won the Battle of Tours. They have won at Warsaw; if they win at the Maginot line, in the North Sea, at Paris, and at London, a new dark age will begin.

We should immediately proceed to the large-scale production of war materials, selling all we can spare to other nations. By doing so, we will be getting ready for war, if it comes, and it likely will. The war spirit inflames the nations, the weapons of war are multiplied with the setting of the sun. Our vast actual and potential wealth is coveted by other nations; we hold a political doctrine which the dictators detest and are determined to destroy.

Our Army and Navy should be increased; our agricultural, mineral, and industrial resources should be converged on the making of war materials, some of which we should sell, and much of which we should save for our own use. The planet Mars is in the ascendant now. We must "sell our cloaks and buy swords."

Propaganda, Peace, Preparedness

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me on last Labor Day at Holyoke, Mass., and also delivered over the National Broadcasting Forum, on the question of propaganda, peace, and preparedness.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For months past I have repeatedly urged the absolute necessity for the United States to maintain a policy of complete detachment from the diplomatic intrigues and military alliances which have recently harassed practically every part of the Old World. I have alluded to our experience in the World War, wherein we sent men and treasure to the battlefields of Europe in the idealistic belief, then loudly proclaimed, that our intervention would establish a new world order based on justice and democracy. It is now obvious that instead of promoting peace the treaty written after that war laid the groundwork for constant discord and the present war. In the many years I have been a Member of the United States Senate, I have never heard a Senator or other public man defend its basic justice.

We were asked by the terms of that treaty to join in preserving, in the language of the Covenant proposed, "the territorial integrity and political independence" of virtually the entire world.

The framers of that treaty miscalculated the facts; they failed to realize the impossibility of suppressing for all time the aspirations and deep-seated instincts of intrinsically proud and ambitious peoples, however debatable their concept of justice.

Whether this analysis of the situation is all inclusive or not, it is an incontrovertible fact that our people long ago positively determined not to become embroiled in the bitter strife proceeding constantly from territorial disputes resulting from the Versailles Treaty.

As human beings and Americans, we are imbued with deepest sympathy for the masses of people now confronted by the horrors of war. We can well understand the sentiments they harbor over the terrifying prospects of the present internecine strife in Europe. How tragic and how helpless is their plight, facing with fear and trembling, hostilities that will destroy their homes, lay waste their lands, visit innocent noncombatant populations with poverty, death, and with slaughter of their youth. The man or woman would be indeed unfeeling who is not profoundly moved by the inhuman situation in Europe.

We are prepared, I am sure, to use every means at our disposal short of involving our own Nation to bring about amicable settlements of the questions responsible for this grave situation. In fact, the country has generally approved of the overtures already made to certain foreign powers by President Roosevelt in the interest of peace and his efforts to safeguard innocent women and children.

Let me speak plainly to you, my fellow countrymen. The noninvolvement of the United States in the war now raging in Europe is almost entirely within the control of your Federal officials, the President, the State Department, and the Congress. They are the sole agencies that can involve this country in this war. We must cooperate with them wholeheartedly as long as their attitude is one of strict neutrality.

We must, however, be on guard to bring the full force of public opinion against any position of an unneutral character that the executive and legislative branches of our Government takes. I repeat, whether we shall continue to enjoy peace and keep American youths out of this slaughter depends upon the capacity of your public officials to act regardless of their sympathies. Is this impossible? Many believe we cannot avoid being drawn in, because of our strong and largely one-sided sympathies. It is expressed in the phrase "We cannot keep out."

It is difficult to be master over one's sympathies when they are intense, as they are likely to be and especially when one's sympathies are exhilarated by propaganda and stories of atrocities. When we read these stories let us remember that war is a bestial game and let us become more determined than ever to keep our sons out of war.

Our present position is obvious. It is clearly mandated by the will of practically all of our citizens.

Certain events are transpiring in our country today which render it increasingly difficult for us to retain this much desired strict neutrality. I refer to the very intensive propaganda campaigns that will be staged. This is not new for America, nor surprising. It has happened before. It occurred before the World War. It has continued in relation to the questions of the foreign debts, the World Court, and other European power-diplomacy objectives.

Between 1914 and 1917 this campaign to embroil us in war reached its zenith. Recall, for they will now be repeated, the atrocity stories, terrifying in every detail, since proved in large measure to be without authentic foundation. Remember the great moral issue that was drawn at that time between democracy and autocracy. Recall the appeals to our self-interest: "If you do not fight this enemy of democracy on European soil, you will have to fight it in America." Remember the flood of trained lecturers, even ministers of the Gospel, who overran the country delivering these very same arguments.

Recall also the prophecies of disaster to trade and loss of commercial loans if we did not fight side by side with the Allies.

The results that followed are well known. Over 50,000 American youth were killed in France, hundreds of thousands more wounded, permanently maimed, disabled, or bereft of reason. Billions of dollars spent in the struggle. Billions more loaned to our Allies—never repaid—but constituting in the resentment aroused by our efforts to collect them, living proof of the old Shakespearean adage: "A loan oft loses both itself and friend."

Today history is repeating itself. Instead of being saved for posterity—the asserted objective of the World War—democracy has been crushed and destroyed in many great nations.

Do you believe the propagandists will not again feverishly start to work as they did in the World War years, disseminating the same fallacies calculated to lead us into another world holocaust?

Let me allude to some of the principal fallacies. They will have a familiar ring. Perhaps you have unconsciously been impressed by some of these specious arguments which have already flooded the country.

First and foremost, now that war rages in Europe, the United States will not be able to keep out of it. This argument rests on the false premise that we are bound to take sides with the so-called democracies. Otherwise two harrowing consequences will ensue: Democracy will be destroyed in the world and we will be the next marked for extinction; our trade, commerce, and financial relationships would be decimated by the victorious, ruthless dictators. Such assertions assume that if we do not fight in Europe we will be forced to fight here. The answer to this fallacy is plain. If we must fight in self-defense, by all means, let us be prepared to make a fight that will insure a smashing defeat of our aggressors. Let us build an army, navy, and air force not only adequate for our self-protection, but that will command the respect and forbearance of the world. Let us spend billions for self-defense but not one penny to send American boys to death on foreign soil.

Secondly, the claim will be made by these propagandists and supported by some of our own high-minded citizens, who have sympathy, based on blood ties or imagined identity of interests with the alleged democracies to preserve order in the world. While I am on the subject of the natural sympathy which some of our citizens have for their kinfolk in foreign countries who are liable to be victims of aggression should war start, let me make this observation. We are all prone to our sympathies for one side or another in a conflict. That has been true in the past and contributed to our attitude and final action in the last war. But the basic issue is clear; it is, Are those who bespeak sympathy and favor intervention—I note most of them are beyond the war age—prepared to send their sons, husbands, and fathers into war in these foreign lands to mayhem and death?

I have my sympathies and you have yours, but I conceive that during my 25 years of public life I have never had a more serious or solemn obligation to my countrymen than that which confronts me now—the solemn duty and grave responsibility of keeping America from participating in the present European war.

According to this view, we are, as they would have us believe, under an almost divinely imposed obligation to enter into selected foreign disputes and be prepared to fight, if necessary, to settle them. This contention, it may be, is theoretically idealistic and commendable in purpose, but it fails to acknowledge the incontrovertible fact that where a nation interferes in international complications it must expect inevitably to suffer the consequences of involvement in war.

Thirdly, other propagandists argue that Germany and Russia are godless nations and hate religion. Both are alleged to be intent upon destroying organized religion as we know it in the Christian world.

I hold no brief for any government or any people apart from the American Government and the American people. I am a sincere believer, as most Americans are, in the American system of individual liberty, free enterprise, and constitutional rights of freedom of religious worship.

Foreign philosophies which deny basic rights to the people are in principle and method equally unsatisfactory to me, whether they be totalitarian Soviet states, which suppress belief in God and deny the rights of private property, or the totalitarian Nazi state, which discriminates against class or creed.

While most regrettable, these un-American theories are immaterial so far as our diplomatic and business relations are concerned. Any other view is unmindful of our history wherein we have from the very beginning striven to maintain friendly relations with all foreign peoples irrespective of their religion or political philosophies. As Americans, desiring to live in peace with the world, we must be tolerant of the beliefs and views of others, however contrary to our ideals; and acknowledge their right to establish systems of government of their own choosing. It is indeed unfortunate if anywhere people are enslaved. However, we cannot jeopardize our own self-interest to free them unless we desire to wage continuous warfare in all parts of the world where inalienable rights are denied.

Apart from our sympathies, we should play no official favorites. Above all, we must fix our minds upon the one objective most to be desired by our people—peace. Let us resolve never on any pretext or at any behest, however appealing and subtle, to be drawn into another vortex similar to that of 1917.

If we must fight for democracy, for liberty, for justice, for home and fireside and family, for the priceless possessions of American citizenship, let it be on American soil when we are attacked, our lands invaded, or when enemies make warlike movements toward contiguous territory of the American Continent which would directly endanger our security.

There will be other varieties of propaganda, designed to cloud the issues and confuse our people. These were and will be employed in the campaign for a new neutrality law by authorizing what is now denied by the law of the land, namely, permitting our citizens to trade with belligerents in munitions and supplies of war. This proposed law would put us in the same position we occupied in the years 1914 to 1917. We would furnish arms and munitions to one side and retain them from the other. It is asserted that in continuing in effect the present neutrality law which we enacted for our peace, when no war threatened the world and which prohibits all traffic in arms and munitions of war, that we are in fact stripping England and France of the advantage they would enjoy if permitted to obtain war weapons from us because their powerful navies could restrain other nations. This may be true. By prohibiting trading in arms and munitions which would enrich us and then plunge us in war, we may be withholding the advantage which superior sea power has given the Allies. But we are remembering what is to our own advantage—namely, keeping out of war.

I repeat, we must think not in terms of advantage to other nations but advantage to our own people, and particularly to those who would be the sacrificial victims of any war which would follow by furnishing arms and munitions to one set of European belligerents and withholding them from another.

Until a few days ago, other advocates of our participation in European affairs urged that we do "everything short of going to war" to dissuade the Central Powers from aggressive action. With strange inconsistency, it seems to me, our State Department recommends that our ships be barred from war zones, loans to both sides forbidden, our citizens prohibited from travel in war areas—indeed, every effort save one would be strained to effectuate an appearance of neutrality. Militantly, however, they demand in the name of neutrality one reservation; that one thing is the most dangerous, the most certain to result in trouble, namely, furnishing arms, munitions, and materials of war to the belligerents of one side. If it is real neutrality to bar our ships, forbid loans and citizens from war zones, in simple logic and plain common sense, what more effective and practical neutrality could we pursue than to refrain from trading with any of the belligerents. Furnishing one side with the deadly weapons of war is the most definite sort of favoritism, the rankest unneutrality.

To my mind, it is unthinkable that we can escape involvement in the European war, and at the same time advocate intervention.

It is real intervention to threaten before or during a war to sell death-dealing instruments to one of the belligerents.

The United States, more than any other country in the world, is free from the possibilities of starvation, invasion, and economic domination. There may be some justification for countries taking sides in a war between two rival groups of foreign powers, who fear these perils, but we have no such excuse. Furthermore, it seems to me, it is ridiculous to say that anything like a real invasion of this country can be made unless all other nations of the world should combine against us.

It is certain, if anything is certain, that a world bristling with national enmities a world divided into warlike groups, can be no menace to us while we remain definitely neutral. We ought to do this for no other reason than that, if all the rest of the world crumbles, we shall preserve for humanity a haven of safety, containing all the elements on which we may continue to build a prosperous democracy.

Present events in the world have not emerged overnight nor over nothing. They have been developing slowly over a period of years as a result of the injustices which some nations felt, and still feel, rightly or wrongly, were perpetrated by the Treaty of Versailles.

Regardless of our sympathies these quarrels are not our quarrels. They result from and belong to long-existing European intrigue. Let European intrigue settle them. We have more urgent and compelling problems requiring our full time, attention, energy, and ingenuity right here in America.

We are a peaceful people. The plain people of America ardently desire the opportunity under the protection and guidance of their own benevolent Government to find some secure basis for the employment of their abilities, their talents, their labors—to live like normal Americans of generations past, to work, to marry, to raise their children in prosperity and peace. This is their modest appeal to their public officials. We must not fail them.

They will resent the efforts of our people who would disturb the peaceful course of this Nation and attempt to make them victims of death and destruction on the blood-drenched soil of Europe. They will be deeply aroused at foreign propaganda whether conducted by paid professionals, English, French, German, Italian, Russian, or other kind, or whether emanating from misguided individuals or groups sympathetic to one side or the other.

They insistently proclaim that the United States must keep out of war. They are already enraged by the misrepresentations of those who would involve us on pretext of saving alleged democracies in Europe. They are not so ignorant of history as not to realize that nations in the past kept themselves free from European wars and troubles. Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Switzerland, Spain, Norway, and others found no difficulty in remaining out of these disputes, and they and other nations are finding no difficulty now in resisting efforts to embroil them. To be sure, these nations are small, but apparently to some Americans the bigness and wealth of some nations stultify the moral courage to be neutral.

A preponderant and overwhelming mass of our citizens demands the United States follow this wise example of noninvolvement pursued by these smaller nations, even in the face of geographical proximity, as contrasted with the vast ocean that separates us from Europe.

America should be ready for any eventuality, however remote, which threatens the security of our ideals and institutions in the future; be prepared to meet any enemy or any combinations of enemies which may seek to undermine or overthrow our American Government. When the time comes to fight—and it well may, even before we expect it—whether it be fascism, nazi-ism, communism, or any other "ism" or power, in defense of American soil, American principles, and aspirations of freedom, equality, and justice, let us be equipped to annihilate such aggressors. Till that day comes, while making ready for any challenge to our rights, let us be tolerant of others, neutral in word and deed, repel all smooth talk or propaganda hostile to our safety, and continue ceaselessly to work to avert war and preserve peace.

I conclude and repeat by paraphrasing the words of an immortal American—billions for defense of our own country and its institutions, but not one penny to send American boys to slaughter and death on foreign soil.

Address of Commander in Chief of the Military Order of the World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY COL. E. M. WENTWORTH

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I have the honor of inserting the very splendid and able address of Col. E. M. Wentworth, commander in chief of the Military Order of the World War, which was delivered at the national convention of that order held in the city of Roanoke, Va., October 18–21, inclusive. The address is a report of the commander in chief, and the convention was a notable occasion. In attendance, among other distinguished members of the Service, were Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army; Maj. Gen. James K. Parsons, commander, Third Corps Area; and Rear Admiral Reginald R. Belknap.

The address is as follows:

The Military Order of the World War has just completed a most successful season. Our membership has grown, our finances have improved, and our influence has broadened. Our counsel has been sought in many fields during the past year and our activities, especially in the field of meeting foreign propaganda, have been numerous. From a geographical standpoint the name of our order has appeared in the newspapers more frequently than ever before.

Despite the fact that I should like to claim a measure of credit for this situation, I feel in all honesty that it has been due to the work of other officers of the order, and as commander in chief I merely happen to be the fortunate beneficiary of their efforts. In fact, I am much like the embarrassed man whom the magician calls out on the entertainment floor in order to remove from his vest pocket the watch or jewelry of some nearby friends. Such a man seems guilty because the magician found the valuables on him. Similarly I cannot explain why the order has done so well this year, but its success is nevertheless an accomplished fact.

May I express my extreme appreciation to Commander Mills for his fine work on chapter activities; to Colonel Allen for his vigorous efforts toward increased memberships, while traveling from coast to coast; and to our corps area commanders—especially in the third, fourth, and sixth corps—for their active prosecution of membership campaigns, and their inspiring stimulation of chapter activities. May I refer especially to the remarkable efforts of Capt. Ben Hogue who not only helped create our new chapter of the past year, but whose driving stimulus has put more chapters above their membership quota than in any other corps area. Of his 11 chapters, 9 finished above 100 percent, and 5 of them were included in the first 11 in percentage of membership quota standing for the entire order.

One can never express adequately our appreciation of Major Sanders' service in connection with Army Day, Chaplain McCallum's efforts in connection with the massing of the colors service, and the development of a flexible form for chapter meetings, or of George Ijams, Jr., building up of hereditary memberships. All will receive further recognition as the convention proceeds. Finally, everything that can be said of the endeavors and accomplishments of our adjutant general, Major Bettelheim, is far too little. Alert, on the trigger every moment, promoting our contacts in important offices of government and industry, he serves our order more faithfully and effectively with each year.

VALUE OF MEMBERSHIP

As we close our fiscal season we can be more certain than ever of the value of membership in our order and the work and prestige of its personnel. I have met with the members of our chapters this past year in as widely separated points as Boston and Los Angeles, Detroit and Dallas, San Francisco and St. Louis, Washington and Wichita, and Milwaukee and Chicago. In every place I have found men with that character of leadership and that unselfishness of ideal which we demand and cultivate.

This trait of our membership is one that we must not lose. Our influence can never be based on mass or numbers, although the physical strength of our order must always depend on adequate financing and a distribution of chapters that can influence opinions in all sections of the country. But we can never attain political importance by a massing of members' votes. There were not enough officers in our entire World War forces, from which our membership could be drawn, to give us national influence of a numerical nature. If we are to contribute to national defense and national welfare we must do so because our ideas are worth while, because our service is unselfish, and because we would more willingly give than receive.

Probably this last concept is outmoded, and I may appear naive in mentioning it, but fortunately such a fashion is fleeting. One thousand or one million workers in the electrical trades might elect mayors, Congressmen, Senators, or Presidents, but their mere numbers would never have invented the telephone of Alexander Graham Bell, the phonograph of Thomas Edison, or the radio of Marconi. These men stand out above the mass because they looked for what they could create, not for what they could receive.

Many times we hear prospective members ask what they can obtain in return for their membership dues. Why should they care what they get? The thing that counts is that they are permitted to give—they have an opportunity to serve in company with unselfish comrades for the future security of our Nation. Lest this opportunity be too easily overlooked, I have asked a committee to make a special report on our objectives to the general staff and to the convention to clarify and dramatize them so that they may appeal to that tiny remnant of the sense of chivalry possessed by every man—the sense that made possible the Crusades or that led to the quest of the Holy Grail. It is fashionable to sneer at the tradition of knighthood, but in abandoning its frailties the moderns have abandoned its romance and strength.

The Military Order of the World War assembles, and seeks the comradeship of, those men who find only the highest associations belonging in human relations and who believe unlimitedly in the traditional ideals of the Republic. We are not blind worshipers of tradition—we have proved, by our military service, our willingness to defend all of those intangible qualities that give character to our Nation, and from our vantage point of practical experience, we continually urge the necessity for that national security that can alone guarantee their survival.

May I call your attention to our program subjects and committee objectives? Not a single report asks anything from outside sources for our order or its members. We are truly trying to obtain those measures of national security which our judgment and experience tell us are necessary. Each action of this convention is directed toward that objective, toward the dissemination of accurate information on which the public may base a judgment, or toward the strengthening of our order so that the two preceding objectives may be more readily attained.

LIFE MEMBERSHIP

In considering the development of the order, I must urge continued efforts toward life membership. In a sense the latter title is a misnomer, for the membership is truly perpetual. Even though a member dies, the fund that he has established continues to work for the support of our objectives, and in many cases may carry forward the activities of an hereditary member as well. It has been somewhat disappointing this last year that our returns from the life-membership fund have been so small, due entirely to decreased earnings on investments. The custodians of our life-membership funds have rightfully laid chief emphasis on the preservation of the principal, and the reduced business profits of the last few years have naturally been reflected in our returns. This year we received only five-eighths of the income that accrued in 1937, but as the business pendulum reverses its swing, we should see entirely different results. Certainly the stability of the order in the long run will be greatly influenced by the size and the security of our life-membership investments.

SUPERVISION OF THE ORDER'S ACTIVITIES

As your commander in chief, I made one slight change in policy inside the staff without consulting either staff or membership. Supervision of the activities of the order is a great problem, not because of complexity but because of the necessity for effectiveness. In the past it has been customary to make some member of the staff responsible for the activities in a particular corps area, usually as corps area commander. For several years I accepted certain responsibilities in connection with the Sixth Corps Area and the Ninth Corps Area. On becoming commander in chief, it seemed to me that we would have better results if for administrative purposes our senior vice commanders in chief could have direct responsibility for working with the officers in charge of each corps area, and to this end I divided the United States into three regions, asking Commander Mills to keep in touch with the Fourth and Eighth Corps Areas; Colonel Allen to keep in touch with the First, Second, Third, and Fifth Corps Areas; while I continued contact with the Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Corps Areas. The results have been particularly satisfactory, and while I believe no action by the staff or membership is necessary, I do commend to my successor the effectiveness of the idea.

THE PRESENT WAR

Twelve months ago, when your present staff took the oath of office at the New Orleans convention, there was no intimation of the dire situation which involves the world of today. No one could foresee that the two strongly contrasting systems of government—democracy and dictatorship—would have reached that impasse where blood again would have to flow in defense of human freedom. In a literal sense, the privileges of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for which our forefathers struggled, are again cast in Europe's balance, and it is a serious question as to whether they can overweigh the lust for personal power of a few individuals and the flock-minded behavior of their continental followers. Why these people are willing to endure paternalistic tyrannies instead of facing individually, with full freedom, the relatively mild struggle for existence which characterizes the modern world, is not undestandable to the citizens of a democracy, despite the partial evidence of such behavior as we have glimped in our own people during the last decade. America is not insulated against the effect of this struggle, despite her geographic aloofness, and it is quite possible that the symptons of radicalism which we have observed in the United States are sporadic occurrences of the same disease that infests so much of Europe eastward of the Rhine.

AMERICAN RESPONSIBILITY

Many believe that the geographical separation of the United States from Europe gives us such an aloofness of problems that we are really intruding on the family affairs of others if we take sides in the current struggle. They seem to feel rather honestly that we become "nosey neighbors" if we interject our opinions in any way into the situation. They profess to believe that any settlement which would bring about peace would be to our advantage, regardless of which side won or of the relation of their ideas and philosophies to our own. Such a viewpoint is, of course intolerable. Ninety percent of American citizens oppose the dictatorships.

There was a time in human history when we could avoid the contacts with Europe because of our isolation, but fast-moving ocean liners, airplanes, cable, and radio throw our lives in daily contact with the lives of other nationals all over the world. We have the same ethical responsibility to participate in the settlement of the current warfare that the so-called "good" element in any community has to participate in all movements promoting the cause of law and order. I hesitate to make any remark that might be construed as a casting of ephithet, but I do not believe the situation in Europe can be described better than to say that over two hundred millions of her people are in the clutches of "international hoodlums and racketeers" whose methods, except for scale, differ very little from those with which we are familiar in American life. As people who feel a responsibility for future generations, I do not see how we can avoid opinion, and even action, as time goes on.

THE NEUTRALITY ACT

It will be impossible for our convention to avoid discussion and consideration of the questions surrounding the modification of the Neutrality Act. Regardless of the significance or lack of significance of the proposed amendment from a military standpoint, the subject has been on the lips of almost every American citizen. The public has come to believe that changing the Neutrality Act will increase the chances of involving us in the war. Hence a tremendous opposition has developed, varying from pacifists who would submit to any degradation rather than become involved in conflict, through those who are afraid to face the issues of war, to the political opposition which feels that the threat of war would provide the current administration with opportunity for continuance in office without the usual mechanism of election—and extending even to the fear that a dictatorship might develop in the United States. All of these reasons are cogent to one indulging in these beliefs, but it is perhaps well to examine the question somewhat materialistically from a number of viewpoints.

LEGAL ASPECTS

Perhaps the first aspect to be mentioned should be the legal one. I am not a lawyer, but I have talked with students both of international and domestic law and find that there are as many flaws as jewels in the current act. Unquestionably, under international law, we have the right to change our neutrality stand without violating international authority. Our current restrictions are of domestic origin and have domestic power only. If we change the law so that it works somewhat more to the disadvantage of one set of combatants than the other, we may be charged with an unfriendly act, but it would certainly be in the direction of the group defending the position favored by the majority of American citizens. We would not be violating the customs of neutrality of the past so long as we do not overstep them.

Since the Neutrality Act was placed in effect we have dealt in arms and ammunition both in Ethiopia and China, justifying ourselves by the legal fact that war had not been declared in either case. Yet the obvious objections to the munitions trade with those countries applied just the same as they do today. Perhaps there was little likelihood of our being involved in Ethiopia, but there were many occasions when there was danger of our becoming involved with Japan. Fortunately the good sense of both nations tended to prevail.

One wonders if any combatant who is denied access to our markets by enemy action will accept any refined distinctions on our part as to what we consider to be military or unneutral supplies and what we consider passable. It has been suggested that modification of the act would bring about sabotage of munitions factories in this country, with all the concomitant difficulties. Does not the same danger exist to copper mines, sheet-metal plants, and other factories that produce raw or partially prepared materials? In this country companies that manufacture motors for automobiles, trucks, or other transportation can see their motors diverted to army trucks and tanks—in some cases to motorboats or even mine layers and mine sweepers. Are representatives of combatants adversely affected likely to respect these differences? After the current large harvests of grains have been consumed, can we be assured that our grains, flours, and meats are going to be considered innocuous aids to the opponents of a starving nation? The safety in the present act is much overrated, especially when one realizes the possibilities of evasion by operating through other countries not at present engaged in the war.

One also wonders whether combatant nations are likely to accept distinctions between smuggled and legally exported supplies. If the stories that have been floating around about smuggled supplies in the case of the Ethiopian and Spanish civil wars are true, there was enough illegal movement to irritate any nation with its back to the wall. Perhaps changes that will bring such movements to light of day would be preferable to illicit acts.

ETHICAL ASPECTS

It has always been a question of ethics as to whether a nation should profit by the misfortunes or conflicts of others. We have not forgotten the Uncle Shylock epithets of the World War period, nor have we dismissed our awareness of the so-called profiteering problem. No nation is required to solve all the problems of the world, nor is any nation free of them. If countries might criticize change in our Neutrality Act as an attempt to reap blood profits, we must counter with the fact that we have domestically a problem of unbalanced budgets as well as terrific indebtedness, extending to coming generations, that can be as destructive of our future as a war. There is always more misery in the world than the forces of euthenics can alleviate, and the curing of one evil ever accentuates the effect of another evil. Calling names has always been the refuge of the man or nation that cannot meet the logic of any situation. As a nation we shall have to run the risk of being criticized whether we preserve the present act or modify it. Throughout the whole gamut of human relations there is no single action that cannot draw more criticism than praise, regardless of how meritorious it may seem to its proponent.

ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS

On the basis of our experience in the last war, many people believe that a repetition of the economic collapse of that time would completely destroy civilization. The total of world indebtedness has not declined during the past two decades, and a new series of obligations in addition would break the world's back. Such viewers with alarm state that this condition of economic exhaustion is just what is desired by the forces of communism and allied social theories so that they may take over Europe as a whole. There is much to be said in support of this viewpoint, but one wonders just why it is better by our inaction instead to let such agencies overwhelm human freedom by brute conquest. If the forces of democracy in Europe prove unable to prevail, is there any likelihood that American forces of democracy can prevail at a later date? If we do not lend essential help, are we not subscribing unfavorably to an old maxim of war, for we make it possible for the leaders of the "isms" to defeat the advocates of a citizen's liberty in detail separately and at their leisure?

MAKESHIFT SOLUTIONS

There are many who believe that we can preserve our comfort, serenity, and liberty without stirring a finger, merely by keeping out of the conflict in every way. Even if we could preserve our wealth, could withstand the shock of losing our foreign trade, could live in a self-contained economy, and could maintain our system of government, we still could not be isolated, for even though we succeeded in all of these efforts we would be the fatted calf in a world of hungry wolves. Perhaps military exhaustion would prevent their early attack, but we would have to continue our isolation as we still would be unable from an economic and political viewpoint to pay them gold for such raw materials or manufactured goods as they might offer, which we are able to produce ourselves. Our participation in world trade would be necessary for international recovery, and past post-war experience shows that we would have to share our surpluses by low prices, unbalanced trade, or defaulted obligations, in a manner that would cost almost as much as participation in the war.

There are others who believe that we can permit the warring nations to fight toward exhaustion, after which we could intercede in time to dictate the peace. This idea holds great popular favor, because it would permit the building up of our defense forces without their actual commitment to conflict. It partakes greatly of the old wish to have one's cake and eat it, too. It is not impossible to develop such a policy and obtain such a political effect, but if we should use our forces in such a manner would we develop the design and wisdom to approve an effective settlement of Europe's problems? Her economic frontiers are not her racial frontiers and any settlements taking the first set of circumstances into account will violate the second. Our idealism intervened in the peace of Versailles, and we will never know whether we muddied or clarified those troubled waters. I suspect that it will never be revealed whether we were benefactors or culprits, and in either case the net result was small.

But we are no better qualified to adjust Europe's problems today than at that time. If any settlement were possible, someone among Europe's leaders, living on the ground, so to speak, would have advanced an idea that could rally support due to its obviousness or practicality. But such ideas that could appeal to the European multitudes have never been advanced. What chance then has a distant American, dealing only in the abstract, to provide a solution that could settle Europe's problems or create a peace of satisfactory duration?

RECOMMENDATIONS

One point, which is obvious, is that immediate steps must be taken for the equipment of a field army, which shall be fully ready for offensive or defensive duty. This does not insinuate that war action will immediately follow; it is simply one of the diplomatic chips we will need if we participate in any future negotiations. We need many others. The Panama Canal should be impregnable against attack. We should establish more air bases, encourage civil aviation, set up a National Guard in Alaska, restore discipline in the merchant marine, give training to C. C. C. enrollees, and provide some method for taking over jurisdiction of labor disputes so as to avoid delays in essential supplies and equipment for our armed forces. A war crisis is no time to permit either strikes or excessive production costs and profits. We still require a Navy second to none, supreme on both oceans, and we should soon have our Regular Army and National Guard at full peacetime strength, with enough raw materials available to keep a full million men in the field for at least 1 year. Only when we are in such a position can we expect our views to be respected and our opinions heeded.

WAR RESOURCES BOARD

In the face of these requirements I think we can feel quite disturbed over the dissolution of the War Resources Board, created a few weeks ago to help the Army and Navy organize plans for our industrial mobilization. While its mission was purely advisory, and it was announced that its existence was only temporary, it was generally understood that it would be molded into a permanent organization. It contained real leaders of industry and production, rather than theorists, and offered the most practical and experienced support that our military forces could expect. It seems too bad that the political charge, that it made us appear to be heading too fast toward participation in the war, should nullify as practical an action as the establishment of the War Resources Board.

TIME IN WHICH TO PREPARE

People who look on such a move, which is purely of the nature of insurance, as a definite act of aggression, little realize the time that is essential in the preparation of effective military forces. If we had had available, in a fully trained and equipped condition, one-third of the forces we assembled for the World War, we would probably never have been required to call into service the rest of our young men, and we would certainly have had only a fraction of the losses. Morale, bravery, and skill are required, but morale does not exist without skill, and bravery by itself is of small avail. I have often pointed out that it makes little difference on a high railroad trestle which of two men caught there by an oncoming train is brave and which is cowardly—they both meet the same end. In the same way the brave man, without training and equipment, is just as futile in resisting a modern mechanized attack as the craven. Reports say that the individual soldiers of the Polish Army were brave and resourceful, but without adequate equipment. An attacking German Army of less than one-fourth the Polish strength, surrounded and completely destroyed their defense. It is not fair to our men who must bear the brunt of battle, if we deny them equal or superior equipment to that of their enemy.

RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT

No patriotic or veteran society can dictate to the members of our Government just what they should provide in time of emergency, but they certainly can point out what the requirements are and, insofar as they know, what emergencies must be met. The changing situations of the present conflict make some advice worthless shortly after it has been given, but every recommendation I have made is useful, whether we are forced to participate in the war or whether we remain at peace. They are the elements necessary to make our national policy effective, whether that policy be one of war or peace. We cannot support a policy of peace without the means to enforce it, and there is scarcely a point emphasized that was not recognized as a required essential for national strength and defense 20 years ago. It is indeed a commentary on our intelligence and effectiveness as a Nation, that we have approached no nearer to realizing these objectives during the intervening period.

The responsibility for the American future lies with the Government—with the legislative branch as well as with the executive branch. It is no time for candidates for office to hold their ears to the ground listening to every constituent's whisper. There comes a time in every legislator's life when he must act as a representative of the people and not as an interpreter of them—when he must use the judgment and common sense he was supposed to possess when elected, rather than to interpret the whims of his homefolk. Today is one of those times, and the Military Order of the World War urges every member of the Government to take that step which he believes will preserve the Nation and transmit human freedom to the future, rather than to safeguard his own election by cheap demagoguery.

FOREIGN PROPAGANDA

When the Communists upset the Chinese Republic of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, their military advance was screened by a cloud of propagandists that broke the spirit of the people and overcame their resistance. Fragmentary reports suggest a similar technique in the German invasion of Poland. Perhaps the most important enemies we must face are the representatives of types of government which are trying to undermine our own loyalties by propaganda that would destroy our unity. The Dies committee, whose operations we have endorsed and backed, has found unending evidence of communistic propaganda, of Nazi activities, and of British efforts for sympathetic action on our part. Perhaps we can stand up against such a barrage from within our midst, but many would doubt it. We can only be safe when we deny refuge in our own country to the conflicts and disputes of European social and governmental theories.

RESPONSIBILITY TO THE FUTURE

Regardless of whether the United States is or is not involved in the war, she carries an unescapable responsibility to the future, to the terms of the so-called peace which will follow Europe's economic and spiritual exhaustion, and to the civilization which we should bequeath to generations not yet conceived. With such a moral obligation it would seem that everything we can do to facilitate the success of our former Allies would make our participation the less likely. War has always been a human phenomenon, and it is doubtful whether it can ever be eradicated. As long as boys have fist fights, or girls gossip, or families quarrel, the instinct that leads to war will have been preserved. Would we not be wiser to face the issues practically rather than to rely on hair-splitting distinction to save human liberty? It is quite possible that America's decisions and activities today will produce more effect on that distant future than the uninfluenced military success or failure of the European democracy. Let us hope that the Military Order of the World War retains its mental balance and by the soundness of its policies and decisions proves able to affect wisely public opinion and national action.

Hoping for Peace But Promoting War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD W. CREAL

OF KENTUCKY

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, for many long weeks the press, the radio, congressional debates, and the citizens wherever gathered have viewed and reviewed the European war with the chief thought in mind how to keep America out of war. There has been honest difference of opinion as to how to insure this, and this difference of opinion is but natural.

However, the fine part of it all is the almost unanimous opinion that, come or go what will, that we will never enter and never send our boys to foreign soil to render direct aid to the nations we favor.

The repeal or failure to repeal will not affect that. When the neutrality law as a whole is enacted as desired by the President, it has all the safeguards in it to prevent our becoming involved and seeks to correct all the mistakes we made in the World War.

It keeps our people from riding on belligerent ships.

It prevents our merchant vessels from going into danger zones.

It prevents our people from investing money in foreign bonds and then becoming war propagandists to save their money if it appeared the nation was going to lose where their investment was made.

We had none of these safeguards during the World War, and these were the things that caused us to become involved.

The President is very wisely taking every precaution to make it impossible for us to get involved.

I have two sons, fit specimens for military service, and I am a great deal more interested in seeing them kept out than about any other question. To others who have sons I would say that we are in the same class and the requests to keep us out of war finds us in the same mind.

In the first address in my district after being nominated for Congress 4 years ago, I stated emphatically that if our boys went to Europe to fight they would never get there by my vote.

In their fear the people should remember that the question of war has to be voted on in Congress, and as long as I am doing that voting for our district you may be assured that my vote will be for the boys to stay at home.

THE EMBARGO

Now about the embargo provision around which all the talk has been centered and for which the President called a special session of Congress to consider. I am aware that perhaps the question will be voted on before these remarks reach my district, but they will be mailed to many who have not followed a daily paper nor listened to radio.

We are the only country in the world that has a law which provides that our people cannot sell certain articles to any nation, if that nation is at war. All other nations sell anything they have to sell to either side. No nation at war has ever taken offense at this, for it is in accord with international law.

When we speak of repealing the embargo some seem to think that it is breaking an ancient custom or tearing out a part of the Constitution. It was breaking international law 150 years old when we attempted to impose an embargo on our own people by a law 3 years ago. There was no war on then and no great interest taken about it and no one knew how it would work in practice.

The way it works in the present war between Germany on one side and England and France on the other is very largely to the benefit of Germany. Germany has been storing up war materials in preparation for this war for several years. England has been hoping and hoping for peace by arbitration and peaceful settlement.

To allow Germany to buy from us and get ready when other nations had their minds on nobler things, and then become the victim of Germany's war machine is to put a premium on a dictator's robbery, murder, seizure, and enslavement of other people and to put a penalty on peaceful nations for supposing there is such a thing left in the world as mercy, conscience, and right.

Russia and Italy, sympathizers of Germany, can come to America today and load up with war materials and take them home only to pass them on to Germany. On their way back no submarine will attack them. They are not at war. But if England or France, our friendly nations, call at our ports to get some of the same, they find the door closed by reason of their being at war with Germany.

In practical effect it is the same as if we had sat around the council table with Hitler and plotted the murder and destruction of the others. When he got well ready, and at the first boom of the guns, we shut off commerce from the nations he attacked.

Is that neutrality? Those who speak of an ideal neutrality, a neutrality that neither helps nor harms either side, are challenged to point out how any law of any kind could have the same effect on all alike. If we act or fail to act, sell or fail to sell, it affects one side more than another.

Germany can buy from the nations on its east side and the Allies cannot because they cannot get there. If the Allies can buy from us and Germany cannot get here, that is not our making.

If we undertook to supervise distribution of what we sold then we wade into deep water.

BRYAN OPPOSED EMBARGO

The greatest advocate of peace at any price in the last half century was William Jennings Bryan. He was so conscientious that he resigned as Secretary of State in the Wilson Cabinet before he would send certain notes to Germany for fear it would produce war. He later went on Henry Ford's peace ship to Europe, hoping to talk them into stopping the war.

But even he vigorously opposed the suggestion that this Nation pass an embargo and said that such would be a most unneutral act.

The only perfectly neutral act so far as trade relations go is to let nature take its course, to trade with all comers just as if we did not know that any war existed.

That course of action has been accepted as perfect neutrality for centuries. When German propagandists in America say that our following that course now would be unneutral, we ask why they do not complain against some of the other 67 nations of the earth doing the same. Is it for Germany to tell America that we are the only nation on earth which cannot sell what we have like all others do?

During the World War little nations under the sound of the guns in Europe maintained perfect neutrality by continuing trade with all sides. They are doing the same now in this war. It is the only way in which they could preserve their neutrality. It is the only way they preserve it now.

Should we become involved with Japan some day would we expect European countries or Canada to close the door on us or to treat us as if they were offended and shut us out?

It is right to pass laws and to keep our own children in the back yard when there is danger out front, for they are subject to our jurisdiction. But when we pass laws here like an embargo intended for the main purpose of reversing international law and custom for ages, intended to have a direct effect on the people of other nations, affecting their God-given right of self preservation, it is openly becoming an ally of the aggressor. We are aiding in putting on a blockade and squeeze as much as if we had a fleet of our own on the seas stopping other neutrals also from shipping to them.

If it is the fine thing to do and the moral thing to do to see that England and France have no resources for defense, then why not endeavor to get all other nations to follow our example? Why not actually prevent others from trading by use of our strong fleet as policemen. Such would be as neutral as going a mile upstream to change the course of a spring branch so it would not flow by your neighbor's barn lot. Why send iodine, other antiseptics, and tons of medicine to nations at war. It is well known that such saves lives, and soldiers so treated will be back fighting in a month or two. Why not let them die and shorten the war if the other reasoning be sound?

WHERE DRAW THE LINE?

Where are we going to draw the line as to what is war aid? Cotton for explosives, trucks, all kinds of metal, gasoline, coal, timber, shoes, rubber, coats, butter, bread, and meat are as much essentials of war as ammunitions. No nation can wage war without them. The only embargo to be consistent with other arguments would bar trade of every description.

Men in other generations, as well as in this generation, wiser than you or I, have pondered this question on various occasions, and the sum total of the wisdom of the ages is that an embargo is an unneutral act and not an act of neutrality. Let the water flow its natural course and commerce do the same. Do not change the stream or laws of nature and call it neutrality, that is meddling to affect the other fellow's business.

Do not try to pass laws in America which are intended solely for the purpose of affecting the amount to eat, wear, or other use by the people not under our jurisdiction.

We all abhor war and hope for the day when war is no more, but in this hour when neutrality for us is the immediate question let us diligently seek what neutrality is. In being neutral let us not become a partner, a plotter, and a coconspirator with the assassins of the world. There is no distinction between the sins of omission and the sins of commission. In avoiding the supposed sins of commission let us not commit greater ones of omission.

These are my conclusions and my sincere judgment as to the best way to keep out of war and at the same time discharge our duty as a nation to all the world.

EMBARGO WOULD BREED WARS

If an embargo is a good policy, then it should be adopted by every nation on earth. Let us see what would happen then—the 67 nations are of various sizes and of different strength.

Aggressor nations headed by dictators who respect no laws of God or man would buy in peacetime all the war material they could pile up. Peaceful nations with higher ideals and nobler purposes would not be so prepared.

Then the aggressor could move with mathematical certainty to victory, for he would know in advance that his victim could obtain no outside aid. All he would have to do would be to get better prepared before starting and measure his certain success.

When he fired the first gun, like touching an electric button, every nation would instantly cease to sell to his victim; which would, in effect, make all embargo nations allies of the aggressor. It places a premium on brute force and places a penalty on the innocent who are peacefully inclined. Middle-sized nations would devour the little ones and the big ones would eat the middle-sized ones.

INTERNATIONAL BANKRUPTCY

This situation would cause all nations, large and small, to keep armed to the last dollar they had to spend, for they would know that no other nation would sell them after the invader set foot on their soil. This would bankrupt the world for armaments and halt all progress in the things worth while.

All nations armed to the breaking point would be a situation not conducive to peace.

This is the situation embargo laws would place the world in. Those who talk peace by the embargo method would be prompting more war conditions than the world ever heard of in all its history. Embargoes would not lessen the number of casualties in any given war, but only make one nation a butcher and the other a slaughter pen.

The Neutrality Act

EDITORIAL BY THE PRESIDENT GENERAL OF THE SONS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial by the president general of the Sons of the American Revolution is exceptionally lucid and sane. Because a large percentage of the Members of Congress would not otherwise have an opportunity to read it, I have asked for and secured permission to have it included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Quarterly Bulletin, National Society, Sons of the American Revolution, October 1939]

THE PRESIDENT GENERAL'S MESSAGE

During recent weeks I have been inundated by requests from members, from the press, and from other organizations and individuals for a statement as to how our society stands on the Neutrality Act, which is up for amendment or repeal by Congress as I write this message. I know of no better indication of how far we have allowed ourselves to be influenced by foreign issues than this extraordinary pressure emanating from a foreign crisis. I believe the great majority of our people view with horror the possibility of our becoming involved again in a European war, and it is therefore essential that nothing should be done which might lead to our becoming implicated. I strongly feel that participation in this war would certainly end the principles of freedom which we cherish.

Twenty-five years ago, when war broke out in Europe, it was, of course, front-page news in this country. But it did not crowd all other news off the front page. Today both the most sensational tabloids and the most conservative newspapers devote their front pages to flamboyant headlines about the European war and relegate news and pictures of local affairs to subordinate positions on inside pages, and our ears are constantly assailed with war news on the radio. But this means we are readily subject to propaganda of the most flagrant sort. The result is to inflame our people to active interest in a war which but for these agencies would seem remote and of no paramount concern to us; also to incline us to take hurried and ill-considered actions.

It, therefore, becomes important to analyze the arguments put forward for the repeal or amendment of our Neutrality Act, as well as the arguments for its retention, in order that emotion or imagined self-interest do not play unduly in the result. That act was made into law in 1937 by an overwhelming majority in Congress (3 dissenting votes in the Senate and 13 in the House, I believe) and duly signed by the President. It cannot be disputed but that the motive behind the enactment of this law was to prevent exactly such eventualities as face this Nation today. There was no important war when the law was passed or prospect of one. Now that there is war, the act, for the first time, is put to the important test of facing realities. There is a widespread demand for its repeal or amendment, and it is likely that a part of the demand for amendment today comes from the same sources which demanded the enactment of the law 2 years ago.

Is it not advisable to consider carefully both sides of the arguments both for its retention as well as its repeal before hasty action is taken? On a momentous question as to the welfare, safety, and existence of our country, our Representatives in Congress should become acquainted with the will of their constituents, a majority of whom I firmly believe are determined not to go to Europe and are entitled to decide the best way to keep out.

When our neutrality law was enacted it marked a departure from the practices laid down and developed since Grotius wrote the first treaties on international law some 300 years ago. It was our law of neutrality when the war began. Before we return to the very practices which were claimed to be outworn but 2 years ago when the neutrality law was placed on our statute books, let the result of repeal be carefully weighed.

The purpose of those who favor the amendment of our neutrality law should be considered as well as the motive of those opposed. Those opposing repeal claim that the issue is practically one of peace or war. On the other hand, there are two groups seeking repeal; one is composed of those who feel that because of our neutrality law they are deprived of opportunities for "war boom" prosperity such as was enjoyed from 1914–1917; the other group is composed of those whose sympathies are so evidently and preponderantly on one side of the existing European war that they have no hesitancy in declaring that they wish the law repealed or amended so that we may furnish material support to one group of belligerents. Are either of these motives in themselves sufficient?

The first group may consider the suggestion that they turn their eyes from the east to the south and cease seeking material advantages from furnishing war supplies to Europe. Why not avail ourselves of the rare opportunity which the war has given America to recapture the markets of South America, our natural sphere of trade, and where for 20 years past we have been gradually pushed out by British, German, and even Japanese competition. This is much more humane and, in the long run, of more lasting benefit. The Monroe Doctrine could be applied to our export trade in the hemisphere where the Monroe Doctrine has prevailed for over a century.

To the second group I may say their own declaration of their sympathies and motives in itself should make us cautious. It is natural to suppose that those who wish very ardently to see one side in the present war win, in the course of time if amendment of our Neutrality Act alone be not sufficient to gain victory for their side, will equally ardently favor our actual participation in the war itself.

It is contended, too, that it is our duty to give such aid as we can to one side of the present European war in order to save those things which we, as Americans, believe should be defended and preserved. They forget that the principles and ideals in which we Americans believe have never existed or been defended or preserved to any appreciable extent outside of America. We once dedicated ourselves to making the world safe for democracy with disastrous results.

It is an old saying that "charity begins at home," but it has its present-day application in the paraphrase that "defense begins at home." One of the principal reasons why American ideals have developed here so fruitfully and have attracted so many Europeans to them is that we are and have been completely free from the age-old jealousies, hates and feuds, and boundary disputes which have predominated European thought since European history was first written.

It has been contended that the industrial activity which supplying war material would put under way would make prosperity for America, but are we to forget that similar activity 25 years ago brought us only momentary prosperity and itself eventually involved us in a holocaust from which we have never recovered?

I feel our society has the grave responsibility of advocating a policy that we feel is best for the perpetuation of the principles and traditions which our society was established to serve.

We should, therefore, turn for guidance to that genius whom we were fortunate to have as our first President. The record is clearly written and well preserved of his actions during those trying moments when opinion in this country was bitterly divided between those who felt we should become involved in France's war with Great Britain and those who felt that absolute neutrality was our best policy. President Washington's own Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, split with his chief on this issue.

Citizen Genet, then Ambassador from the French Republic, arrived here on a mission to get the neutrality proclamation withdrawn. Never was such propaganda hurled on America's head except perhaps at this moment. Genet had reason to believe the emotions of the country France had succored would cause America to come to her aid against England, America's hereditary enemy. Acting upon that assumption and encouraged by sympathizers, he committed most astonishing outrages by utterances and by outfitting privateers. Washington never wavered, met all criticism with firmness, had Genet recalled, and maintained our neutrality.

My conclusions, therefore, based on our national principles, our national traditions, and our national interest, are that we should be neutral in this present European conflict. They are the conclusions of my head if not of my heart, and I recommend to my compatriots in this society and to my fellow citizens outside the society that they, too, subjugate their emotions to their reason and that they realize that the first thing and the one thing and the most important thing for us in this Nation to do at the present time is to refrain from succumbing to propaganda or doing any act which will result in entangling ourselves once again in the labyrinth of European diplomacy and intrigues which out of every victory during the past thousand years has made nothing but the reasons for the next European war.

MESSMORE KENDALL,
President General.

Preserve Democracy Here

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN
OF NEW YORK

ADDRESS BY FRANK GANNETT, DELIVERED AT INDIANA STATE FAIRGROUNDS, INDIANAPOLIS, IND., SEPTEMBER 23, 1939

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Frank Gannett at the Indiana State fairgrounds, Indianapolis, Ind., September 23, 1939, when "Hoosier Round-Up" rally attracted an audience of 40,000:

Never have I seen a more inspiring gathering than this! It must be encouraging to all of us to know that countless thousands are assembled here in the interests of our great country, and to make our party a leading force to insure America's future.

We are, first of all, loyal Americans and then loyal members of the Republican Party.

None of us can get from our minds the agony across the sea. Heartsick over the horrors of war, we pray that some way may soon be found to end this terrible slaughter. Our sympathies are deep for those fighting the theory that might makes right, and that brute force should determine the destiny of countless millions of people.

What is going on in Europe involves the fate of freedom and democracy here in our own country. The war raises the greatest issue any of us shall ever have to face. That issue is the question of war and peace.

But, in spite of what may seem to be our obvious sympathies, we must keep out of this war. I repeat, we must keep out of this war! We must keep out of it not only because involvement might cost the lives of millions of our finest youths and untold billions of wealth; we must keep out because if we do not, our constitutional system of government will perish.

In wartimes a nation must give its government great powers to prosecute the war. Then personal liberties and rights disappear. If we should surrender our precious rights, it might be impossible, in a world of dictators, to recover them, and our democracy might be destroyed.

However this tragic conflict in Europe may end, we must not lose this last best hope on earth. No matter how intense our sympathies, we must put the interests of America first of all.

No one can foresee tomorrow, but if this terrible war drags on, it will mean the slaughter of the flower of this generation, bring bankruptcy, disaster, and complete ruin to all involved.

If we get into this war, instead of fighting to save democracy, we will be fighting to destroy democracy; a dictatorship here in America will be virtually assured.

To prove that there is this great danger, let me recall the May bill which was introduced in the last session of Congress. The May bill, had it been passed, would, in case of war, have given to the President powers as unlimited as has any dictator in Europe. He would have had power to raise or lower wages, fix prices, change leases or contracts; he would have had absolute control of mine and mill, field and factory; complete domination of our lives—and all of this control would have been without redress in the courts. He would, further, have had in his hands the authority of life or death over business, finance, agriculture, labor organized and unorganized. No limit was set.

This May bill, mind you, was devised in time of peace and won some support in Congress. But it was, thank heaven, pigeonholed. But once we get into war we shall see enacted laws just as evil as the May bill. Have no illusions, in time of war private rights perish, the government becomes master of our lives and possessions.

Today, we have forty-five billions of debt and a peacetime deficit of four billions a year.

WAR'S TREMENDOUS COST

If we had the expenditure of another war, which I say we must not enter, we shall add another $50,000,000,000 to our debt. Our public debt would rise to ninety or one hundred billions of dollars. It could not be repaid. Paper-money inflation would wipe out the thrifty, substantial, self-supporting middle class—the owners of savings-bank deposits, the 60,000,000 men and women holding life insurance policies. If this great, thrifty self-supporting class were gone, the bulwark of democracy itself would have disappeared; the wage earner and the unemployed would suffer most.

Men who know Europe best predict universal bankruptcy there. Our entry will bring the same fate to us. But, more disastrous than the loss of our material possessions will be the destruction of the rights and constitutional liberties which we enjoy and which we hold too lightly. I mean, of course, the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, right of assembly, trial by jury, protection against the invasion of the home, freedom of the press, of radio. If we go into this war, we will be deprived of these rights and I fear we may never regain them.

Recently President Roosevelt asked for an adjournment of partisanship. In a national crisis, we need unity and patriotic support of our Government. Partisanship should end where the ocean begins, but this must not mean any ban on the fullest discussion of foreign policy. This is no time to stop debate. Not in that way is national unity attained.

NEED FULL DISCUSSION

We are not at war with any nation. We are not involved in any great emergency. It is utterly wrong for any man, group, or party, to assume the right to decide fateful policies without fullest discussion.

Hitler silenced all political opposition and established one-man rule under the excitement of the burning of the Reichstag. We Americans must see to it that the democracy of our two-party system does not perish in the flames of war.

You will recall that when Woodrow Wilson in October 1918, in the midst of the war, asked for the election of a Democratic Congress in November, he was overwhelmingly defeated, because the country did not want an adjournment of political discussion in those critical days.

A spokesman for the New Deal recently stated that the European crisis would help the party in power and that it would cause people to stop worrying about debt limits, taxes, precedent, and the Constitution.

The Republican Party must see to it that debt limit, taxes, and the Constitution are not forgotten in any crisis.

Even before this war, we faced staggering problems at home. Today those problems are multiplied and intensified. Because Europe is fighting is no reason why America should be silenced. We must not be lulled into tolerating misgovernment at home or in the adoption of unsound policies because of war abroad.

DEMAND GOOD LEADERSHIP

Our Government is built on a system of two parties. An opposition party is vitally needed and this opposition party must be strong and vigorous as it is today. No White House edict can abolish this two-party system and destroy our right to protest against administrative acts which we consider detrimental to the country. Today we need cool, sober judgment and clear thinking. We must guard against emotion and view the situation with calm deliberation. We need today, more than ever, our country's wisest, most experienced leadership.

The war in Europe resulted from acts of dictators, not from the will of the people. These dictators rose to power because of unbearable economic conditions. People who are hungry, in distress, in want, will listen to the false but alluring promises of any demagogue. One by one, the peoples over there gave up their liberties until they had no voice in their government, not even a voice in determining whether or not they should go to war.

A few years ago when in Europe I met, face to face, several of the dictators. I saw people under nazi-ism, fascism, communism. I saw what it meant to be deprived of those liberties that we enjoy. I saw fear everywhere, fear of the government, and fear of government agents. I saw how the people are kept ignorant of what is going on. I saw them deprived of life and property without any protection of their rights. So long as the dictators control the machine guns there is nothing that the hapless people of those lands can do but remain vassals of the state.

America has had 10 years of depression. For 7 years we have had some of the same conditions that brought dictatorship in Europe. We must correct these conditions to escape the fate that has overcome many nations over there.

We should support the President in any policy that will keep us out of war. Even we who have disagreed with him in the past should support him as wholeheartedly as his closest friends on every sound proposal to that end.

Yet this war in Europe must not blind us to the great failures of the Roosevelt administration. We must realize that, war or no war, this country cannot continue New Deal policies that have brought us great distress. With millions unemployed, with crushing taxes, staggering debt, and restrictions on production of wealth in field and factory, Government policies that kill incentive, that check expansion and development, open the doors to dictatorship.

BEWARE TEMPORARY EASE

Temporary improvement in business may come because of the war. Prices may rise and, for a time, we may seem to be prosperous. But we must not be fooled by this, for until we correct the basic causes of our prolonged depression we shall not be safe. If we build up a false and evil boom on the bodies of those dying in Europe, we shall find ourselves, after the inevitable crash, in much worse condition than we are today.

We have before us three great duties:

First, to keep out of war.

Second, to preserve our constitutional government and ward off dictatorship.

Third, to restore prosperity.

On these three issues the Republican Party must take a position that will command complete public confidence.

As to keeping out of war, I rejoiced to hear the President assure the Congress and the country last Thursday that the Government must lose no time and effort to keep the Nation from being drawn into war. I was heartened by his prediction that we shall succeed in this effort. I do not question his sincerity of purpose. I agree with him that "no man or group in any walk of life should assume exclusive protectorate over the future well-being of America," and that "the mantle of peace and of patriotism is wide enough to cover us all."

WORDS NOT SUFFICIENT

Again, with all due respect to the President and to his sincerity, I must say that the people of America want not merely a statement that we will keep out of war, but they want action that will back up such a resolution and effectively keep us out of war. Unfortunately, Mr. Roosevelt's record has been such that many of us are troubled about his attitude on international affairs.

Let us look at facts.

On April 11, at his Washington press conference Mr. Roosevelt endorsed and made his own, an editorial published that day in the Washington Post. This editorial was, in effect, a plea for intervention by the United States. It stated definitely that all attempts to shelter the United States from war would be futile if England and France went to war. It spoke of our involvement as "a virtual certainty" if England and France should fight Germany. It classed the United States among the western nations that would be obliged to match Hitler's force by their force.

It is only too clear that by endorsing and making his own this editorial of April 11, the President, in effect, led the European powers to expect that if they were forced into war with Germany, we would fight at their sides.

This change in the President's attitude from the position he took in April to that which he takes today is gratifying. We hope he clings to the attitude taken in his message Thursday when he said, "Our acts must be guided by one single, hard-headed thought—to keep us out of war," and again, "This Government must lose no time or effort to keep from being drawn into the war," and he added, "In my candid judgment, we shall succeed."

OUR CHANGED VIEWPOINT

When the President gave that interview public opinion was very different from what it is now. Our antiwar emotions and convictions had not been crystallized. The administration for some time had been maintaining a warlike attitude toward the dictatorships, but against this attitude the country had not yet fully reacted.

The country then, as now, was deeply indignant at the lawless and brutal course of the totalitarian dictatorships. Then, as now, it was sympathetic with the democracies. Nevertheless, as yet we had developed no real consciousness of the true meaning of our entry into another World War. We did not realize the huge price we would have to pay in loss of life, in frightful suffering, in crushing expenditures that would keep our children and their children in poverty for generations to come. We did not sense the thorough and terrible loss of democracy, of government by the people, of a free society, which it would mean.

Let me repeat, the day we go to war, that day in this country a complete dictatorship will end the America you and I love.

But you say, and say truly, that when England declared war on September 3 the President took a stand very different from that he took in April. In a broadcast from Washington he reversed himself completely and promised the country—I quote: "As long as it remains within my power to prevent it, there will be no black-out of peace in the United States."

We all know Mr. Roosevelt is an able politician. But, alas, that is unfortunate in this situation. He can change his views with lightning rapidity. At one moment he promises to balance the Budget, the next he raises the Government's expenditures beyond all chance of balance. One moment he assaults democracy by attempting to seize the powers of all three branches of the Government; the next he declares himself democracy's warm friend. One moment he decrees a purge of all Congressmen and Senators who oppose him, even those in his own party; the next he pleads for good will and harmony at the Capitol. One moment he promises business appeasement and a breathing spell, and the next he launches vindictive reprisals.

SOME OMINOUS SIGNS

So it is not surprising, though exceedingly troubling, that the President should in April, in effect, declare for our entry into a European war, and in September state emphatically that, if he can prevent it, there will be "no black-out of peace."

All who are in touch with what is going on in Washington fear that, in spite of all that is said to the contrary, the United States is driving steadily toward eventual participation in the war. All plans are being made to that end. According to dispatches, they are getting everything ready in Washington so that a draft may be put in force at a moment's notice. That fact disturbs the peace of mind of every father and mother.

Remember what happened in 1916 and 1917. There were promises we would keep out of the European war. But European nations began to borrow money here. Then they began to buy supplies here. Next, we were promised if we went into the war no troops would be sent to Europe. How sadly we were misled. Soon plans were laid for sending 4,000,000 of our finest young men into the hell of war.

Let no appeal for adjournment of partisanship restrain us from opposition to any act that will lead us into this war. The Republican Party, representing the opposition, must watch every move, see to it that no misstep results in sending our boys to fight Europe's battle.

So, also, must we preserve our constitutional form of government. Never was it more important that we protect the Constitution, that great charter of our liberty.

Our form of government and our rights will be safe only so long as we protect and preserve our Constitution. It is our only hope of escaping the tragic fate of Europe.

THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE

Some of us fear we have as President one who is not deeply concerned about our Constitution.

Even Mr. Roosevelt himself has said, "We have built up new instruments of public power which, in the hands of political puppets, would provide shackles for the liberties of the people."

Let me quote from him again in addressing a committee of Congress: "I hope that your committee will not permit doubts as to the constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation."

These quotations show no great concern on his part about the Constitution.

Even more significant was his attack on the Supreme Court when he proposed to pack it so that this keystone of our Constitution would be destroyed. His plan would have clipped its power and strangled any of its efforts to protect the people against the tyranny of the majority that happened to be in office.

The Constitution offers us many commandments for preservation of our form of government. Let me name four: First, that the right of the several States to regulate their own affairs must remain inviolate. Second, that we entrust no official with autocratic power. Third, that arbitrary powers shall never be lodged in any majority; and, fourth, that limitation on officials shall be maintained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I charge that these commandments of the Constitution have been violated again and again by the policies of the Roosevelt administration.

"Arbitrary power always marks the end of liberalism, and true liberalism is civilization's finest fruitage," someone has well said.

Washington said, "Arbitrary, irresponsible power can never be trusted in human hands"; and Jefferson well said, "When all government shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power it will become penal and oppressive."

Andrew Jackson, in his farewell address, said, "There are those who wish to enlarge the powers of the Central Government. Their attempts should be firmly opposed. One evil example will lead to other measures still more mischievous."

How the acts of the Roosevelt administration conflict with these words of wisdom!

MUST RESTRICT POWER

Let us grant no more power to President Roosevelt or any President.

We cannot attempt to preserve or defend the democracies of Europe, but we can and must defend our own democracy. If democracy fails here, is there hope for it anywhere? The fate of the world rests with us. It is a challenge to America.

In this crisis we must cling closely to our Constitution and our constitutional form of government. Once we lose it it will be difficult, if not impossible, to regain it.

Again, we must restore prosperity if we are to preserve our democracy.

Our Constitution makes possible the free-enterprise system. It gives the individual, rich or poor, opportunity to make the most of himself, to realize his ambitions, to profit from his efforts, to engage in any field of activity which does not injure others—in short, it leaves to every individual the right to regulate his own life. This system of free enterprise, with the incentives that it affords, brought about the great development of America, the greatest development the world has ever seen.

If we preserve our Constitution and our system of free enterprise, who can place a limit to what may be done in America? Despite the long depression the country is far from finished. We may geographically have reached our last frontier, but new and greater frontiers are opening up to us every day.

PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITY

In hundreds of laboratories throughout the land research is developing new products and finding new uses for old products. In a few years the entire world about us will be changed. Machines, unjustly blamed for our ills, will be reemploying millions of workers. They will be producing for us abundantly the things we need and want. Under our system of free enterprise, we shall amazingly enlarge, enrich, and beautify our lives.

Our country is blessed with almost unlimited resources, with great productive capacity. We have an intelligent, inventive, resourceful people. We stand at the gates of plenty. We need only to make our system of distribution function, to afford employment to all willing workers, abolish poverty, sickness, distress, and bring happiness and prosperity to all.

Only under our form of government and under our Constitution can such dreams be realized.

These are critical days for America. What may happen in the next few weeks or months may determine our entire future. Every citizen must take a deep interest in public questions and must exercise his full rights as a citizen. We must make no mistake that will cloud the promising outlook for America.

Our task is to make America strong and great. We must keep the flame of liberty blazing undimmed in the Western Hemisphere.

Under wise leadership we can attain such happiness and well-being that by force of example, we may help to lead the free peoples of the world to forms of government that will make for sanity and peace.

To this great task the Republican Party must dedicate itself. We must enlist the support of every citizen, and by persistent effort see to it that this continues to be a land of freedom and liberty.

The patriots in Washington's time risked all, gave all, for their country. The blessings we enjoy were obtained only by the greatest sacrifices. We cannot hope to retain these blessings if we are not ready also to make sacrifices for them.

CHALLENGE TO REPUBLICANS

The issue today is far more important than was the great issue of Lincoln's time. The question that confronts us now is whether all men shall remain free, or whether they shall become the helpless pawns of the politicians in power whom we call the state.

In Lincoln's time, when our country was in its second great crisis, the Republican Party rose to the emergency and saved the Union. In this third crisis, America calls upon the Republican Party to render a greater service to our people. It will be a service to all mankind. The country now looks to it for leadership and wise administration of our Government. The party must meet this challenge.

Yet it falls upon the individual to determine the future of our country. If we all take a deep interest in our Government, if we do our full duty to our party and take part in its affairs in our own precincts, then we can accomplish results; 1940 will be a year of tremendous, fateful decisions. The election next year may determine which way we shall go—toward a perpetuation of our democracy or toward dictatorship.

I have faith in the American people. In spite of reverses, in spite of discouragement, I have faith that a great unseen power is directing our destiny and we shall triumph in this crisis as we have in others. I have faith that we shall all do our full part, that there will be glorious days ahead for America, and that government "of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST OF OCTOBER 28, 1939

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, the Saturday Evening Post offers to its readers editorials on current topics which are always worthy of serious reading. The following editorial is both timely and interesting, and I hope that the entire membership of the Congress will also find time to read the article.

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 28, 1939]

REQUIRED READING FOR EUROPEANS

Ever since Europe has had any history at all, it has been a history marked by continual disputes, culminating at intervals in bloody and ruinous wars. As the drama continues its long run, the villains change, the heroes change—sometimes with bewildering rapidity, as witness Soviet Russia—but the plot remains essentially the same.

The villains are no doubt very real, and the heroes as well, but we can still wonder why the old stock situations come up again and again, so that speeches and arguments used against Napoleon or Kaiser Wilhelm could serve almost unchanged as propaganda against Hitler. It seems remarkable that after so many centuries, the statesmen of Europe were able to contrive only the unquiet intermission of 1919–39, instead of the looked-for happy ending. The excuses given are plausible enough at first sight; racial and religious differences, trade rivalries, boundary disputes, all form so many unbridgeable chasms between the European states.

But differences just as wide and deep have been bridged on this continent. An Englishman who traveled in America in 1759–60 wrote:

"Fire and water are not more heterogeneous than the different colonies in North America. Nothing can exceed the jealousy and emulation which they possess in regard to each other. The inhabitants of Pennsylvania and New York have an inexhaustible source of animosity in their jealousy for the trade of the Jerseys. Massachusetts Bay and Rhode Island are not less interested in that of Connecticut. The West Indies are a common subject of emulation to them all. Even the limits and boundaries of each colony are a constant source of litigation. In short, such is the difference of character, of manners, of religion, of interest in the different colonies, that I think, if I am not wholly ignorant of the human mind, were they left to themselves, there would soon be a civil war from one end of the continent to the other; while the Indians and Negroes would, with better reason, impatiently watch the opportunity of exterminating them altogether."

Virtually all competent observers of the time agreed that union between the colonies was impossible. And yet it was achieved. It might be a good idea if Europeans made as close a study of the way to peace as we are now making of the ways of war, as exemplified in Europe.

The Newspapers in This Crisis

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. STEPHEN BOLLES, OF WISCONSIN, OCTOBER 20, 1939

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, at the earnest request of members of the Illinois Press Association, to insert in the RECORD an address of mine at the seventy-fourth annual banquet of that great organization of newspaper editors and publishers of Illinois, at the University of Illinois, Friday evening, October 20. The address follows:

I come to you from the Inland Daily Press Association at its meeting in Chicago—an organization taking in its membership the daily press of the great Central West, from Pennsylvania to the Rocky Mountains. I talked about Congress there, more particularly in the relationship of the newspaper to the Congress of the United States than as a page from a guidebook, which explains what Congress is. A trite statement that I hear frequently, as you have, is that we are living in a very critical period. We have always lived in a critical period. There never has been a time when there was not an impending crisis. I remember when the automobile took to the highways, with linen duster drivers and goggled eyes, and the women stormed the outfitting shops and the horses on a thousand highways snorted in fear and ran away. I remember a speech in the Ohio Legislature by an early member who advocated the abolition of the automobile in its entirety. I remember also that ministers of the gospel, swept with enthusiasm, spoke in earnest denunciation of golf and that this new importation from Scotland was a manifestation of the devil's powers. We have survived these volcanic changes, both of which have had an enormous influence on American life.

The automobile revolutionized industry, changed rural and village life, sent cities out into sprawling suburbs, extended neighborhoods, ordered a new social life, colored the landscape with chromatic filling stations, built garages by the thousands, put a million people at work.

One of the old—and I may say probably the oldest—indoor sports for newspapers since the adoption of the Constitution and the institution of a free elective government in the United States has been the inherent right of the editor to make fun of Congress and those holding political office. Many an editor has written what he thought was a rib tickler concerning this body of men in Washington. To many Congress is looked upon as a necessary evil, like the road hog, the Mormon cricket, the grasshopper, the corn borer, the locust, and the army worm.

But I wish you would remember, all of you, that 435 Members of the House of Representatives, representing districts in this Nation of 48 States, and 96 Senators, elected by the people of each State, are responsible to the 130,000,000 people for all the statute laws of this Nation and must stand or fall by what they do and the records they make.

Whenever a large number of people want a special thing we hear it said that there is a public sentiment in its favor. The Member of Congress must separate this supposed public sentiment and discover for himself whether this desire for a certain thing may be simply the outcome of narrow personal interest and may, in no sense, deserve the name of public sentiment or public spirit. And the next step is to find out whether people who write you as a Member of Congress are writing for their own personal interests, the interests of their business, or their hope of profits if certain legislation is passed or not passed, or whether it has in it the element of a widespread benefit to the general public. The mail of almost every Congressman is burdened with the demand from people who want things done because it is profitable to them. I am not saying that this is not justifiable in most instances, but it puts a burden on the Congressman to separate that personal interest particularly from what might be beneficial to the general public.

Arthur Twining Hadley, former president of Yale, said once that "Public sentiment represents each man's share in that political conscience which is as important for the ordering of the affairs of the individual. Public opinion is a judgment formed in accordance with the dictates of this political conscience and representing a theory which a man is prepared to apply against himself as well as against others."

And then President Hadley continues: "Where it exists such public opinion is not only powerful but all powerful. It can accomplish more than any other coercive agency in the world."

Now, I may say that as a Member of Congress I am confronted with these things. I must realize to the fullest extent my own responsibility. The syndicate writers, with the sophistry of words, and all the others who indulge in something outside of public sentiment which reaches the stage of propaganda, are creating public opinion.

Propaganda is that thing spoken or written which has for its purpose, justifiable or not, the attainment of a definite object in creating public opinion. Its truth or falsity is no concern of the propagandist. There is a milder form of propaganda that is found in a flood of Government press releases, purporting to be reports on ordinary affairs but nevertheless with a most definite objective—to give the public an idea of the overwhelming interest of bureaus and departments in the welfare of the American people. Now, propaganda is differentiated from news acceptable to the newspapers by news being pure at its source. It is a record of fact only and not vitiated by opinion subtle or openly.

This literary propagandic epilepsy finds its way into the newspapers in spite of wastebaskets. The public may be fed arsenic in small doses and live; it may be fed opiates with its morning coffee or its afternoon tea; it may not know it is taking either and will probably deny any effect, but nevertheless it is being changed by its newspaper reading of propaganda, subtly, unconsciously, and thoroughly.

I want to call your attention to the necessity of the newspapers represented by the Illinois Press Association and all other newspaper organizations in the United States of trying to separate propaganda from the news. The most beneficial thing we may have for the establishment of a right public opinion and the creation of a genuine public sentiment is the elimination of this weight of propaganda. In the American Society of Newspaper Editors' statement of ideals it is said, "The press must stand guard over itself, that it may be worthy to stand guard for the public."

As a Member of Congress and also a lifetime newspaper reporter or editor, I have a hard task in winnowing the actual truth from propaganda. It is frankly recognized that public sentiment will not meet all those evils which need to be corrected or abolished, or accomplish all those objects for which numbers of people now desire legislation. It is quite well that this is so. If all things were done which are called for in the name of public sentiment and passed into laws by the Congress of the United States we would lose all the freedom of America. Over and over again, bowing to what was supposed to be public sentiment expressed in elections or by mass attack through letters, telegrams, and petitions to the Members of Congress, laws have been passed and rules of conduct established which in the end have proved to be extraordinary failures.

We must have one principle which shall be unchangeable. That principle is that a just government is based on the consent of the governed. Even though the government possesses for the moment a majority at the polls, without that consent we have neither just government, self-government, nor freedom in its true sense.

And now I want to talk to you for a minute about the responsibility of the newspapers, the responsibility of your own press association, the responsibility of those who are learning to be newspapermen, through journalism courses at this and other universities. It is too often a fact that when Members of Congress in Washington and political candidates talk about the freedom of the press they do not have in mind the real press of the United States. That real press is not in the great metropolitan newspaper but in the 700 or more daily newspapers and hundreds more of weeklies distributed daily or weekly to 70 percent of the population of these great central States. Not in the seaboard cities with polyglot populations, not in the great metropolitan field where people buy newspapers, is the power of the press. The power lies in the people who subscribe for a newspaper and do not buy it on the street. Just so long as the people who subscribe are a militant majority, there will be no censorship of the newspapers of this country, and no possibility of a curtailment of press freedom. Power given to any administrative official or the creation of the unnumbered bureaucratic organizations, unchecked by the legislative body of the United States, which is Congress, in order to carry out that power may find it necessary to check the press itself, perhaps censor it and to take over the domination of communication. I make no dire prophesy about this, but I do warn you that it is necessary to be on the watchtower against the insidious and erosive movement to question the position of the press or to attempt in any manner its censorship or curtailment of its constitutional rights.

Let us keep before us the figure of that young German, Peter Zenger, and the historical figure of white-wigged Andrew Hamilton, whose legal masterpiece in Zenger's defense remains even today as the unmovable cornerstone of our own press freedom. Once we have a censorship in America we have taken a step backward into the Dark Ages of absolutism and dictatorship.

There are more ways than one of censorship. Most recent is the organized campaign against advertising. This is a "boring from within" which you find it hard to combat. You hear it on the floor of the House—the domination of newspapers by the advertiser, the higher prices paid by consumers for advertised commodities. May I say to you that you must meet this challenge in your own community.

I challenge one and all to this, that the press—and when I speak of the press I mean newspapers, daily and weekly—has never been more powerful or had more freedom than at this hour of our history. There can be no national freedom without a free press, and by the corollary there can be no free press without a free nation.

I want to say to you here that if by some strange metamorphosis of public mind and a wave of new hysterical insanity in Congress through public opinion and sentiment imposed upon it, we go to war, there will be blood spots on every newspaper, no matter how great or how lowly it may be. You as well as I have a great responsibility here.

I was intensely interested at your session this morning in the discussion of an editorial page. And why? To me the editorial page of any newspaper breathes its personality. One is not called upon to quarrel but to lead. This is after all a world of commonplaces, of small things. They make up the daily life of each household and in the aggregate, the community life. In that community each week arise a dozen topics for comment, not in news columns but in the editorial page. There is your place of interpretation of the news, your homely contributions to your community. The most widely publicized editorial I ever wrote was on a pumpkin pie. It stirred all New England because I proved that no matter its origin, Wisconsin was the real home of pumpkin pie. And do not wait for a man who has done things for your community to tell about it. Better is one rose on the breast of the living than a blanket of forget-me-nots on the mahogany coffin of the dead.

You have also a larger, wider responsibility in going further. Most of this world is voiceless, inarticulate. It has no way, no means of expressing itself. In America we are blessed with newspapers. The paper must provide the articulation. If it does not it is failing in its job.

I make no apology for the newspapers. They are just as perfect as is the human race and no more. There is a record of only two persons in either profane or sacred history that so reached perfection as to be translated to Paradise while still living—Enoch and Elijah. I say to you that whenever one of you feels that his newspaper on any day is perfect, there will be a chariot of fire right at the front door to take you without checking the speed limit to the gates of the New Jerusalem.

One-third of the population of the United States, in figures, reads daily newspapers; two-thirds read the weeklies. The most potent power in this Nation for the decline of illiteracy is the newspaper daily and weekly. It can and does do more than any other instrument to build public sentiment than any other force. It can take a peanut politician out of oblivion and make him a Congressman of the United States. It can take a Negro roustabout from the slums of Detroit and make him a national figure. It can take a gum-chewing girl who doesn't know the difference between syntax and sandstone and make her a formidable star in the movies. It can turn obscurity into public prominence. It can paint a gangster into a daring bandit and give him a high place in criminal history. It can make a mediocre scion of a degenerate nobility something of world-wide consequence.

The newspapermen plants and prunes a vine, fertilizes it with its best phrases, and may find at last that it withers to the touch and its beautiful flowers fade and fall. It is the profession of all professions. Science would find its discoveries valueless, invention hidden in dark-caved mystery, progress in the doldrums, a free people uninformed, the government slowed up with brakes on every axle, if it were not for the newspaper. It is the one profession or vocation where every scrap of knowledge ever gained or accumulated can be used.

Therefore the newspapers have a responsibility at this particular time in our history, when we are involved in a great discussion of what is best for the United States, with all the world involved either in war or tremulously watching war developments. You have a coequal responsibility with your Congressmen and Senators to the people of this Nation, to the whole world in general, for the preservation of civilization. We need the newspaper now as never before. Remember the road between political partisanship and constructive statesmanship is a winding highway without a warning sign.

Civilization is not preserved by bombing it to death from the air, ambushing it in the sea by U-boats, or shooting it into graves in mass frontal attacks. And so I'm opposed to war to settle any question, or to handing to anybody shooting irons with which to preserve civilization by killing somebody else.

No dictatorship can exist with a free press, uncensored and untrammeled. Almost the first step in a totalitarian state is the suppression of the newspapers.

When Napoleon Bonaparte lost his throne there was erected the Holy Alliance in 1815. It was the first League of Nations. There was a covenant for the maintenance of the status quo as to boundaries, rulers, and governments. The Holy Alliance has been called the strongest and most effective international union which the world has ever known. It was in autocratic hands, where parliaments need not be consulted. It died eventually because it met a new power unforeseen and not cataloged—the power of public opinion and its ally, the spirit of popular government.

The guiding genius of the alliance—a devil may be a genius—was Prince Metternich of Austria. Its powerful backers were Alexander of Russia, Talleyrand of France. Its originators were Russia and Austria but in a few years the protocol had been signed by every power and nation of Europe except Great Britain, the Sultan of Turkey, and the Pope. It declared that the alliance: "Has no other object than the maintenance of peace and the guaranty of those transactions on which the peace was founded and consolidated * * * the repose of the world will be constantly our motive."

What a hollow mockery! Later on, the Holy Alliance became more arrogant and declared in 1821 that all legislation in all the states which it had "taken into its holy keeping must emanate alone from the free will, the reflected and enlightened impulse of those whom God has rendered responsible for power."

In other words, all nations in the alliance must make no new laws unless first submitted to the Holy Alliance. It was one of the world's boldest pieces of arrogant impertinence. In the Congress of Verona in 1822 the Duke of Wellington withdrew as Britain's representative because in the treaty, ready to be signed was a clause which said that: "As the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations to the detriment of those of princes, the high contracting parties promise reciprocally to adopt all proper measures to suppress it, not only on their own states but also in the rest of Europe."

Wellington withdrew, Britain refused to remain in the Holy Alliance. Following the battle by John Wilkes, the freedom of the press in Great Britain had been established after a long and bitter struggle 70 years before. It had become a part of the British unwritten constitution and the greatest support of the British Government was its growing and more powerful daily newspaper press.

Thus came black days for the Holy Alliance in Europe. Greece struck at Turkey and became free. The Spanish nations in the Western Hemisphere revolted and became free, and almost every other nation in Europe stepped forth into a new atmosphere of liberty and individual expression.

If so dark a night could come to peoples in Europe, and so great an attempt for consolidated autocratic power could die as did the Holy Alliance, I may say that I have historical precedence for a belief that out of the gloomy murk of a dictated Europe of 1939 the people will emerge once more in the brilliant light of a greater freedom.

I shall try and do my part, both as a newspaper editor and a Member of Congress. I ask you to do yours. I want to see a new spirit of optimism. There is too much dark pessimism, too much of defeatism, and too much of a belief that America is involved in all of these quagmires of European politics. For remember, my friends, we blazed our own trail, we forded the rivers, we cleared the prairies and the forests, we built the roads and the railroads, we put the steamboats on the rivers, we constructed the mills and the factories, we built the schoolhouses and the churches, we established the little academies, the colleges, and the universities, and these are still ours. Let us keep them so. Our history over a hundred years was a struggle for peace. Let us not be weary on this present battle front for peace.

Never yet—

Share of plow was vainly set
In the world's wide fallow;
Other hands shall sow the seed,
Other hands from hill and mead
Reap the harvest yellow.

Industrial Price Policies in This Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY HAROLD G. MOULTON

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by Mr. Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution:

As everyone knows, the outbreak of war in Europe resulted in an immediate and striking advance in commodity prices in the United States. In the first 2 weeks of September the wholesale-price index of all commodities rose some 6 percent and many raw-material prices advanced as much as 25 percent. The question of the hour became, Are we entering upon a new era of inflation comparable to that of the World War period? The advance ended in mid-September, and the last 4 weeks have shown a slight recession. Hence the present moment of suspense is a highly propitious one in which to discuss industrial price policies in this emergency. If we are to analyze the problem adequately, it is essential that we place the American financial situation in a world setting.

Financial trends throughout the world in recent years have been highly disquieting. The disorganization of the international exchanges and the break-down of monetary and financial systems during the great depression were not followed by a period of financial reconstruction and normal business expansion. Instead of a restoration of international economic equilibrium, we have witnessed a continuance of foreign-exchange controls and a further great shift of liquid financial resources to the United States. In lieu of a well-balanced world recovery from a world depression, we have had widely varying degrees of business activity in different countries, reflecting in the main the intensity of the stimulus applied in the form of Government expenditures for relief purposes or for military objectives. In place of a progressive reduction in public indebtedness and a lightening load of taxation, Government debt has nearly everywhere been increasing at a rate comparable to that of wartime. At the end of 6 years which should have been years of sound recovery and expansion, it cannot be said that world financial stability had been achieved, or even approached.

In the light of this background, it is hardly too much to say that the coming of a new war in Europe raises economic and financial problems of wholly unprecedented importance for the entire world. The imposition of new war costs upon already overburdened financial systems imperils economic and financial reconstruction everywhere—in the United States and other neutral nations as well as in the countries which are at war.

This statement is made in full consciousness of the fact that at the moment of speaking, the economic situation in the United States appears—on the surface of things—to be highly promising. Even before the outbreak of war abroad, corporate earnings were showing a somewhat unexpected improvement; and now with the added stimulus of war demands the outlook for dividends in the near future appears indeed promising. Production is expanding, employment increasing, purchasing power broadening, and national income rising. The recent increase in food and raw-material prices is—in the main—regarded as helpful rather than otherwise, bringing about a better equilibrium between various segments of the economic system. Superficially, at any rate, it would seem that our prayers are at last being answered.

But sober reflection warns of lurking dangers. Are we not stocking up with inventories and expanding production schedules at too rapid a pace? What if the war should end suddenly? Even if it proves to be of long duration, what will be the ultimate repercussions upon this country? Are we not even now riding the wind and promoting a business boom, with the familiar distortion of prices, wages, and other cost factors? Are we not sure to see sooner or later, and perhaps sooner rather than later, a new collapse and another protracted period of painful readjustment?

It is no part of my purpose to venture a prediction as to the probable magnitude of the present expansion movement or its possible duration—for I know of no scientific formula whereby one can resolve a compound made up of economic, political, psychological, and military elements, and read the future with unerring eye. My sole object is to discuss what I conceive to be the fundamental economic requirements of the present situation and the industrial policies necessary to achieve the desired ends. I would make it clear at the outset that the analysis is based on the assumption that the United States will not become a participant in the European war.

THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC GOAL

As a foundation for the consideration of business policies at this time, we should obviously have in mind a clearly defined national economic objective or goal. I would state the desirable objective in the following terms: The economic goal of the United States at this time should be to make a full utilization of our economic resources in expanding production without permitting a general inflation of prices and a destruction of equilibrium in the economic system.

Under any circumstances, the maintenance of a well-balanced economy is essential to orderly progress. In view of the present world situation the preservation of financial and economic stability in the United States is a paramount necessity. It is not too much to say that economic developments on the North American Continent in the coming months may well prove of decisive importance to the whole future of industrial civilization.

FUNDAMENTAL FACTORS IN THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

If we are to view the national economic problem in fundamental terms, we must look beyond, and for the moment forget, cost accounting and financial issues as they affect particular industries or companies. In other words, we must begin with an engineering approach and survey the national situation in terms of the supplies of primary materials and the capacity of our existing productive plant and equipment to expand output.

The first fact to be noted is that we have exceptionally large accumulated stocks of most primary agricultural and industrial raw materials. Food supplies also have been so large relatively to demand that the trend of prices has been persistently downward. It is unnecessary to present detailed statistical information in respect to food supplies and raw materials, for as everyone knows, Government agencies, as well as producing groups, have been preoccupied, not with shortages but with the problem of how to get rid of surpluses "overhanging the markets."

We also had, and now have, the capacity to produce still greater supplies of basic raw materials. In order to keep surpluses down, the Government has been restricting agricultural production, while mineral output has been held in check by inadequate demand. In both fields the volume of production could readily be greatly increased. So far as domestic production is concerned there is thus, in general, no present or prospective shortage of raw materials. (Scrap iron is an important exception.) The situation is, of course, different with respect to materials which have to be imported. It is possible that in some cases serious shortages might develop.

In the fields of manufacture and distribution the situation with respect to productive capacity is similar. Except in a few lines the scale of operations has been far below capacity. Moreover, existing capacity could, if necessary, be expanded without great delay. Railroad facilities might show some temporary shortcomings, but our transportation system as a whole has ample actual or potential capacity to care for probable national requirements.

The situation with respect to labor cannot be stated in such unqualified terms. In the aggregate, unemployment runs into many millions; but a program of business expansion under the stimulus of European war demands would doubtless result in serious shortages of certain types of skilled labor, requiring extensive apprentice-training programs. With this reservation, the labor supply must also be regarded as imposing no restrictions upon a very large expansion of production.

It is hardly necessary to point out that there is no shortage of what used to be called "the life blood of business," namely, money and credit. The supply is superabundant, and interest rates the lowest ever known.

There is thus no scarcity basis for a great advance in the general level of commodity prices. Indeed, when one looks at the situation in terms of the effective utilization of productive energy, it would seem clear that as output expands, unit costs of production should for a time fall. This is for the simple reason that we would be making use of otherwise idle plant and equipment. When productive resources are not fully employed, there is obvious waste; and the elimination of idle resources means—in terms of human energy—a reduction of costs.

But is not the approach that we have been making unreal and impractical, in that it ignores the money cost, price, and profit problems which confront individual business enterprises? Obviously, the analysis would be incomplete if it did not give careful consideration to the practical problems which must be faced and solved by business executives who are responsible for meeting pay rolls and fixed charges and earning dividends for impatient stockholders. They are not in a position to control the economic system as a whole. They must take cost factors as they find them and make the best profit showing they can under constantly varying conditions.

Manufacturing industry is, at the moment, confronted with the fact that raw-material prices in general are now some 10 percent higher than in August, and that in many cases the advance has been as much as 25 percent. Regardless of the situation with respect to aggregate national productive capacity, higher material prices mean for manufacturing enterprises higher money outlays, which cannot be ignored in a profit-making economic system. Before attempting to indicate the bearing of such increased costs on profits, a brief analysis should be made of the factors involved in the advance in raw-material prices.

The sharp increase which has occurred in the prices of raw materials is the result of demand from two sources: (1) from speculators seeking to make profits by anticipating price advances based on expectations of war-time inflation; and (2) from industries desiring to expand inventories to take care of immediate and prospective requirements. The speculative element enters here also, since an expected price advance prompts heavy advance buying.

While available data are far from adequate, there is much reason for believing that the great upsurge in raw material buying which has occurred since August has resulted in a greater price advance in many raw materials than is warranted by the fundamental supply and demand factors in the situation. Much of the speculative buying has been based upon exaggerated notions about world wide inflation. Inventory purchases have also been on a plane which may well be above that warranted by the demand from ultimate consumers. There is clear evidence that the current level of production is substantially above the current level of consumption. While consumptive demand may be expected to increase as employment expands, the question remains, Has not inventory accumulation once again been excessive? The answer will depend in no small degree on the probable magnitude of European war demands.

FACTORS AFFECTING EUROPEAN DEMANDS

European purchases may well be of a much more restricted character than has been generally assumed. The present situation differs from that of the World War period in several significant respects. First, the capacity of the principal European nations to buy goods in our markets is very much less. In 1914 their ability to borrow appeared almost limitless, whereas today it is gravely impaired. It is possible to compute for England and France many billions of foreign purchasing power by counting all of the gold resources of these countries held at home and in the United States, and by including investments, bank deposits, and speculative holdings of British and French citizens abroad. However, to mobilize these individual holdings, it is necessary for the governments concerned to obtain possession of them through requiring their exchange for government bonds. In view of the credit strain with which these countries are confronted, the mobilization of these holdings is not a simple matter. Moreover, it is in any case of the utmost importance for these countries to preserve, just as far as possible, their liquid financial resources. Accordingly they may be expected to use such resources just as sparingly as possible.

The advance in prices in 1915 was greatly enhanced by frantic competition among European buyers, participated in both by individual purchasers and by governments. This time the purchase of American supplies will come from fewer countries and they will be pooled in the interest of interallied economy. At the same time rigorous measures for controlling prices are being instituted at the very beginning of the conflict. In this war the European belligerents are harboring no illusions that normal business can go forward as usual or that the standards of living of the masses can be raised or even maintained. British mobilization plans call for a restriction of consumption in the interests of procuring maximum war production and maintaining financial equilibrium.

Finally, the need for American materials and supplies may well be much smaller than was the case in the World War. To be sure, there will be intense demands in special lines, notably airplanes and machine tools, causing distortion in our industrial structure. But, by and large, the demands are likely to be restricted. Both France and England have much larger accumulated supplies of munitions than in 1914, and both countries have greatly expanded their capacity to produce munitions. Belgium and other neutral countries may well be important sources of supply. The Dominions also have increased capacity and will be given preference.

Moreover, there is much reason for believing that the present conflict may not involve infantry and artillery operations of a magnitude comparable to that of the last war when the western front was not protected on both sides by almost impregnable fortifications. If this war is fought by England and France chiefly by means of an economic blockade as both military and economic considerations seem to dictate, French and English purchases in the United States would be of comparatively modest proportions.

Speaking generally, I think it may be safely stated that further advances in raw-material prices would not be advantageous to raw-material producers. This is because they serve to restrict foreign purchases. The sharp rise which has already occurred both in the prices of raw materials and foodstuffs, intensified for foreign purchasers by the relative rise of the dollar, has played directly into the hands of competing areas. Other sources of supply are naturally being given priority.

The implication of this analysis obviously is that the magnitude of European war demands may well have been misgaged. If so, the increases in production schedules and in raw material prices have overshot the mark. The point I am chiefly interested in is that industrial plans for the near future need not necessarily be based on the assumption that raw material prices are certain to go higher; there is quite as much reason for believing that they may go lower.

INDUSTRIAL PRICES

We now proceed directly to the question of industrial price policy in the present situation. Thus far the prices of manufactured goods have not advanced materially. As a matter of sound policy—in the interest of stability—the managements of leading industries have refrained from marking up prices. However, the sharp advance in the price of numerous classes of raw materials, coupled with more moderate increases in some other cost elements, has been leading many to the conclusion that industrial prices must inevitably be advanced in the not distant future.

There can, of course, be no doubt that if operating costs in manufacturing industry should continue to increase it would eventually be necessary to advance prices in order to prevent the elimination of profit margins. The only question at issue is whether an increase in prices is necessary at this time. It is obvious that no answer can be given to this question that is equally applicable to all lines of business. One can only speak in general terms.

At this place the analysis ties back with our earlier discussion of unutilized productive capacity. Not only do costs, in terms of human energy, fall as unused plant and equipment is put to work but financial costs also decline.

As a result of habitual modes of thinking, there has been a tendency for all of us to overlook the bearing of the volume of output on unit costs and profits. So long as an industry is operating well below capacity, an increase in volume, which distributes the burden of overhead over a larger number of units, will offset large increases in direct operating expenses.

The tremendous importance of volume to nearly any corporation one might care to name is strikingly revealed in the financial data for the expansion period of 1936. In a certain group of companies, for example, an increase in the scale of operations from 53 percent in the first quarter of 1936 to 69 percent in the second quarter meant more than a threefold increase in net earnings. In the interval there was a slight decline in prices. Ten companies in one industry, which operated for the year 1935 as a whole on a 47.9-percent basis, earned $41,000,000. In 1936, operating at 67-percent capacity, they earned one hundred twenty-eight millions. Meanwhile, average prices had risen less than 1 percent. Moreover, during this period both raw material prices and wages were rising. To carry the story into the first half of 1937, a still increasing scale of operations raised profits still higher, notwithstanding the fact that wages and raw material costs advanced very much more than the prices of finished manufactured product.

The significance of increased volume has long been recognized in connection with such industries as transportation and public utilities. It is regarded as a self-evident proposition that the current expansion in railway traffic will materially improve net earnings, bringing the roads as a whole from the red well into the black. It is not assumed that increases in the cost of fuel, labor, and equipment will promptly necessitate an advance in rates either in the railway or public-utility fields. But curiously enough in the case of manufacturing we tend to assume that increases in operating costs must be promptly followed by some, if not proportional, advances in prices. The difference between manufacturing industry and railroads and public utilities is only a difference in degree.

In order not to make too sweeping a generalization, I now emphasize that the importance of the principle under discussion varies widely in different divisions of manufacturing industry. An increase in direct expenses is obviously more important in lines where the cost of labor and materials bulks large in relation to overhead expenses than where the reverse is true. Moreover, the gains resulting from an expansion of output in any industry obviously tend to diminish as maximum capacity is approached.

The argument is often heard both in business and academic circles that the moment costs begin to rise in consequence of the utilization of less efficient plant and equipment a price advance is called for. If such a price increase could be applied only to these last units of supply, something might be said for it. But to hold that the level of costs in the obsolescent portion of an industry's plant and equipment should govern the price of the entire product, seems to me clearly untenable.

When the demand is temporarily so intense as to call for a volume of output in excess of the capacity of the more efficient plant and equipment, one alternative is to hold the selling price where it is in the knowledge that such price will more than cover direct operating expenses in the obsolescent plant, thus contributing something to general overhead. If, however, the obsolescent plant is so inefficient as to make it impossible to cover direct out-of-pocket expenses at a level of prices in line with the general state of technological advancement in the industry, this would be prima facie evidence that it would be sound policy to refuse further business instead of allowing the whole price structure to be distorted. The result would merely be to postpone a portion of the orders, thereby spreading production more evenly. If there is reason for believing that the high level of demand will prove to be of a sustained character, the need then is for the prompt installation of new low-cost capacity. In any case, genuine industrial progress over the years can be achieved only by constantly applying the results of new scientific and engineering developments to the processes of production. The road to progress is well exemplified in the achievements of one industry during the course of the past 15 years, in which expanding capital investment and increasing efficiency made simultaneously possible (1) a gradual reduction of prices, (2) an increase of wages, both hourly and aggregate, (3) an increase in employment, and (4) a high level of profits. At the same time there was a continuous improvement in the quality and variety of commodities produced, some of which ministered directly to the satisfaction of human wants and others to increasing productive efficiency in a wide range of other industries. I hasten to add that I am not referring to the automobile industry.

Returning to the present situation, the analysis which we have been making clearly leads to the conclusion that there are no compelling economic reasons why there should be any general advances in price at this time. It would be presumptuous of any individual, without detailed knowledge of the situation which confronts particular companies, to say that no price advances are warranted. But, in general, the increases in raw-material prices have not been sufficiently great as to offset the gains resulting from increased volume of output. The price index for raw materials as a whole is even now well below the level of 1935 and 1936 and very much below the level of 1937. Even when account is taken of the high level of wage costs, it does not appear that profit margins are in immediate danger of being snuffed out by high operating costs.

The great need in a period of business buoyancy is to keep the industrial eye fixed upon the second, third, and fourth steps ahead. It should always be borne in mind that an increase in the prices of all those forms of manufactured products which enter into succeeding stages of production appear as costs in each succeeding stage, just as the prices of raw materials appear as costs in the first stage of manufacturing. The process of price advance is cumulative and tends to gain in rapidity as it spreads throughout the entire economic system, and involves wage as well as price advances. Accordingly, if the well-known vicious spiral is to be checked, it must be checked in its early stages.

At the beginning of this address it was stated that the economic goal of the United States at this difficult and uncertain period should be to make a full utilization of our economic resources in expanding production without permitting a general inflation of prices and a destruction of equilibrium. If this national objective be accepted, it follows that advances in industrial prices at this time should be resisted to the utmost. We should be content to make increased profits by a fuller and a steadier utilization of capacity and by ever-increasing efficiency in production.

Similarly, labor policy in this emergency should be focused upon the realization of gains through more and steadier employment instead of upon hourly wage increases. The advances in hourly wages during recent years have not been accompanied by corresponding increases in weekly wages.

On the contrary, weekly and annual wages have on the whole declined. A farsighted labor policy can also contribute much to the maintenance of financial stability.

The only real profits, like the only real wages, are those which arise from increased production. Speculative profits resulting merely from purchasing goods at one price and selling them at an advance are not of a constructive character; that is, they are not backed by tangible goods and services and thus add nothing in primary terms to the wealth of society. Moreover, such profits are in the main illusory, for when utilized in the replenishment of inventories or the construction of new plant and equipment which have also risen in price, a dollar of profits will not go as far as before. Thus the apparent gains are nullified. Meanwhile, thanks to our system of accounting, a substantial portion of these paper profits may be gathered by the tax collector. In any case, such price advances, as our industrial history proves, lead to collapse and depression, the losses of which more than offset any temporary gains that may have been realized.

If all groups in the body politic will work together at this juncture in clear realization of the fundamental requirements of the situation, it will be possible not only for all classes of the American people to receive higher levels of real income, but also for this Nation to maintain financial and economic stability, and thereby make its most effective contribution to the eventual restoration of economic stability and progress in the world as a whole.

The Arms Embargo

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY FORMER PRESIDENT HOOVER

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered recently by former President Hoover:

The question of whether we repeal or do not repeal the embargo has produced a conflict among our people that is growing in bitterness, when we should have national unity in our relations abroad.

Then days ago I made a proposal of a substitute to either repeal or no repeal. I proposed that in what we do we seek for a firm basis in broad humanity rather than among the quicksands of international politics.

I did not insist that this substitute answers every argument on either side of this question. But it suggested new ground upon which dangers could be avoided and extremes lessened.

That proposal was specific: That we on one hand prohibit the sale of the weapons used to terrorize and attack civilians, that is bombing planes, their ammunition, poison gas, and submarines. And on the other hand, that we sell the instruments which can be used to defend civilian populations against such attacks. That is pursuit planes, light observation planes, anti-aircraft guns, their ammunition, and any other instruments that can be used to protect open cities and women and children. And I proposed that for the present we limit our arms business right there. This war is only 50 days old. The forces moving in the world will continue to shift violently. And Congress is always nearby.

Tonight I shall give the reasons for this proposal. But I wish especially to protest the sale from the United States of poison gas and bombing planes and submarines under any form of legislation.

TWO KINDS OF WAR

A revolution has taken place in war itself. War now consists, on the one hand, of war on fighting men and, on the other hand, war on civilians, which includes women and children. This revolution in method is so far reaching and so conclusive that only those who refuse to face facts fail to recognize its import.

By threats of superior bombing fleets to destroy open cities and to kill hundreds of thousands of women and children, nations are being intimidated into sacrifice of their independence without a chance. And it is not only threats. Where people have refused to surrender their independence we have seen this holocaust of terror let loose. In China, in Spain, in Ethiopia, and in Poland literally hundreds of thousands of non-fighting men, women, and children have been massacred.

Before I proceed I wish to clear up a misimpression as to this proposal. I have not proposed that we divide every kind of weapon used in war into defensive weapons and offensive weapons, nor that we embargo such offensive weapons and sell such defensive weapons on that basis. What I have proposed is to limit our basis of action, first, to that part of war carried on against civilians and, second, that we confine our action to certain specific weapons which I have named.

I mention this because some of the writers upon this proposal are under a misimpression that I have proposed to cover all kinds of war weapons. That wider field was indeed proposed by myself in 1932 and by Mr. Roosevelt in 1933. Starting from this misimpression, these writers have lost themselves in a maze of discussion as to what, where, and when a weapon is aggressive and when it is defensive.

Whether different weapons can be used for either benevolent or malevolent purposes between fighting men is not what we are discussing. The distinctions are not so difficult.

Every child in Europe knows its destruction comes from bombing planes and poison gas. Equally every child knows that pursuit planes, observation planes, searchlights, antiaircraft guns, and gas masks are its defense. Every child in Europe can tell these weapons apart.

Moreover, I can give some information on what soldiers themselves have thought of these distinctions. When I proposed to the World Disarmament Conference in 1932 that certain weapons should be abolished in war, the American General Staff, whom I naturally consulted, informed me that so far as a distinction between weapons devoted mostly to attack on civilians and weapons devoted mostly to their defense was concerned, it was a feasible and practical distinction.

Later on, when the proposal was submitted to the technical committee of the World Disarmament Conference, that body, representing the general staffs of the entire world, also agreed that the distinctions were entirely possible and practicable. Later on in 1933, when Mr. Roosevelt again proposed these ideas, I must assume he did so with the approval of the American General Staff. But I am not now arguing what will be best for war in general. I am discussing war on women, children, and nonfighting men.

OUR STAND AGAINST WARS ON WOMEN, CHILDREN, AND NONFIGHTING MEN

First. My first reason for this proposal is that the time has come for America to take a clear and explicit stand upon these wars against civilians.

There was a time when armed men stood up and, like men, fought with other armed men for their obligations and their countries. When they were killed, they were killed in a fight in which they had a chance.

This bombing from the air and use of poison gas on civilians means that the world has gone back to savagery, where armed men killed women and children and burned cities. It is one thing for men to stand up in battle to defend their faith. It is another thing to sneak around behind and kill unarmed men, women, and children and destroy their homes. That is not the work of brave men. Chivalry is certainly dying in our world.

It is, of course, contended that the purpose of bombing planes is to destroy the enemy's industrial works and his air fields. Not even a simple mind can go over the history of the last 5 years and have any such an idea. It is nonsense to say that this is their sole purpose. And if that were so, why do we today see every city in the war countries of Europe blacked-out at night? Why do we see millions of children separated from their mothers and evacuated? Why is every child carrying a gas mask strapped over its shoulder? These children know too well what bombing planes and poison gas will be used for.

The question then we have to ask ourselves is: Shall we sell instruments which can and will be used for wholesale attack on open cities? Likewise, are we prepared to withhold the sale of instruments by which women and children can be protected?

Certainly whatever else may be done about the embargo, America should not sell bombing planes, their bombs, poison gas, or submarines.

Second. My second reason is, that we should make the use of these weapons of attack as little successful as possible. I would, therefore, have America sell freely the weapons to protect open cities and women and children from barbaric attacks of this kind. If, by the grace of God, it could be proved by these defense weapons that attacks on women and children are a futile operation, the world would be saved infinite calamity.

It would do much to protect the independence of nations from gangster governments.

MORALS AND HUMANITY

Third. My third reason for this proposal is that such wars on women, children, and nonfighting men are immoral and inhumane.

There are such things in the world as moral and humane standards, despite all the dialecticians to the contrary. I confess at times that it seems of little avail to raise these banners aloft, but unless they be raised, unless there be some check on this world degeneration, there will be nothing left of this civilization. After all, whatever our scientific discovery and inventions may produce, those things will vanish in rust unless they be supported by standards of moral conduct.

During the great war I went through several air raids. They were puny affairs then compared to these days. But I saw the terror of women and children, rushing to the cellars frantically to escape from an unseen enemy. I saw the indelible impression made upon the minds of children by these terrors. I saw the destroyed homes and I saw the innocent dead in the streets.

I cannot bring myself to believe that the United States should ever sell this kind of weapons to anybody at any time anywhere. I have no sympathy with the killing of women and children of any race, no matter what the ultimate objective may be.

I have said before I do not like to think of the day when bombing planes, engaged in the killing of women and children, on both or either side in this war, will be identified as the product of American industry.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE HITHERTO

Fourth. My fourth reason is that I do not want to see the American people abandon, even by implication, an attitude held consistently by them for over 20 years.

Ever since the Great War we have protested, negotiated, and demanded that war shall not be made upon civilians. We have said time and again that bombardment from the air of unarmed men, women, and children is wicked in the sight of God and man. We have said that to shower poison gas upon them is unspeakable. We have grown indignant and threatening to other nations about it. Year after year our press, our public men, our Congress, and our Government have denounced these acts.

In the years of 1919, 1921, 1922, 1925, 1932, 1933, and even 1939 we have proposed to other nations that they must be stopped. We have proposed several times that these weapons should be abolished. We were supported by a great majority of the nations in 1932. Secretary Hull as late as a year ago indicated to our manufacturers that they should not sell bombing planes to Japan. And today we propose to pass laws authorizing such sales. There are here no dual moral standards, one for us and one for our neighbors. There is here a question not of formalistic exactitude but of moral purpose. We have tried time and again to suppress these weapons by international agreement. There is no hope of such international action between nations that are now at war.

The American people, true to their own faith and their own morals, their own civilization, based upon humanity, should refuse to sell such weapons. We are proved hypocrites out of our own mouths if we sell bombing planes or poison gas.

And we in effect condone the practices which we ourselves have condemned.

NEUTRALITY

Fifth. My fifth reason is that this proposal avoids the major charge of unneutral action.

The advocates of retention of the embargo assert that if it is repealed we are turning American industry into an arsenal for the benefit of one side.

The advocates of repeal are convinced that if the embargo is not repealed we are arbitrarily favoring Germany by depriving Great Britain and France of weapons.

It must not be forgotten that under the present law we can sell bombing planes, poison gas, and submarines to Japan, Russia, and Italy, who can indirectly transfer them to Germany or use them against civilians themselves. Under repeal Germany can buy them and use them against France and England.

The proposal I have made shifts our whole basis of action away from both horns of this dilemma of repeal or no repeal.

In supplying pursuit planes, observation planes, antiaircraft guns, and any other such instruments we help the British and French to save their cities, to save their sources of supplies, and their women and children. That today is their greatest danger. And likewise it protects German women and children, their cities, and their sources of supplies from bombing by planes of our manufacture. If it is not the intention of either the British and French or the Germans to so use these weapons against civilians and homes, then neither of them can complain of our refusing to sell to them, and neither side can complain of our sale of defensive arms against them. There can be no substantial claim of unneutral action.

THE EFFECT UPON OUR ECONOMIC SYSTEM

Sixth. My sixth reason is that this proposal avoids the more extreme economic dangers of repeal or no repeal.

Those advocating that we hold the embargo on all arms and instruments of war assert that the repeal will inflate American industry; that it will create large profits out of war for a few individuals; that unemployment will be increased by the bursting of the arms bubble; that the workers will be the sufferers; and it is significant that organized American industry takes this view also.

Those who would repeal the embargo assert that we would benefit in our own preparedness by this increase in arms-manufacturing capacity at foreigners' expense. That it would give profits to business and jobs to many of our present unemployed.

Both of these conclusions are true. I do not believe either of them contains elements of complete goodness.

The program I have proposed will not create either of these extremes. We would not be building up an excessive munitions industry. We would give some employment; we would create some preparedness capacity for defense of our own women and children.

NATIONAL UNITY

Seventh. The seventh reason for this proposal of a substitute for repeal or no repeal of the embargo is to find on this or on some other basis more unity in our own people. I have said this conflict has begun to take on a bitterness that threatens our national solidarity in face of dangers. Patriotic men and great groups whose sole purpose is American interest are being denounced as pro-Hitler or pro-British, when in fact they are pro-American. Gradually we are dividing into two camps over a question that is after all very secondary to the dominant question of keeping America out of this war.

CONCLUSION

Like all Americans, I resent violently the ravishing of Czechoslovakia and Poland by Hitler. Equally I resent the ravishing of Poland and the Baltic States by Stalin. I do not attribute these actions to the great body of either the German or the Russian people.

My sympathies are with the Allies. Nevertheless, my deepest conviction is that America must keep out of this war, and it is in the interest of the whole world if we are to be of any help to rebuild this civilization when the war is over.

The most difficult job we have in these months before us is to remain at peace. Keeping out of war is only in small part either legal formulas or laws. It is a matter of our resolute national will to keep out, and our will is determined not by our emotions and sympathies but by our reason.

If we fail to hold to peace it means the loss of millions of our sons. It means America is for all time deprived of the blessings that their energies and their minds would have brought to us. It means a large part of our people are condemned for another quarter of a century to be unemployed and impoverished. It means we shall accept immediate dictatorship to fight the war. It means we shall remain a dictatorship for a generation afterward if not forever. The hope of happiness and achievement in America will have been extinguished.

In conclusion, I submit the course I have recommended avoids many international dangers. Above all it contributes something constructive to the world by way of humanity and moral standards.

I am protesting that, whatever be done in this legislation, America shall neither be a party to the killing of women, children, and nonfighting men nor the destruction of their homes. And equally that it shall not be a party to depriving them of the primary arms of their defense.

I am interested in America holding to moral foundations in these times when civilization itself is rocking. I am asking America by action and not by words alone to hold to her standards. I do not believe my voice will be alone.

Missouri River Follies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE KANSAS CITY JOURNAL

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I quote a letter dated September 18, 1939, to a shipper from the general agent, Inland Waterways Corporation, operating the Federal Barge Lines, as follows:

Due to the low stage of water in the Missouri River, we are encountering considerable difficulty in the movement of our tows.

Would therefore suggest for your own protection, until such time as the river improves, that you discontinue use of our service through Kansas City.

We are not in a position at this time to indicate when this condition may change, as considerable rain must fall in the upper stretches of the Missouri before we will have any improvement.

It is evident from the following editorial which appeared in the Kansas City Journal of October 20, 1939, that the general agent of the corporation was not too pessimistic:

[From the Kansas City Journal of October 20, 1939]

MISSOURI RIVER FOLLIES

Three loaded barges of the Inland Waterways Corporation are stranded on a sandbar in the Missouri River near Jefferson City. Perspiring stevedores are transferring the cargoes of wheat and merchandise to railroad cars, a necessary step if delivery is to be made before next spring.

The stranded barges are visual evidence of the folly of spending millions on the Missouri in a hopeless attempt to make it navigable. They cannot be ignored by the Mississippi Valley Association, which this week renewed its stand for a 9-foot channel from Sioux City to the mouth.

The association and other waterways evangelists have an answer. When the Fort Peck Dam is completed, they say, sufficient impounded water can be released to keep the channel navigable.

We are told that it is as simple as falling off a log. When dry weather lowers the Missouri, an engineer at Fort Peck will open a valve and release impounded water into the channel. Taking into account water lost by evaporation and seepage into the dry river bed, enough will eventually reach Kansas City—1,400 miles distant—to keep barges off the sandbars. Or so the theory goes. It may work, but it recalls "Fatty" Arbuckle's trick of attempting to extinguish a burning house with a tin cup.

That isn't the half of it. The Fort Peck Dam itself is a monumental piece of foolishness, authorized on pressure from waterways advocates.

It is being built for the double purpose of generating electrical energy and of stabilizing the Missouri's channel. As for electricity, the dam will provide an abundance of power for a Montana area populated mostly by groundhogs and coyotes. As for the Missouri River, $84,000,000, the cost of the dam, is not a bargain price for keeping barges off sandbars at Jefferson City, especially when the Government has spent an average of $197,722 a mile for channel stabilization between Kansas City and St. Louis.

The farce should be ended at once by permanently suspending the Missouri operations of the subsidized Inland Waterways Corporation and confining river work to scientific flood control. In these troubled times a little humor now and then is welcome, but in the case of river navigation the comedy comes at too high a price.

Law Enforcement in a Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

ADDRESS OF J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, before the annual New York Herald Tribune Forum, October 24, 1939, New York City:

Of supreme importance at the moment is the necessity of protecting all phases of American life and traditions. Every nation's history is marked by periods of unusual stress. At this time, when the ominous clouds of strife hang heavy over distant lands, the thunder of their wars awakens us to the possibility of threats to our own America. There has never before been the need that now exists to seek the truth and to recognize the facts as they are. While other peoples are regimented and assembled to hear the pronouncements of government, we gather to seek the truth without the crushing hand of dictatorships directing our deliberations, or determining in advance what shall or shall not be said.

Upon us of this generation has fallen the responsibility to defend the cherished principles of Americanism. There are times, to be sure, when the cost of peace is too great to endure. No price in peace or war, however, can be put upon our American heritage. Its maintenance means the preservation of life and liberty itself. The internal security of a peaceful nation today is at stake.

As in the days of the early pioneers, the call goes out to the enlightened and courageous spirit of American womanhood to enlist her intelligent aid in the solution of our present-day problems. The home still remains supreme as the basis of our social order. The very forces that attack the home attack the Nation, which is the aggregate of all our homes.

The American home—presided over by you women of America—holds the key to many of our most perplexing problems. In preserving the security of the home, we safeguard the security of the Nation. The time has come to erect defensive walls to protect our homes and our body politic from the insidious and malignant germs of foreign "isms" and the subversive forces of lawlessness. That is the task of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and American law enforcement, aided by every loyal American citizen.

We must unite to resist the insidious propaganda designed to foment unrest and bring about the destruction of our national ideals. There was a time when America was proudly known as a melting pot, in which all peoples living within our shores were fused into truly American citizens, whose hearts and minds were wholly centered upon the future of this land. These citizens in turn were guaranteed all the benefits, the securities, and the opportunities that the Revolutionary patriots fought and died for, in winning our highly prized independence. In recent years, something has happened to that melting pot. It is unfortunate but true that there has come into being a subsurface element, shifty, malicious, and dishonest, which with wanton effrontery seeks to turn a great melting pot into a catch-all for the things that could never fuse with our ideals.

Our generation has had greater advantages, even in the depths of our depression, than were ever known by those whose alien ways of living, whose foreign "isms" have slowly but gradually filtered into our land. Despite the freedom, the liberties, and the opportunities guaranteed to all within our midst, there are those who have betrayed America by chiseling at the foundations of this great edifice of freedom. The foes within our gates, like termites, have sought by every scheming means to inculcate their alien ideas into our social order, fouling our cradle of liberty.

There is no place in our land for the pinkish "fellow traveler," for the regimenter, or the blustering type of martinet who, steeped in the bloody-handed egotism of gangster conquest, seeks to make us all goosestep and salute before him. This is a time when we must think straight and not be misled by the exotic and Utopian pratings of those whose allegiance is pledged abroad.

A good citizen must be on guard against subversion in all its forms. Call it communism, fascism, or what you will—it is un-American. Our patriotism can best be judged by our diligence in protecting American ideals from the rapists of justice and common decency. To stem the insidious machinations of such enemies, to thwart their plans, to preserve our traditions and ideals, is a sacred and supreme task. Here is a battle between priceless God-fearing principles on the one hand and pagan ideals and godlessness on the other. Principles and not men must prevail. Democracy is totally alien in deed and thought to the tactics of ruthless racketeering dictators. Yet that is what these festering foreign "isms" stand for, while they insult our intelligence and blaspheme Americanism by calling communism "Twentieth Century Democracy." What a travesty!

Evil forces in America today seek to undermine law and order. Naturally, these forces do not operate in the open. Evil does not seek the light. It assumes the garments; it adopts the slogans; it hides behind the banners of democracy. These evil, subversive forces menace freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom to worship in every village, town, and city in the land. And they go further, in actually seeking to move into position where they might cripple the vital instruments of our national defense through sabotage.

Fortunate, indeed, is the rising tide of patriotism on the part of so many of our citizens. It is indeed heartening to those of us in the Federal Bureau of Investigation and American law enforcement, who are charged with the duty of protecting American people, not only from the onslaughts of criminals, but from the devious machinations of those who reflect in their pernicious activities the desires of enemy modes of thought and action. This battle cannot be successfully waged until our citizens recognize the dangers that confront us.

Every hour of the day must be devoted to the support of law and order. Dedication to this effort is true Americanism. You can help by being ever alert in order that any suspected act of sabotage, espionage, or neutrality violation, designed to undermine internal defense, can be called to the attention of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Every sincere and earnest American should consider himself an integral part of law and order in this war against the enemies of democracy. This cooperation should be limited, however, to passing on to the proper officials all questionable facts or rumors which may come one's way. But our efforts must not develop into a witch hunt. Bands of vigilantes, no matter in what manner they act, or what high ideals they may proclaim, are un-American, unpatriotic, and subversive of the very things the Nation now has the most need of preserving. To successfully cope with the spy demands intelligence, good judgment, and, above all, justice and calmness in meeting every situation.

The present task of law enforcement—the battle against alien-minded mongrels and against criminals—is of the same kind and type. A law-abiding nation is a peaceful nation. Only a law-abiding nation can survive. The F. B. I. is receiving complaints of espionage, sabotage, and neutrality violations at the rate of approximately 214 a day. In addition, every 24 hours 4,000 major crimes are committed in these United States. Every 24 hours there are committed in our land an average of 33 murders, 160 robberies, 800 burglaries, 2,200 larcenies, and 120 aggravated assaults. This does not include the 36,000 lesser infractions that occur daily.

An immense threat lies in America's crime army of 4,750,000 persons who have exhibited their lawlessness. It cannot be denied that a certain lack of patriotism exists in the craven make-up of anyone who deliberately and maliciously violates our laws. Spydom, you can be sure, will find the ranks of lawlessness fertile grounds for recruiting traitors and Benedict Arnolds. To the lawless, America means only a place in which to rob, to thieve, to destroy, and plunder. Therefore, in these troubled days, when you strengthen the hand of law enforcement, you add power to the muscles of liberty and safeguard our greatest bulwark of peace, the barricades of neutrality.

I am happy to advise you today that every possible precaution is being taken to prepare us to meet any emergency which may arise. The foundations have been laid; the walls have been erected. Trained and competent men of law enforcement spot the land. America's "West Point of law enforcement," the F. B. I. National Police Academy, has already graduated a national faculty of over 400 police instructors. Competent and highly trained, these representatives of law enforcement are located in every State of the Union.

They constitute a reserve force for the F. B. I. Beyond that, most of them are engaged in police training in their home communities. They are the men upon whom our people can justly depend for protection. Unfortunately, the citizens in some communities have not been fully alert to the availability of these men, otherwise some of them would not have been the victims of petty jealousies and corrupt political machinations, which have prevented them from initiating local police-training programs so necessary for improved scientific crime detection and our internal defense. The duties which law enforcement now must assume are such that these officers must have the support of all civic-spirited citizens in order that once and for all this great body of public servants may be freed from the stifling influences of greedy and corrupt political domination.

Our national defense demands well-equipped and well-trained army and naval forces. Our internal security demands the best in law enforcement, with adequate facilities and equipment manned by public servants of the highest degree of character and intelligence. And greater yet, these men of law enforcement must be backed by an unflinching bulwark of determined citizens, consecrated to holding high the banners of law and order.

Every father and mother in the land must train their children in decency, honesty, and the sacredness of citizenship. There must be a reaffirmation of the sanctity of the home and greater diligence in the discharge of family responsibility. There must be reestablished in American youth a respect for lawful authority and truly American traditions. This must be done in the home which still controls the educational system in our democratic order. We need a rededication of old-fashioned discipline and less experimentation with unsound theories and unholy philosophies.

The fact that some Americans lack moral fortitude does not mean that the church has failed; on the contrary, it has not been given a chance. What we need today is a return to the principles of decency and honesty and charity among men. What we need is an inculcation of the immortal lessons of the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount in the hearts and minds of all Americans. This is the surest antidote to stem the rising tide of lawlessness. It is indeed a national disgrace that 12 percent of all murderers, 29 percent of all robbers, 33 percent of all thieves, 46 percent of all burglars, and 54 percent of all automobile thieves are under voting age.

In solving the crime problem and in insuring internal defense, there can be no greater motivating force than the women of America who can demand and insist that the profession of law enforcement be placed upon a high plane of efficiency, honesty, and integrity in every community in America, free from the lecherous barnacles of venal politics. This would accelerate public consciousness to meet the crisis of today, embodying as it does a conflict between Americanism and alien ways of thinking and living, which threaten our peace and security and everything basically American.

Let us resolve, here and now, to enlist our time, our energy, our spirit, and our prayers in the preservation of our American heritage. Let America defend itself first from within. No American could have a greater ambition than the consummation of this worthy task. It would spell doom to the spies and termites within our midst.

Conscription of Wealth in Times of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL E. MAPES

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FOREST A. HARNESS, OF INDIANA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks of Hon. FOREST A. HARNESS upon the conscription of wealth in times of war or the imminence of war, as proposed by the Lee bill, S. 1650, delivered during the National Forum of the Air, a feature program of the Mutual Broadcasting Co., Sunday evening, October 22, 1939:

At the outset I want to stress the fact that I, fully as much as any of the proponents of this legislation, want to insure that America's productive capacity shall share with America's manpower the burdens and losses of any future war. In fact, having served in the front line as a soldier in the last war, for 20 years I have actively and consistently supported the theory of universal service, which would drastically reduce, if not entirely eliminate, the profits of war.

Proponents who say that this measure promotes peace because it takes the profits out of war are arguing upon an amazing fallacy. I see nothing in the bill which says that a man working in comparative security in a munitions factory or a shipyard may not earn $15 to $25 a day while his brother faces the hardships and dangers of active service at the front for a dollar a day. I find nothing to prevent the factory, which, by some miracle is able to survive this proposed capital levy, from amassing fabulous profits while America's young manhood is sacrificed on the battlefields.

This is not a conscription of profits and productive capacity by any stretch of the imagination. It is simply a drastic capital levy which would demoralize productive capacity and destroy the American system of free enterprise at a single stroke.

The Senator from Oklahoma must have foreseen the fact that this measure in no sense touches profits, for in his report of this measure, it says at page 9—I quote:

"There is a provision in the bill that the Government may pay these bonds at its discretion any time it has the money. Therefore, by passing a war-profits tax bill and using the money thus collected from war profits to retire these bonds, it is likely that they would be paid off before maturity."

The thinking of the gentlemen who wrote that report, and who support this proposal is, to say the least, bizarre.

Senator BRIDGES has quite ably demonstrated the fact that the terrific impact upon the American economy resulting from the application of this proposal would inevitably result in the most drastic deflation. But let's look at an individual example or two:

An average progressive Indiana farmer with 160 acres of land may have gross wealth of twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars. Deducting indebtedness, he may have a net wealth of $15,000, which is subject to a levy, or "forced loan" if you please, of $950. Not one Indiana farmer in a thousand has $950 cash on hand, so he must market stored crops or livestock within a specified time to acquire his bonds. But the same thing is happening to millions of other farmers in the country. Result: Markets are glutted and prices collapse. With his crops and livestock unmarketable, then, he has only one other recourse. He must sell part of his land. But again, millions of other farmers and home owners are trying to sell land for the same reason—and consequently the market for real estate is destroyed.

Suppose an individual has an appraised net wealth of $25,000, practically all in securities. He is forced to sell some $2,000 of his stocks to accept his forced loan. I don't need to tell you what would happen to our stock market if 10 percent, or even 5 percent of all the $150,000,000,000 in stocks and bonds held in this country was to be dumped on the market within a relatively short period. It is not likely that he could sell his entire holdings for the amount of his levy, and he would then face 5 years in a debtors' prison.

Again, suppose a widow has an insurance estate, the net worth of which is twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars. Suppose that estate comes to her in the form of annuities, legally bound by the terms of the will. Her sole source of income is the twelve or fifteen hundred dollars she receives each year from the estate. How, then, will she meet her obligations to subscribe for some $2,000 worth of these war bonds?

What will happen to the industry that must liquidate from 10 to 75 percent of its net worth? Do you suppose for a minute that it could find a market for its securities? It is fantastic even to hope that it would. It would, of course, have to deposit its note and securities with the Treasury, provided, of course, that the President in his discretion was willing to accept notes in lieu of cash, and contribute a 6-percent penalty in interest.

Those are conditions which would be multiplied literally by the thousands upon the application of this measure. Complete chaos would inevitably follow. But beyond that point, there is still a provision in this measure which is breathtaking in its implications. Section 7 (b) says:

"Whoever shall fail to purchase the amount of bonds which he is required to purchase under the provisions of this act or shall fail to purchase such bonds within the time prescribed under the provisions of this act shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $100,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both."

Here it is not only proposed to repeat all the worst and most vicious features of administrative law as we have seen them developed and displayed under this present administration. Here, actually, is criminal liability for violation of administrative rulings which have the force and effect of criminal law, such as we saw at its worst under N. R. A. and the triple A's "Hot Potato" law. Here again is the possibility of that device of the Middle Ages—the debtor prison. Under this measure, an American citizen could be "imprisoned not more than 5 years" for his inability to meet his obligation.

This measure would undoubtedly be the boldest step yet proposed away from a government of laws and toward a government of men. The very existence of our system of free enterprise would be in the hands of a single individual. If that individual were inclined toward dictatorship, we could scarcely place in his hands a more effective weapon. In the present grave international crisis, for instance, a President who desired to involve America in war could undoubtedly do so in spite of anything we could do to prevent it. Once involved, and with a law like this in the statutes, he could assume unlimited authority at a stroke.

It would be the end of Democracy as we know it under our Constitution. It would be the surest and most effective means of establishing a dictatorship and destroying capitalism and our free enterprise system.

Keep America Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE PARKERSBURG (W. VA.) NEWS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the lack of democracy in Europe, the diabolical war now raging there, our thousands of war dead, our crippled soldiers, and billions of dollars in war debts still unpaid tell us stronger than words that our idealistic efforts 22 years ago were in vain and that we should stay out of the present war. No doubt those who want us to get into the European conflagration will stamp us and ridicule us as cowardly. They will appeal to our sympathies by strong emotional tales of oppression and war horrors. Propaganda will be unloosed, as it was during the last war, in order to sway public opinion in America. Atrocity stories will gain credence even though they are manufactured in the propaganda laboratories of foreign belligerent powers. We know that tall tales were printed in the American newspapers during the last war which told us that French civilians had had their ears and tongues cut off and that women and children were inhumanly treated. Arguments will again be raised to have America enter the war for humanity's sake or to stop foreign ideologies. Americans must guard themselves against this vicious propaganda, and they must actively and energetically participate in a campaign to keep this country at peace. They must talk to their relatives and talk to their friends with firm conviction and tell them to maintain a peace attitude in spite of those incidents which might arise and bring about the cry for war. They must lay emphasis on the fact that they can stay out, that they should stay out and that they must stay out of war. It is up to Congress to devise constructive measures to keep this country out of war. The people are anxiously praying that Congress at this special session take no step that might lead to war, just as they hoped and prayed last June when the House considered the neutrality bill. Permit me to incorporate at this point in my remarks an article which appeared in the Parkersburg News of West Virginia on September 19, 1939.

[From the Parkersburg (W. Va.) News of September 19, 1939]

"OUR FATE IS IN YOUR HANDS" IS PLEA TO CONGRESS THEME—REPRESENTATIVE THILL SOUNDED SENTIMENTS OF MAJORITY IN READING POEM TO LAST CONGRESS

(By Charles Brooks Smith)

WASHINGTON, September 18.—The eyes of the Nation are anxiously focussed on the doors of Congress which are about to swing open for an extraordinary special session. Upon the outcome of the proceedings so soon to begin, mass opinion holds the answer to, "Shall we have peace or shall we have war?" That this is the fact, who would dispute?

In sum, what the American people are saying to Congress is, "Our fate is in your hands." And so it is. At this critical hour, the climax is in the keeping of Congress, to make what disposition of it a majority will decide is for the best to keep the United States out of the European war with its diplomatic mess of double-crossing, lies, pressure politics, and all other collaterals and sidelines to be imagined and assembled in a world dominated by Machiavelism and frenzied from a Macaber orgy featuring the dance of death.

PRAY FOR WISDOM

The Chaplains in their respective Houses will, at the opening, pray for wisdom and strength and Divine guidance for Senators and Representatives. And, of course, for the President and "all in authority." While everywhere throughout this land millions of "unknown men and humble women" will feel a prayer within them struggling for expression, which most of them will be helpless to give. Yet they know, and will feel relieved, reassured, consoled by the faith which is theirs, that their inarticulate prayers will be heard as though spoken.

These are the people of whom President Woodrow Wilson spoke, in an address June 13, 1916:

"I get a great many letters, my fellow citizens, from important and influential men in this country; but I get a great many other letters. I get letters from unknown men, from humble women, from people whose names have never been heard and will never be recorded, and there is but one prayer in all of those letters: 'Mr. President, do not allow anybody to persuade you that the people of this country want war with anybody.' "

DON'T WANT IT NOW

Short of a year "unknown men and humble women" got that which they did not want. They just as earnestly do not want it now. They are looking today to the 531 men and women of Congress for the answer—more than to any other. Do you doubt it?

Came another June 30th, 23 years later—1939. The National House of Representatives was in session. A period of enforced limited debate had been reached. A roll call was near on the Bloom misnamed neutrality bill. Quiet and solemnity were settling in over the historic scene.

And the voice of the last to speak was heard "in conclusion." It was the voice of one LEWIS D. THILL, of Wisconsin, a Member in his first term, "fresh from the people," intoning:

Our Father who art above,
Instill in our hearts a greater love,
For the glorious liberties we have today,
Before it's too late and they're taken away.

Continue to give us our daily bread,
And grant us the power to keep our head
When radicals rave of their favorite "ism,"
With which they'd displace our Americanism.

Forgive us for meddling in foreign affairs;
Teach us to mind our own business, not theirs;
To 'tend to our problems, and ours alone;
To better conditions right here at home.

Lead us not into war with the modern-day Neroes,
That would cost the lives of American heroes,
And wipe out democracy, or worse still,
Subject us all to a dictator's will.

Deliver us, our Father, who art above,
From the loss of these rights we cherish and love,
So that each night when we kneel and pray,
We can say, "Thank God for the U. S. A."

Yes, we knew that by all the canons and meters this wasn't poetry, but under the emotional spell of this solemn scene, we thought it to be the loveliest prayer-poem we'd ever heard. We heard in it the beat of the heart of "unknown men and humble women." Through it we caught the spirit and the soul of the common people.

"Let me read a poem, written by one of my constituents, which I feel we should adopt as a prayer tonight," THILL was saying. And we saw a picture of a toil-scarred man in a dim light, at a battered table, a cheap writing pad before him, a stub of a pencil—a poet of the common people—struggling to put down in rhyme a prayer which suffused and thrilled his very being, and filled his eyes with a light that was never seen on land or sea!

Proposed Special Committee to Investigate Emergency Powers of the Chief Executive

OF

HON. JOHN McDOWELL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial recently published in the New York Herald Tribune:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

LEGITIMATE CURIOSITY

Much dangerous nonsense is likely to characterize the efforts of Congressmen from time to time to "curb the President's war powers." However critical this newspaper has been of Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal, it has always opposed, and will continue to oppose, the tendency at the Capitol to hamper and hamstring the Executive through rigid legislation in its conduct of our foreign affairs. Especially in the situation created by the war in Europe, with its unforeseen emergencies calling for quick decisions, does it seem to us the height of folly to tie the President's hands in advance. His constitutional authority in the circumstances should be preserved intact.

On the other hand, it seems equally important that Congress should follow with a watchful eye his use of this authority, and to this end we welcome the proposal by Representative MCDOWELL, of Pennsylvania, that the House appoint a special committee to investigate, tabulate, and report the emergency powers possessed by the Chief Executive under various existing laws. Scattered throughout the statute books are something like a hundred laws containing clauses which authorize the President to depart from the letter of their mandates when in his opinion a national emergency exists. Attention was called to them on the occasion of his recent proclamation of a "limited" emergency and his exercise of a few of his milder emergency powers. He made plain at the time that it was his intention to use such authority as sparingly as possible and only as conditions clearly demanded it. But it seems a sensible precaution that Congress should familiarize itself in detail with these laws and not be caught off guard when and if their emergency clauses are invoked.

Mr. MCDOWELL told the House Members, whom he circularized in behalf of his resolution, that Attorney General Murphy had declined to make a similar tabulation and report to the Senate. Perhaps he considered the job too much of a chore, but in any case his refusal sounds both churlish and short-sighted. It augurs no mistrust of the Executive for our lawmakers to want to check up on their commitments to him.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE B. CROWE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the debate and discussion on the proposed Neutrality Act at both ends of the Capitol have been very interesting. Many of the statements that have been made by Members of Congress are statements that almost everybody agree to.

First. In my opinion there is not a Member of Congress who does not desire wholeheartedly to keep out of war. That is true on both sides of the aisle and both branches of Congress. Personally, I am genuinely and sincerely opposed to our entry into any foreign war. I am sincere and honest in my convictions. I grant to every other Member of the House and to every Member of the Senate their right to decide which way they shall vote on this most important matter.

Second. Every Member of Congress knows of the horrors of war. All are agreed upon that. It is not alone the late wars that are wars of horror. Wars back in Bible times were vicious. Heartless rulers had the innocent and helpless murdered the same as they did the soldiers in combat. Wars from Genghis Khan, Frederick the Great, through all the so-called "greats" of Europe, on through the reign of Napoleon and the late World War, have been hideous and horrid. General Sherman said, "War is hell." We all know that, so we might well leave both the above premises out and discuss briefly the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Which will best serve to keep us out of war? Let American ships go into combat zones and into the ports of belligerents or not permit our ships to go into combat zones and into belligerent ports. The answer, "Keeping them out of combat zones and away from belligerent ports" is by far most likely to keep us out of war. Combat areas, section 3, of the Neutrality Act, is plain and conclusive. I quote:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a), and he shall thereafter find that the protection of citizens of the United States so requires, he shall, by proclamation, define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area.

The seizure of the City of Flint by a German naval vessel is enough to convince everyone of the dangers under our present law. That ship did not appear to carry guns nor munitions of war. The list included lard, cereals, canned meats, flour, canned goods, apples, wax, lubricating oil, cotton, sewing machines, plows, tractors, asphalt, pitch, grease, shade rollers, machinery, silk, commercial chemicals, abrasive grains, disinfectants, feathers, rags, coffee, lumber, gauze, hair, and wallboard.

The war, mind you, in Europe is not well under way. Had the struggle been more intense and more devastating, something might have happened in this case, which would have inflamed the Nation. Certainly we cannot call the items carried on this ship munitions of war except that, as a matter of fact, I know of nothing which any ship could take to a belligerent which would not be necessary to any and all belligerent nations. Armies do not depend alone on guns and munitions by any manner of means. Soldiers wear caps, clothes, and shoes. They eat foods the same as civilians. Belligerents use wheat, bacon, and lard. Cotton is used in the manufacture of some munitions. Gasoline and oils are just as important in modern warfare as are airplanes and bombers. These statements cannot be controverted. Accordingly, the matter resolves itself into which is the best way to pursue to keep the United States out of war. Accordingly, in my opinion, the best way to keep us from engaging in this conflict is the present neutrality proposal of cash and carry; pay for the merchandise, take title to it, and carry it away in their own ships.

Dr. Gallup Will Ask Another Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

LETTER FROM DR. GEORGE GALLUP AND REPLY OF HON. KARL MUNDT, OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, a number of days ago I inserted in the RECORD a copy of my letter to Dr. George Gallup, calling to his attention what I considered some serious and significant fallacies in the conclusions which the Institute of Public Opinion based on the statistics reported in their release of October 11 in the Washington Post and other daily newspapers. This letter to Dr. Gallup appears in the Appendix of the RECORD, pages 285 and 286, and at the time I inserted it in the RECORD I stated I would be glad to do Dr. Gallup the courtesy of placing his reply in the RECORD so those of my colleagues interested in the facts and fallacies of polls of public opinion and the dangers of error incident thereto would have access to the whole correspondence.

I now have a reply from Dr. Gallup, and under leave granted me by the House I am inserting his letter en toto at the conclusion of these remarks. His letter is self-explanatory and a reading of it will reveal the thoughtfulness with which Dr. Gallup has studied my analysis of his poll of October 11, my criticisms of its questions, and the incompatability of its conclusions with relation to the interrogatories upon which they are based. I appreciate the courteous and receptive nature of Dr. Gallup's reply and trust that he will make available to the Members of this body, before it comes our time to vote on the foreign-policy bill to be sent us by the Senate, the findings which his interviewers discover as to the attitude of the American public on the specific question of whether or not Congress should repeal the existing arms embargo in our neutrality legislation so that nations at war can buy arms, munitions, and implements of war from the United States. I am sure we would all be interested in a scientific analysis of American public opinion on that specific question which to date has not been examined through a straightforward question by any Nation-wide, scientifically conducted poll.

Mr. Speaker, I have just one other observation to make before inserting in the RECORD the letter received from Dr. Gallup and my reply thereto, which is being sent to him today. I call attention to the suggestion made by Dr. Gallup in paragraph five of his letter in which he offers to submit the wording of the question to any committee representing both sides of this issue. Unfortunately, it is, of course, too late to define a new question and conduct interviews on it in time to be of any value to this body in making its decision on the question of repealing the arms embargo. I am therefore pleased that Dr. Gallup has indicated that he has already acted upon the suggestion of my first letter and sent out ballots containing the precise question with which we are to be confronted on this issue; it is possible that we can have a public report of these findings before the issue comes before us for a vote as I feel certain the administration leadership will grant this body full and adequate time to debate the neutrality legislation and in that event it will be from 2 weeks to a month before a vote is taken in the House. I do think, however, that his suggestion of a balanced committee to approve the wording of questions on controversial political or patriotic issues has considerable merit and I commend the suggestion heartily and hope it will be followed in the future as I am positive such a procedure would have prevented the confusing situation presented as a result of the present poll on neutrality legislation. For example, a wording satisfactory to both Senator PITTMAN and Senator BORAH on the problem of neutrality and foreign policy would have produced a clear-cut question upon which Americans could have registered their opinion on what is undoubtedly one of the most far-reaching and thought-provoking problems to be decided by an American Congress in connection with our relationship to foreign nations at war.

There follows the letters of Dr. Gallup and my reply of this date to him.

LETTER FROM DR. GALLUP TO MR. MUNDT

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION,
New York, N. Y.

Representative KARL MUNDT,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MUNDT: I appreciate your constructive suggestions regarding the polls of the American Institute of Public Opinion on the subject of the Neutrality Act, particularly in reference to the wording of the question which we put to voters.

As you know, the institute from the beginning has regarded itself merely as a fact-finding organization functioning in the realm of public opinion. We are very proud of the fact that we have no axes to grind; that we have no interest whatsoever in legislation; or, in fact, in influencing the opinions of the voting public. Our job ends when we have found the facts of public opinion and have reported these facts as impartially as we know how.

We are interested, therefore, in your criticism that the wording of the question reported on October 11 is prejudicial and that the interpretations go beyond the facts.

The question which you suggest, we believe, is not substantially different from the one we are currently asking except in one important respect, namely, that it leaves out the fact that England and France would benefit from the proposed repeal of the embargo provision. It seems to me that since this is an important fact, acknowledged certainly by both sides in the neutrality debate, it is not realistic or accurate to disguise or overlook this point in any question which we put to voters.

This represents our best judgment. However, the institute would be willing to submit this point to any committee representing both sides of this issue which you might like to name, and be guided by its decision.

May I comment briefly on two or three other specific points in your letter:

1. In our survey the expression "change the neutrality law" has been used as a rough equivalent of the more precise "repeal the existing arms embargo," because—at the beginning of the debate, at least—the term "arms embargo" was relatively unfamiliar to many Americans, while "neutrality law" was a very familiar concept.

2. We have also used the less precise expression "war supplies" rather than "arms, munitions, and implements of war," because in tests of the two terms we have found the voters make no real distinction between them, and because "war supplies" is a simpler concept to grasp. In this case, however, I believe that your suggestion has much value, and that the more precise phraseology is preferable to the simpler.

3. You have pointed out that since our question did not contain the words "arms embargo," we are not justified in saying in the text of our report that a majority of voters polled favored repealing the arms embargo. You are quite correct in this detail. Perhaps a more exact statement would be that a majority favored changing the neutrality law so that England and France and other nations could buy war supplies, etc., which means, in effect, substantially the same thing, you will admit.

Now to return to your own suggestion which is: "Do you think Congress should repeal the existing arms embargo in your neutrality legislation so that nations at war could buy arms, munitions, and implements of war from the United States?"

I see no fundamental objection to this question except that "airplanes, tanks, etc.," might be substituted for "implements of war," if that is what is meant by this term. Likewise, I should suggest that the word "the" be substituted for "your" in referring to neutrality legislation, and that the phrase "in the United States" be substituted for "from the United States," because a few persons might erroneously believe that these sales were to be official sales from the United States Government.

Moreover, as I indicated above, I think that this question does not cover the entire issue now being debated. To cover the entire issue, it seems to me, it would be necessary to add at least one additional question:

"If the repeal of the arms embargo would work to the advantage of England and France, as opposed to Germany, would you favor such repeal?"

Certainly an analysis of the facts which we have gathered in recent weeks indicates that the vote on the neutrality issue is not strictly a vote on neutrality. A lot of people frankly admit their reason for wanting repeal of the embargo is to help England and France.

For this reason, we have taken particular pains in the writing of our press releases not in any way to indicate that the vote that we get is a vote on pure neutrality.

Now, to sum up, let me say that the chief point of difference, as I see it, between your views and ours is that we are trying to measure the sum total of opinion favoring the change in the Neutrality Act (for any or all reasons) while you would limit the issue to one concerning neutrality. If I am mistaken in this assumption I shall be very glad to have your views.

I do not know, and I would not want to guess, just what vote we shall get if we put your question to the public; but certainly I see no reason for not trying it out. I am, therefore, planning to put your question, incorporating the suggestions made above, on one of our next ballots, and we shall give you a report of our findings. If, for any reason, you object to these changes, we shall be glad to hear from you.

Again let me say that I am greatly appreciative of your suggestions. The institute is as eager as you to measure opinion free of all bias on this most important issue.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE GALLUP.

LETTER FROM MR. MUNDT TO DR. GALLUP

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., October 25, 1939.

DR. GEORGE GALLUP,
Director, American Institute of Public Opinion,
110 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

MY DEAR DR. GALLUP: I am happy to have your reply to my recent letter with regard to what appeared to me as being certain inaccuracies and fallacies in the relationship of the text and the statistics published in your release of October 11 conveying findings of the Gallup poll. Permit me first of all to express my appreciation for your vindication of my confidence that you would accept my suggestions in the spirit in which they were written.

So that my colleagues may know of your decision to ask your interviewers to sample American opinion on the precise question of lifting the arms embargo as well as be advised of your whole attitude in this matter, I am inserting your letter in the Appendix of the RECORD for this day and date, together with a copy of this reply thereto.

Your categorical statement in paragraph 4 of your letter stating that the question I propose "leaves out the fact that England and France would benefit from the proposed repeal of the embargo provision" is probably correct. However, there are Members of Congress who have argued that this repeal might aid Germany fully as much as her adversaries on the assumption that Italy, Russia, and Japan, as well as other countries, might call for and buy with cash, arms, munitions, and implements of war and resell them to Germany. Others contend that Japan would be the big beneficiary of repeal since it would officially authorize the United States to sell her all the munitions she can pay for and remove her from the shadow of an impending embargo preventing American munitions makers to arm her as extensively as she deems necessary to force the complete capitulation of China. Still other Congressmen and Senators still contend that repeal of the arms embargo would improve the quality of American neutrality and that such is the purpose of repeal rather than to provide an opportunity for openly and admittedly taking sides in the war. I must grant, however, that the members of this last group are gradually dropping this "camouflage of neutrality," and with candor and intellectual honesty are now frankly admitting that repeal is at least intended to aid England and France, as you have so clearly pointed out.

However, since the bulk of the American public still indicates a greater desire for remaining neutral and maintaining American peace than for passing legislation designed to help either side, I feel that a straightforward question on repeal of the arms embargo without any qualifying modifications would produce evidence of maximum helpfulness to Members of Congress. I am therefore highly gratified that your letter states you have already sent out ballots propounding the question I suggested in my letter of October 12, with but very minor changes. Your conformity with this request is a real indication of your sincere desire to find and report facts—let the chips fall where they may.

Since you ask for my comment on the three points of your letter, as enumerated, I am happy to comply with that request.

Point 1. While it may have been true that at the very beginning of the debate many citizens used "change the neutrality law" and "repeal the existing arms embargo" interchangeably, I am sure you now agree this is no longer the case, since "changing the neutrality law" now involves a great many other issues, most of which are practically noncontroversial in nature. The one is a general statement involving many features; the other is a specific question probing the public mind on the specific point in controversy.

Point 2. Your agreement with me that the precise phraseology of "arms, munitions, and implements of war" is preferable to the ambiguous phrase "war supplies" is gratifying and removes this objection which I raised.

Point 3. You also agree with my position that the statements in your release of October 11 relative to America's attitude toward the "arms embargo," when your interrogatory does not anywhere contain the words "arms embargo," is not justified. I am sure that we both regret that these statements were thus erroneously based and have given rise to fallacious quotations from your poll to the effect that it has measured public sentiment on the arms embargo. That damage to clear thinking and sound logic has now been done; the corrective, of course, lies in your early publication of the findings of your interviewers on the precise question of repealing the arms embargo, if you can supply it to us before a vote is taken in the House. It will obviously be impossible to get this information to the public before the Senate votes on this measure.

Your changes to my proposed questions are all entirely agreeable to me, and I believe they are all improvements over my suggested phrasing. Using the words "airplanes, tanks, etc." (to which should be added poison gases, ammunition, guns, and a few other items), is certainly clearer than "implements of war." You make a splendid point in changing "from the United States" to "in the United States." Substituting the word "the" for the word "your" in referring to neutrality legislation also seems desirable. While personally I am not convinced of the wisdom or necessity of asking the secondary question you propose, with its leading implications and its suggestion of unneutrality in the proposed changes, I can see no harm and no great possibility of again invalidating the soundness of findings and conclusions by such a follow-up question. All in all, I think you should get a fair and honest cross section of public opinion on repeal of the arms embargo from the reports of your interviewers on the two questions you advise me they are now asking. I only hope you can make public the results within the next week or so.

Let me say in conclusion I appreciate the cooperative spirit you have manifested in this exchange of correspondence. A fact-finding and fact-reporting service such as yours can render a great service or inflict a great disservice, depending upon the care and candor with which it is conducted. In a great republic such as ours, enjoying the fruits of self-government, the very basis of our success depends upon the distribution of honest information to voters and to their representatives in State and Federal office. I therefore hope you will cling tenaciously to the high ideals which gave your institute its inception and remain ever an agency to report and never to influence the public opinion of America.

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT, M. C.

American Federation of Labor Convention

OF

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT, OF OHIO, OCTOBER 6, 1939

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I deem it an honor and privilege to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the American Federation of Labor convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, on October 6, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens, as a lifelong citizen of Cincinnati, it is a pleasure to welcome the American Federation of Labor convention to the happiest and most American city in the world; at least it was the happiest until the two recent baseball games in New York. It is an honor to be invited to address the largest and most representative gathering of laboring men anywhere in the world. You are, in fact, a great democratic institution. You have no dictators and you take no orders. Each one of your unions is a self-governing institution, and you come here to confer and work out the best solution of your common problems. There may be more dissent and difference of opinion in your organization than in some others, but if there were no dissent or difference of opinion it would mean that there would be no freedom of thought.

I come here from Washington, where the Senate is still debating the proposed amendment of the neutrality bill. During the 2 weeks I have been there I have been tremendously encouraged. I have been encouraged because I feel confident today that we are determined to stay out of the war and that we can stay out of the war. Regardless of the result of this particular debate, the American people are united in their determination that we shall not become involved in European quarrels. That determination is not going to be changed. In the World War there was a desire to stay out, but there was nothing like the positive determination to remain at peace which exists today. The American people have sometimes changed their minds, but it has taken many years to do it, and in the present case the reasons against our becoming involved in the European war are so strong that that point of view will not be changed.

My own position is a simple one: What things as a practical matter will keep us out of war? We were dragged into the World War principally because our ships were sunk and our people drowned. Under present conditions I do not think our ships or people belong in the war zone. The best way to prevent such incidents is to prohibit our ships going to Europe and to limit the travel of our citizens to that which is absolutely essential.

Another element which may create a feeling for war is the extension of credit to England and France, creating a financial interest in their success. Credit extended to Europe at best is likely to inflate artificially our manufactures, resulting in a serious reaction when the war is over. So, from our own economic standpoint, as well as from the point of view of peace, credits should be limited. This is the cash-and-carry plan, and I believe it is the one plan which will tend to reduce the chances of our becoming involved.

People do not seem to realize that the embargo on arms is very limited. In the World War 87 percent of our shipments were of materials other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Foodstuffs and steel, and machine tools and materials for ammunition are being shipped today in American ships through the submarine zone, and are just as likely to be torpedoed as if the ships contained arms. The Germans and the British recognize no distinction between arms and most of the other things which are not forbidden by our embargo. The importance of the shipment of arms has been greatly exaggerated.

As for the arms embargo itself, I have never approved of the policy. I see no difference between shipping arms and shipping the materials with which arms are made. I see no difference between shipping automobiles and shipping airplanes. An arms embargo in time of war helps those countries which have built up a tremendous armament in time of peace. It discriminates against the peaceful countries which have not fully prepared to meet the onslaught of an aggressor. It either discriminates against every little country, or forces it to build up its own munition plants and take all its people away from productive enterprise. Today we can ship arms to Mexico and Japan and Russia and Italy, but we cannot ship arms to Canada and England and France. The importance of the embargo is overestimated. If the embargo is not repealed, airplanes will be made in Canada instead of the United States. Some of the parts and materials will be made in the United States and shipped across the border.

I see no reason why the removal of the embargo tends toward war. The most neutral position for us to take, it seems to me, is to say to all nations: "If you come to this country, pay cash, and take the goods away in your own ships, you may buy in wartime whatever you may buy in peacetime." If this bill is adopted, however, let no foreign nation feel that it indicates any desire on our part to interfere in the outcome of the European war.

We should not let the war excitement divert us from our domestic problems. These problems are just as important as they ever were. In all probability the happiness of the people of this country depends much more on their solution than on the kind of neutrality act which we adopt. The question whether the New Deal has failed in its main purposes must still be decided by the people at the polls in 1940. There are many questions pending before Congress and its committees of vital importance to industry and to labor in the United States.

I wish to discuss today, very briefly, the question of amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, pending before the Committee on Education and Labor, of which I am a member. We have had elaborate hearings, and I doubt if any more complete facts can be gathered by the House committee which is now making its investigation of the Board. My conclusions are formed after hearing some of the testimony and reading the rest.

The National Labor Relations Act marks a great step in the history of labor. I must give credit to your representatives, to Senator WAGNER, and others, who worked out the theory of the law. All parties had long recognized the right of labor to bargain collectively. They had recognized it in theory. Before 1932, I do not know that anyone considered a method by which it might be protected by law. It was a new idea, which all political parties approved when it was proposed. With the protection of the law, many unions have been organized, where before the employers had effectively prevented unionization. The law is responsible for the spread of unions, although it is rather significant that the strongest unions are still those which organized themselves and do not rely entirely on Government support. There must be a natural desire to form a union, and an advantage to its members, or it is likely to fade away. In view of the situation, it is essential that amendments to the act do not weaken, in any way, its basic purpose to insure the right of collective bargaining.

Unfortunately, the administration of the act has been biased and prejudiced. In my own opinion, some of the decisions of the Board have resulted in the grossest perversion of justice which this country has ever seen. In case you think my statement too strong, I would like to read the conclusions which your own leaders have reached. Mr. William Green told the committee: "The act, once hailed as labor's Magna Carta, has been distorted into an instrument of oppression by the partial and biased administration of the present Board. * * * The Board continued on its course of usurping and abusing powers."

Your convention in 1937 adopted resolutions which said: "It is with deep regret that frankness impels us to report to you that the National Labor Relations Board has administered the act contrary to its letter, spirit, and intent, with manifest bias and prejudice against the American Federation of Labor, and in favor of dual and rival organizations."

Judge Padway said: "The Board wouldn't change the rule for us. But when their pet baby, the C. I. O., is in there and is going to be wiped out, the rule is suddenly changed. That is talking as frankly as I can. That is my conclusion of it."

I can say that the statements of your officers in convention are fully borne out by the evidence given to the Committee on Education and Labor. Your officers have been concerned about a distinct prejudice in favor of the C. I. O. against the A. F. of L. There has also been in some cases an intense bias and prejudice against the employer. While you are not so directly concerned, nevertheless, you wish justice to be done; and there is a real danger that continued unequal administration of the act might wipe away the act itself, and the essential rights which it guarantees.

In my opinion, if the act had been impartially administered by a board anxious to encourage unionization, but discourage unnecessary strife, there would be few proposals to amend today. The Board is given such wide power that it could have corrected inequalities in the act itself. But the manner of administration has shown defects to exist which should and can be corrected without affecting the basis of the act. I have not reached complete or definite conclusions as to what the amendments should be, but I can outline my tentative conclusions:

First. There should be a new Board, as you, the A. F. of L., recommended. Whether under the present administration this would result in the appointment of persons less prejudiced than the present Board, I do not know. Therefore it is no all-inclusive remedy for the situation.

Second. I believe that Mr. William Green's suggestion of a complete outlawing of company unions, dominated or controlled by the company, together with a wider latitude to the employer to express his opinion as between other unions, so long as it does not amount to coercion, is a wise amendment. The Board has used the provisions intended to discourage company unions as a weapon against the A. F. of L. It is natural that employers should wish to deal with the more responsible, long-established unions and express some preference for such unions as against those whose history is one of irresponsibility and violence. Yet the slightest expression of opinion has been used as an excuse for invalidating elections and even invalidating contracts with the older union.

The Chairman of the Board told us that if an employer stated to his employees that the organizers of a C. I. O. union were Communists, even though they were Communists, it would amount to a violation of the act, which would invalidate an election if those employees then voted for a more American labor union. Such a policy not only discriminates against the older unions but violates the employer's freedom of speech. How any employer's opinion can result in coercion of a workman voting at a secret-ballot election it is hard to see.

The amendment which you suggest is entirely practical, because it is always easy to distinguish between a company union and a real union. A board which cannot tell the difference between an A. F. of L. union and a company union ought to be dismissed, while men with real labor experience are appointed in their place. The Board has repeatedly abrogated contracts with A. F. of L. unions, contracts made in good faith and entitled to respect.

Third. The right of craft unions to exist, the right of members of the craft to decide whether they wish to join a craft union or be merged in a general plant union should be safeguarded by the act. The Board has repeatedly destroyed craft unions and shown its desire to assist the philosophy which demands their destruction. These unions are the oldest in the country. They recognize the special treatment to which skilled employees are entitled. Their existence is entirely consistent with the unionization of other employees in other unions. They should be protected.

Fourth. The question of elections should be definitely regulated by law. The Board has used its power to call elections at times thought favorable to one union as against another. It has arbitrarily refused to hold elections. It has refused to entertain employer petitions. In my opinion, the Board should be compelled to order an election on the petition of a labor union or an employer, provided that an election has not been too recently held, that there is a reasonable basis to suppose that the men desire a change in the conditions which exist, and that the petition is brought in good faith. While I think the Board should act promptly to fix the date of an election, I would give it power to postpone the election for a considerable period so that all parties would have ample opportunity to present their case to the voters.

The act should also prescribe the form of ballot and require that all unions, other than company unions, be entitled as of right to a place on such ballot.

Fifth. The law should be amended so as to limit the Board's discretion in the matter of evidence and subpenas, which has been so arbitrarily exercised. Anyone should be entitled to subpenas unless obviously sought in bad faith. There should be no secret files containing evidence to which the parties are refused access.

Sixth. In my opinion there should be a separation of the judicial and prosecuting functions of the Board. This has not been recommended by your committee, but it seems to me obvious that a man cannot be a prosecutor and a judge in the same case. However, I do not favor Senator BURKE'S amendment providing that the judicial end of the job be handled by the district courts. I would rather incline to a judicial section in the Department of Labor, similar to the Board of Tax Appeals in the Department of the Treasury, which has worked well. I see no objection to having the same department appoint the judicial board and the prosecuting division, but neither one should be appointed by the other. It seems obvious to me that a man cannot be impartial in a case which he himself has originated, and the prosecution of which his subordinates have prepared.

Seventh. Senator BURKE'S bill provides for various unfair labor practices on the part of employees. I do not agree with the principle of this proposal. The whole purpose of the act is to encourage collective bargaining, and even if there are unfair labor practices on the part of unions, it should not be a cause of action against such unions. On the other hand, it seems unreasonable that men who engage in illegal acts, break union contracts, engage in sit-down strikes in violation of contracts, or perform other illegal acts, should have any right to back pay, or even in some cases to reinstatement. The Supreme Court has recognized the unfairness of some of the Board's orders in this respect, and the principles laid down by the Court might be recognized in some specific provisions of law.

I feel very hopeful that amendments to the act may be adopted at the next session of Congress. Hearings were delayed by the administration itself. Those who oppose every correction of present conditions have many friends on our committee, but the injustice of the present situation is so clear, popular demand for amendment so insistent, that action will surely be taken. The act can be amended now without any weakening of its basic purposes, but if resentment against unjust administration becomes too strong, there is real danger that public opinion will destroy the act without distinguishing between sound principle and unjust administration.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington (D. C.) News, of September 30, 1939, by John T. Flynn, entitled "Plain Economics."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 30, 1939]

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

CHICAGO, September 30.—In many western cities the struggle going on in Washington about the Neutrality Act is being described as a battle between two plans to remain neutral. One plan is the arms embargo. The other plan is called the cash-and-carry plan. The impression created in many minds is that the President favors the cash-and-carry plan and the opposition Congressmen favor the arms-embargo plan but are against cash and carry.

This impression is being industriously fostered by those who want to kill the arms embargo. It is responsible for much of the support for the repeal of the embargo.

The facts, of course, are quite different. The first cash-and-carry plan was proposed by Senators NYE and CLARK on April 9, 1935. The plan represented the views of NYE and CLARK but also of Senators VANDENBERG, BONE, LA FOLLETTE, and others who are generally referred to as the neutrality bloc. This is the group of Senators who are now opposing the President in his effort to repeal the embargo on arms.

On April 9, 1935—4½ years ago—they proposed in the Senate a joint resolution which declared that in the event of war between foreign countries it shall be unlawful for any person to lend any government or national of such government any money or to extend credit for the purchase of any article declared to be contraband of war by any belligerent government.

The arms embargo proposed at the same time forbade the shipment under any circumstances of arms and munitions and directed the President to list such munitions. But it required that no credit could be extended for that large list of aricles which warring governments define as contraband.

There is no contradiction between the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry plan. There is no reason why the Congress should not adopt both. Congress should adopt both. The neutrality bloc opposing the President is willing to adopt both. But the President wants a weaker plan—he wants the cash-and-carry plan without the arms embargo.

But it is important to remember that what the President is asking for and what he wants are two different things. The President told the unity conference, and he repeated it in his address to Congress, that he wants no Neutrality Act at all. He wants the whole neutrality legislation wiped from the books and a return to international law, which would leave the whole subject in his hands, unhampered by congressional statute. He was told by his own leaders that Congress would never give him this. He is asking for the cash and carry merely because he cannot get what he wants, which is the abolition of all neutrality laws, including embargoes, cash and carry, etc.

The Path to Peace

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. W. WARREN BARBOUR, OF NEW JERSEY, OCTOBER 24, 1939

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] on October 24, 1939, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, on the subject The Path to Peace.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As I speak here tonight, through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co., I should like to feel that we were sitting down and talking as quietly together in your own home. For we Americans are not told what to do, as so many Europeans are. We reach our decisions as individuals and in family council. We share alike in the effort to understand and act intelligently on the grave problems which confront us. And it is the opinions so formed which govern us, translated as they are into political action in our frequent elections. This is democracy at its best, and it is worth keeping, along with the free speech which makes it possible.

Now, for a few minutes, I should like to talk to you about the neutrality problem which the Senate has been debating, and on which it will shortly vote. We call it a neutrality problem, but it is more than that. What we are trying to do is not so much to formulate a policy of academic neutrality as find the path to peace. We Americans are looking for a formula which will prevent us from becoming involved in Europe's hell on earth, and, at the same time, allow us to pursue, peacefully, the normal processes of our national life.

One of the great things about this Senate debate, to me, has been the absence of rancor and unreasoning partisanship. The Senate has risen to its responsibility in the spirit of its best tradition. Naturally we have differed. In discussing the problem with you, I can tell you only how it looks to me. We live in a realistic world. I am trying to be realistic.

It is idle to think in terms of a nonexistent neutrality, in a world at war. Neither is it intelligent to quibble over the customs and understandings among peaceful nations which we like to call international law, when peace no longer exists. When great nations go to war these things fall by the wayside. Desperation drives them to do things they have agreed not to do. Treaties become scraps of paper, neutrality an abstraction. International law gives way to international anarchy.

I do not defend this disregard of morals and agreements. I look upon it sorrowfully. We would all bring about a better order of things if we could. Since we cannot, we must face the facts as they are. While reason surrenders to war, and the voice of the Prince of Peace is drowned in the roar of guns, we must take thought for our own safety and welfare.

As to the almost unanimous purpose on the part of Americans to keep out of the present war there can be no question. No true American can possibly wish to send another army of American youth to the bloody battlefield of Europe to try to make the world safe for anything. We ought to know by this time that we cannot change the habits of the Old World.

There is only one way out of Europe's wars—one cure; one remedy. It is to be found in the teachings of religion. These offer the only hope of enduring peace among the racially different groups of men who are crowded now into that part of the earth's surface. If they cannot learn to live peaceably together, compromising the differences which lead to war, it should be their funeral, not ours.

For weeks now we have been hearing that this course or that will keep us out of war.

The advocates of the repeal program are convinced their method is the best.

A second group would sell no war materials to France and England, but would sell them wheat and cotton, as important in the conduct of the war as steel and powder.

Then there is a third group, the 100-percent isolationists, who, in effect, would have us tie up our ships at the docks, turn our backs to the rest of the world, build a Chinese Wall around the United States, and trade with no one until the war ends.

Let's see how these three programs would work out.

Take program No. 1: The cash-and-carry plan preserves our natural character as a trading nation, but one which, learning its lesson from the last war, will sell its goods only for cash, knowing that if the war lasts none of the belligerents will be able to pay their debts, even if they should want to do so. Coupled with this provision, in the pending bill, is a further requirement that warring nations who wish to buy anything at all in the United States, whether wheat, cotton, airplanes, or steel shall carry the purchases away in their own ships.

This is literally the cash-and-carry principle of the modern grocery store applied to international trade. The ships are the market basket. The seas are the highway. Our goods remain on our shelves until purchasers come for them, pay for them, and take them away. We make no deliveries except across the counter.

To say this will get us into war is as senseless as to argue that a grocer who sells for cash to the customers who can reach his store will incur the undying enmity of other would-be customers who, unable to reach his place of business because of bad roads, have to trade in some other town.

But there is an even stronger argument of all for the cash-and-carry program, in its contribution to our national defense.

There are two aspects of this problem. One is the wisdom of making it possible for Canada to equip herself for defense against possible attack from overseas, since an attack on Canada would necessarily bring us into the war, under the Monroe Doctrine, in defense of American sovereignty and democracy. The other is the vital necessity of expanding our own output of weapons for defense.

Under existing law we can sell planes or any other war weapons to atheistic, communistic Russia, which has its spies and secret agents among us this very moment. Yet we cannot sell the same planes or any other war weapons—not even a coast-defense gun—to our good neighbor, Canada, because Canada has declared war. This is an ostrich-like attitude and is one of the conditions the cash-and-carry program would correct.

Beyond that, the cash-and-carry program would enable us to expand our production of defensive weapons at a time when our capacity to turn them out in large quantities on short notice might mean the difference between keeping out of war and getting into it. A Polish officer remarked bitterly after the rape of Poland, "We had to fight tanks with machine guns." It was the superiority of Russian and German weapons, rather than courage, which made it possible for her enemies to conquer Poland in 3 weeks. There has never been any question as to the courage of the American soldier. But we must not allow him to be sent into battle, if we ever have to defend ourselves, to "fight tanks with machine guns."

Nor, in proposing to sell war supplies to those who may wish to buy them, can we distinguish between offensive and defensive weapons. The only distinction lies in their use.

As a final defense against war we propose to keep our own ships out of the war-carrying trade and also out of the more dangerous war zones. In this manner we would avoid the pitfall into which we walked in the World War, when the torpedoing of American vessels by German submarines ultimately drew us in.

Like every red-blooded American, I approve and applaud the principle of the freedom of the seas. But the lives of American youth are more important than the false pride we would sacrifice in taking this precaution.

I think that is the best answer also to the advocates of program No. 2, who would sell wheat, cotton, and other commodities to belligerents while refusing to sell them guncotton, planes, and other weapons of war. A ship carrying wheat or cotton is as likely to be torpedoed as one carrying guns or planes, with similar consequences.

As to program No. 3, that of the American who asks, "Why do we have to sell anything to anybody? Why can't we shut ourselves up at home and let it go at that?" the answer is that some trade with other countries is as much a part of our lifeblood as trade among ourselves. Without it we would have no silk, no rubber for raincoats or automobile tires, no cork, bananas, chocolate, tea, or a hundred other things which we use every day. There would be no breakfast coffee in this Nation of coffee drinkers. Your daily paper is printed on wood pulp imported from Canada or northern Europe. Our clothing and blankets contain Australian wool.

In exchange for those and other imports we send the countries which produce them our automobiles, sewing machines, typewriters, machinery of all sorts, our textiles, chemicals, our shoes, oil, wheat, cotton, and other products.

From every viewpoint, therefore, it seems to me that, considering our own security and our own necessities, we shall be doing right in adopting the repeal program, safeguarded as it is. I believe most Americans are coming to see it in that light.

But, however we look at this or other problems which may arise later, we must think and act only as Americans. And, of course, we shall.

We must keep our heads, no matter how strong our sympathies may be, and remember always that for Americans there can be only one side. That is the American side. We must think of our own sons, our own country.

It is time the neutrality debate ended. The issues have been discussed fully. I hope we shall pass the proposed revision promptly.

This, as I see it, is the most hopeful path to peace.

Emergency Powers of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

SUMMARY PREPARED BY THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO UPHOLD CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, on September 8 the President proclaimed the existence of a national emergency, which gave him the right to exercise certain powers that otherwise would be beyond Executive authority. Many of these powers are far-reaching in their effect. Many of them are in conflict with the spirit of our established system of checks and balances in government. Many of them appear to be more in harmony with a totalitarian than a democratic philosophy.

Widespread public interest has been aroused as the people contemplate possible conditions incident to the President's proclamation. The whole subject of emergency, discretionary, and war powers of the President has come to the attention of the American people for reexamination and reappraisal. The question that has presented itself is not what will be done but what might or could be done under the present circumstances by virtue of the proclamation. This is both a proper and a timely inquiry. It should receive commendation. It reveals a vigilant not a suspicious citizenry. It is simply the reexamination of its own acts and a reappraisal of their worth in the light of experience.

I have received, as probably you have received, a number of requests for information on this important subject. The National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government has prepared a summary of the discretionary, emergency, and war powers of the President, which I submit herewith.

I am persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that the majority could render no better service to the country than to exert its influence to reclaim for the Congress those powers which in times past have been surrendered to the executive branch of the Government, and which are not a part of the duties of the President under the Constitution, or necessary for him to exercise for the successful operation of an adequate national-defense program.

The summary is as follows:

A. UNREPEALED DISCRETIONARY POWERS

POWER TO SEIZE SHIPS

1. Act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. 1090; U. S. Code 18:26): President authorized to employ land or naval forces of the United States, or militia, for taking possession of and detaining, in order to enforce execution of prescribed prohibitions and penalties, vessels which are fitted out and armed, etc., contrary to the provisions of said act.

POWER TO DETAIN SHIPS

2. Act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. 1091, as amended; U. S. Code 18: 37): President authorized to employ such part of land or naval forces of the United States, or militia, as he may deem necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart from the United States or any of its possessions in all cases, by the law of nations or treaties of the United States, it ought not to remain, and to detain or prevent any vessel from so departing in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it is not entitled to depart.

POWER OVER CARGO

3. Act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. 1091; U. S. Code 18:29): Collectors of customs shall detain any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes, and about to depart from the United States, the cargo of which principally consists of arms and munitions of war, when it appears probable that such vessel is intended to be employed by the owners to cruise or commit hostilities upon subjects or properties of foreign countries with which the United States is at peace, until decision of the President is had thereon, etc.

POWER TO INSPECT

4. Act of August 18, 1914 (38 Stat. 699, ch. 256; U. S. Code 46:83–236): President is authorized to suspend citizenship requirements for inspection of certain foreign-built vessels.

POWER OVER NAVIGATION

5. Act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1053, sec. 7; U. S. Code 33, p. 471): Secretary of War authorized to establish and make regulations for navigation of anchorage grounds, etc.

6. Act of July 9, 1918 (ch. 143 XIX; U. S. Code 33: 3): Secretary of War is authorized to make regulations for use of navigable waters near Army proving grounds, etc.

POWER TO MANUFACTURE

7. Act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1072; U. S. Code 16: 809): The United States may take over certain powerhouses, dams, etc., for purpose of manufacturing nitrates, explosives, or munitions of war, or for any other purpose involving the safety of the United States "when in the opinion of the Persident * * * the safety of the United States demands it," paying just compensation for use.

POWER OVER EXPORTS

8. Act of January 31, 1922 (42 Stat. 361; U. S. C. 22:236): Whenever the President finds that in any American country, etc., conditions of domestic violence exist, which may be promoted by use of arms or ammunition procured from the United States, and makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or ammunition of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or Congress.

B. DISCRETIONARY POWERS SINCE 1933

1. Act of May 12, 1933 (48 Stat. 37 (c); F. C. A. 7:610): Regulations by Secretary of Agriculture to carry out Agricultural Adjustment Act. (With President's approval.)

POWER TO REVISE RATES

2. T. V. A. Act of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 66, No. 13, 14; F. C. A. 16:8316–831m): Revision of T. V. A. Board percentages of gross receipts from sale of power, paid to Alabama and Tennessee; findings of Board as to value of dam No. 2, etc. (With President's approval.)

POWER TO FIX GOLD CONTENT OF DOLLAR

Legal Aspects of Neutrality Problem

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

REPORT OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a very interesting report from the section of international and comparative law of the American Bar Association. This report, in my opinion, is an illuminating document. It is a legal opinion arrived at after much study and considerable research work. It was prepared by men who had the qualities of experts. It defines, in my judgment, our rights under existing circumstances. The men who prepared this report, which I wish to have inserted in the RECORD, include the following:

James W. Ryan, chairman of the committee, who was formerly special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States and who is now a member of the council of the American Bar Association section on international and comparative law;

John Foster Dulles, who is a member of the firm of Sullivan & Cromwell; who was secretary of the Hague Peace Conference of 1907, and counsel in 1918 and 1919 to the American Commission to Negotiate Peace;

Maj. Gen. Allen W. Gullion, United States Army, who is the present Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Arthur K. Kuhn, who was formerly president of the American branch of the International Law Association, and is one of the advisers on rights and duties of neutral states in naval and aerial war of the Harvard University Research in International Law.

The remaining members of this committee are equally well and favorably known.

This report, after clearly and carefully analyzing the subject before us, arrives at the determination that the majority are well within their right in the enactment of the pending legislation in harmony with domestic law and in keeping with the highest tenets of international law.

The report of the American Bar Association's Committee on Law Protecting Americans and Their Property in Foreign Countries and on the High Seas, which will also be included in my extension, is well worthy of consideration of the entire membership of the Senate.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the matters to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
SECTION OF INTERNATIONAL AND COMPARATIVE LAW,
New York, N. Y., October 23, 1939.

Hon. JAMES M. MEAD,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MEAD: Both sides in the Senate debate on repeal of the arms embargo now agree that under international law a neutral may trade in any kind of goods with belligerents, provided the decision to do so is made in order to further the neutral's domestic welfare, even though the decision is made after outbreak of war. The question still in dispute is whether the new neutrality statute will advance our domestic welfare, and is so intended by the majority in Congress. The majority say it will. The minority say it will not, and is intended to advance the welfare of France and England. The fundamental issue, therefore, is one of fact, whether the new statute will promote our welfare or national defense. If it will, it follows that the majority in Congress so intend, and the contention is without merit that merely incidental benefits to France and England should prevent us from taking measures necessary to our welfare.

The report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations states that the intent in enacting the new neutrality statute is not to commit an unneutral act or favor one belligerent as against another, but is "to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests," and the Senators supporting it say that its enactment will accomplish those results. They say that the new statute will further our national defense by accelerating and increasing our industrial capacity in production of armaments to meet our own armament needs, and will prevent large industries of that kind now in the United States and essential to our national defense from moving to Canada or other foreign country because of the embargo provision of the old Neutrality Act, which interferes with plant operation on a mass-production basis and reduces the capacity or unit-per-month production rate. And they say that aside from this benefit of increased production for our own needs conjointly with the increased export trade, there is the important fact that our Government, as the territorial sovereign, will take over the newly enlarged armament plants and their products exclusively for our own national-defense needs at any time that such action becomes desirable or necessary. They say that laws already on the books become effective immediately in any national emergency, and authorize the President to require all armament plants located in this country to produce war materials for our needs before producing them for anyone else. They say that the new statute will, therefore, enormously increase our military strength without requiring any appropriation from Congress or additional burden on the taxpayers. They further say that repeal of the present act will incidentally eliminate a wholly unintended and unneutral result flowing from that act by stopping our giving aid to, and unfairly discriminating in favor of, one of the belligerents. They say that at the present time, for no reason of national interest, we are refusing to trade on a commercial basis with countries who need our products, and with whom, until the present embargo statute became practically effective a month ago, we had maintained friendly trading relations for a hundred years, and that these countries have been our largest customers for so long that trade with them has become an essential part of our national life.

If these facts are true, then these purposes of the new statute in advancing our domestic welfare are obviously legitimate purposes under international law and in no way conflict with our duty as a neutral. A foreign aggressor by starting a war with another foreign country cannot deprive us of those rights or freeze them so that they cannot be later asserted in a form not in conflict with the rules of international law. No foreign country or belligerent has the right to determine our policy, or, what is the same thing, to prevent us from changing our policy as our national interests require at any time, provided we do not actively aid one of the belligerents and unfairly discriminate against the other.

If passage of the new statute will advance our national defense, it seems to be quite immaterial that one of its minor effects will be an economic benefit to one belligerent resulting from the temporary inability of the other belligerent to send ships to us to buy and carry away the goods which we are offering to sell on the same terms to both belligerents. A neutral is under no duty to try to equalize the trading abilities of the belligerents. On August 12, 1915, Secretary of State Lansing in a letter to the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador repudiated the "novel principle" that neutral nations are obligated to place an embargo on arms and ammunition because one of the belligerents cannot obtain them through commercial intercourse. And on October 15, 1914, the State Department announced, regarding the sale of munitions to belligerents, that although these articles were considered contraband and were subject to seizure by an enemy of the purchasing government, it was the enemy's duty to prevent the articles from reaching their destination and that if the enemy "should be unable to do this that is for him one of the misfortunes of war; the inability, however, imposes on the neutral government no obligation to prevent the sale."

The contention that the supposed individual sympathies of the President or other administration officials determine the intent of Congress in the new bill, no matter what Congress' real or expressed intent may be, has been answered by pointing out that Congress and not the Executive is the legislative body, and that therefore any possible expression by executive officials of intent or reasons for supporting the new statute is immaterial on the question of the intent of Congress.

Moreover, the supporters of the new statute say that, even if there were an intent to aid or make a gift to one of the belligerents, that would not be an unneutral act unless what was done constituted an aid or gift. They say that the new statute contains no language which on any reasonable construction could be regarded as constituting an aid or gift to a belligerent or to anybody. This seems to be so because the bill is limited to authorizing trading on a commercial basis with all belligerents. When a country trades on a commercial basis with another country it isn't giving away anything. It takes an equivalent for what it sells or delivers. The contention that by merely trading on a commercial basis with another nation our country would be aiding or making a gift to it appears to be without support in any municipal law or international law that has been mentioned. Indeed, Hague Convention V, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers and persons in case of war on land, signed at The Hague on October 13, 1907 (36 U. S. Stat. L. 2310), to which both Germany and the United States were parties, expressly provides to the contrary in chapter III, as follows:

"ART. 17. A neutral cannot avail himself of his neutrality * * *.

"(b) If he commits acts in favor of a belligerent * * *.

"ART. 18. The following acts shall not be considered as committed in favor of one belligerent in the sense of article 17, letter (b):

"(a) Supplies furnished or loans made to one of the belligerents * * *."

There is no rule of international law prohibiting citizens of a neutral country from trading with belligerents in any and all kinds of goods. Indeed their right to do so can hardly be questioned because our country and all other countries have always asserted it and have in almost every instance exercised it. Article 7 of Hague Convention V of 1907 expressly recognizes the right. Those opposing repeal admit that we had that right and would have it still excepting for the fact that certain belligerents started a war, and at that time we were not exercising the right. As the right could be exercised only during a war, it is difficult to understand on what logical basis a contention can be maintained that failure to exercise a right at a time when it could not be exercised constitutes a waiver of the right.

Those opposing repeal further say that international law prohibits our trading with belligerents in armaments, because a month ago, when the war started, Congress was not permitting us to so trade. The contention in substance is that an act of Congress or national legislation has enlarged or restricted international law or our rights under that law. This conflicts with the rule that no single nation's statute can amend or repeal international law. The contention further implies that Congress' power in furtherance of our national defense or interests over questions closely connected wtth war or peace is impaired and made impossible of exercise merely because two foreign countries have started a war.

It is further said by those opposing repeal of the embargo that in a few instances Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, and on one occasion Lansing, disclaimed the right of a neutral to change national policy during progress of a war for the purpose of aiding one of the belligerents. Those precedents are, of course, irrelevant unless the fact of aid or gift to one of the belligerents is established in the present instance. Moreover, those instances appear to be greatly outnumbered by the instances in which our country, while neutral, has changed its national policy during progress of a war, more particularly during the Napoleonic wars extending from 1792 to 1814 (with one short intermission), and during the World War in the period from 1914 to 1917, and by the instances in which other neutral countries have changed their policies during war. While neutral we changed our national policy and lifted or imposed embargoes during progress of a war in 1793, 1794, 1795, 1806, 1807, 1808, 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812 (2 months before June 18, 1812, when war was declared against England), 1914, 1915, 1916, March 12, 1917, and 1934. Germany while neutral changed her policy during the progress of the Crimean War between England and Russia, and in 1870 asked England to change her policy during the Franco-Prussian War, and in 1914 and again in 1915 asked us to change our policy during the progress of the World War. Austria-Hungary made the same request of us on June 29, 1915. The few instances cited to the contrary seem, therefore, insufficient to show a settled rule of international law and are rather exceptions to the rule than the rule itself.

On careful consideration of the facts and points brought out in the Senate debate thus far it would seem that the majority is clearly right in saying that repeal of the present Neutrality Act will further our national defense and will not violate any rule of international law or lead to war.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES W. RYAN, Chairman.

REPORT OF AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION'S COMMITTEE ON LAW PROTECTING AMERICANS AND THEIR PROPERTY IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES AND ON THE HIGH SEAS

Pursuant to direction by the chairman of the section of international and comparative law of the American Bar Association that this committee consider and report promptly on the question of the legality under international law of a neutral nation's changing its policy during the progress of a war, and after careful consideration of the matter, your committee is of the opinion that action to avail of rights open to neutrals under generally accepted international procedure, if taken because of considerations of domestic welfare, involves no violation of legal neutrality, even though the action occurs after the outbreak of hostilities, and would not give rise to valid claims for the indemnification of belligerents who might be injured thereby.

Submitted, October 19, 1939.

National Foreign Trade Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY JAMES A. FARRELL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, the chairman of the National Foreign Trade Council, Mr. James A. Farrell, of New York, delivered a very able address at the Twenty-sixth National Foreign Trade Convention, held at New York, October 9, 1939. His address dealt with a problem which is under consideration here in connection with neutrality legislation, namely, American foreign trade in wartime.

I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Farrell's address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we meet again in a convention confronted by wartime problems. The number of delegates present is evidence of the deep concern shown in both the immediate and lasting effects of wartime limitation on freedom of trade. The speakers who will address this and other sessions are fully equipped by knowledge and experience to examine a situation obscured by the regulations which the United States and other countries are enforcing in respect both to merchant vessels and cargoes.

As in previous years, we welcome the presence of so many representatives of governments of other nations and, in particular, the attendance of the commissioners who are in charge of exhibits at the New York World's Fair. These include countries whose governments exist now in exile, but with whom the United States retains diplomatic relations. The policy of the United States is opposed to wars of conquest and to recognition of the fruits of such conquests. We believe that peaceful relations between nations rest upon a moral code which recognizes the sacredness of treaties, the rights of property, and the freedom and independence of other nations.

The wishful thought that wars of conquest may be averted by economic measures which would strengthen the foundations of peace has little support in the diplomatic documents preceding the present war.

PROBLEMS AFFECTING WORLD TRADE

While this convention is concerned chiefly with problems affecting world trade and bars political discussions, it cannot remain indifferent to the economic consequences of political conflagrations that shut American traders from overseas markets and which have forcefully terminated our trade agreement with Czechoslovakia and our satisfactory trade relations with Poland, and challenged our right to trade with China. As a neutral nation we are not without the power to protect our economic interests against discriminations by nations that are not wholly independent of the buying power of the United States. The abrogation of trade treaties and resort to the flexible provisions of the tariff act give warning that the United States has the means to protect her domestic economy and her right to the open door in world markets.

The determination of the Americas to resist economic encirclement by countries seeking to make them mere economic vassals has been significantly proclaimed by the countries gathered at the recent Panama Conference, at which the United States was represented. I do not propose to dwell upon a subject which will be discussed at the pan-American session. I merely refer to it as further evidence that the combined economic resources of the nations on this Western Hemisphere are capable of being mobilized against all attempts to deprive them of their economic freedom and of their rights as neutrals. The effects of our trade agreements have been neutralized over a wide area by wars of conquest in Asia and Europe. We must be prepared to counteract this narrowing of our trade opportunities by exploring the possibilities of increased inter-American trade and in other areas influenced by our trade agreements.

NO ABANDONMENT OF TRADITIONAL RIGHTS

Whatever may be done by Congress, with the object of keeping the Nation out of war, ought not to carry with it the implication that the United States has abandoned its traditional right to the freedom of the seas. This, of course, recognizes the rules of blockade and the rights of belligerents as to visit and search.

The true statesman legislates not for today only. He keeps ever in view the danger of creating precedents which at some future time may rise to plague and confound him. It is not in keeping with our national spirit to have the United States presented to the world as a country dominated by its fears. What has become of preparedness? Are we, as a country, willing to scrap our long-deferred shipbuilding program, of which 1,000,000 tons of new ships are now under construction to replace old and obsolete ones, and which, with our naval program, has been heralded as one of our Nation's strongest guaranties of peace? Our present overseas fleet of 400 American-flag vessels carrying one and a half million tons of cargo is expected to lay up and turn our commerce over to neutral ships of foreign flags. We are told that as an alternative American ships can proceed in ballast to distant ports of the world to bring home cargoes of essential raw materials, not produced here, in sufficient quantities for our domestic manufactures. This would entail large losses to the shipowner; a one-way voyage in ballast would not be compensatory, as the revenue from a return cargo would be insufficient, aside from its impracticability.

Are we to allow our merchant fleet to rust in our harbors, and to suffer the shrinkage of trade and loss of markets and consequent unemployment of large numbers of people engaged in the maritime industry, under the pressure of foreign propaganda that international law and neutral rights no longer exist?

From the earliest days the United States has vigorously defended the doctrine of the freedom of the seas as being of the essence of national sovereignty and independence.

FEARS CREATED BY PROPAGANDISTS

We should not fail at this time, when propagandists are so busy in ascribing unworthy motives, to disclaim on the part of American business any desire to regard this war from the standpoint of the opportunities that may be presented of profiting by wartime production, or by diversion of trade from other countries. The history of the last war and of its economic consequences reminds us only too ominously that, whether as a neutral or as a belligerent, we stand to lose in the final accounting in a war of major proportions and of devastating effects upon the normal lives and peacetime economies of the nations with whom we trade. At the close of 1930, which ended a post-war era of American lending and constructive aid to countries crippled financially by the war, the huge sum of $8,000,000,000, in foreign bonds and stocks, was held by private American investors. The stigma, so often attached abroad to America, of being a war profiteer is in sharp conflict with the figures representing America's generous but futile efforts to establish permanent peace in Europe by resuscitation of the internal economies of stricken nations.

The stimulation of trade by wartime production in 1914 and after had but one profitable advantage for the United States. Manufacturing problems necessitated a closer combination between industry and science to meet the demands upon production. We gained immeasurably by the discovery of more efficient methods of production and by scientific discoveries that added a number of new industries that enter into our foreign trade and which have opened new avenues of employment.

LATIN AMERICAN TRADE

We gained also by a better knowledge of marketing and of the psychology of countries that turned to the United States for supplies no longer available in Europe. We found in Latin America a potential market for finished products and a source of essential imports. Despite keen competition by other countries, today we hold 36 percent of this trade and were considering at Panama how the United States and Latin America may mutually profit by a realization of the aims of the Lima Conference for a return to economically sound relations. A gratifying sign of the awakening of the United States to the potentialities of this trade is to be found in the loans and credit extensions made to some of these nations through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Export-Import Bank. Constructive efforts to strengthen the exchange situation in Latin America are an essential part of any program aiming at the recovery of these markets as an outlet for our finished products.

FURTHERANCE OF IMPORT TRADE

We meet at this convention not only to gain a clearer insight into our immediate wartime problems but also to consider how our needs for export markets can be furthered by finding new sources for an increase in imports not injuriously competitive. With an average 90 percent and more of the domestic market, neither the farmer nor the industrialist has reasonable grounds for denying to the countries to whom we sell the opportunity we ourselves claim in foreign markets—the right to equality of treatment. We have lost much ground in the past by a refusal to face realities. Farmers and manufacturers, who themselves are dependent on foreign markets, but who doubt the wisdom and advantages of our trade agreements in stimulating both our domestic and overseas trade, are adding to the difficulties which the war has brought about of insulating our economic system against the effects of wartime disruption of international trade relations. An export balance of nearly a billion dollars annually as a creditor nation may well be critically examined, with a view to its reconcilement with the economics of healthy and progressive world commerce.

WARTIME TRADE INHIBITIONS

The inhibitions created by the assertion of belligerent rights will occupy much of the time of this convention. It is interesting to recall that, during the Spanish-American War, the United States designated only a limited number of articles as "conditionally contraband"—coal, materials for railroad or telegraphs, and money and provisions destined for the enemy's forces. At the time of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904 the United States and Great Britain both protested against Russia's inclusion of foodstuffs as contraband and secured a modification of the regulations. The great extension of the contraband list by ourselves and the belligerent nations in the World War showed how modern war reaches into ever-increasing numbers of trade fields.

PRECAUTIONS FOR THE FUTURE

Looking to the future, the task lies ahead of planning precautionary measures to prevent as far as possible the effects on our economic system of a sudden transformation from wartime to peacetime production. It is a time for closest cooperation between Government and business; for insuring that wartime controls shall not continue, at the close of the war, to prevent a return to freedom of private enterprise.

It is gratifying to know that this convention is attended by a large number of Government officials, and that Secretary Hull, despite the heavy burden of State affairs, will address the delegates at the world trade dinner. He has led courageously in the attack upon excessive trade barriers and enjoys the confidence of businessmen who look for more prosperous times through greater freedom of world trade.

We meet in anxious and perplexing times. We know not what the future may have in store. Of this, however, we are convinced, that right in the end must triumph; that America can make no greater contribution to the strengthening of the foundations of world peace than by carrying on in a manner to proclaim its resolute determination to guard its shores against the inroads of doctrines and organizations that are subversive of the liberties and independence of a free people.

American Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE TIMBER TRADES JOURNAL OF LONDON, ENGLAND

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the Timber Trades Journal of London, England, under date of September 1939 entitled "America Takes the Cash."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Timber Trades Journal, London, England, of September 30, 1939]

AMERICA TAKES THE CASH—QUESTION OF RAW MATERIALS

The alteration of the neutrality laws of the United States on the grounds put forward by the President is a foregone conclusion. The policy of America for the moment is to save her skin and take the cash, but in the light of the experience of the last war, that attitude is liable at any time to undergo alteration. From the trade point of view there are two things to be said about the new arrangements. America under the Neutrality Act was free to send us aluminium, called by the President "alloominum," and other raw materials, but she was not free to send them "in processed form." She can now send the aluminium in the form of aeroplane wings, and so with other materials. The first point is that we shall take all the raw material we can and process it ourselves as far as we can, only paying American wages for manufacturing insofar as we have not sufficient facilities.

The next point, and one of far more importance, is that when we have to import war materials, or anything else, we should strive wherever possible to buy them in markets which are open to Germany. Mr. Amery uttered one of the few bits of wisdom that Parliament hears when he said that it would be worth while to pay a higher price to buy goods that might otherwise go to Germany. In the meantime, the definite decision of America to keep out of the war may at least stiffen others in the same attitude and help to localize the conflict.

Civil Aeronautics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. HARLLEE BRANCH

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, aside from the question which is now uppermost before this body, as a matter which I think entirely appropriate at this time, I desire to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by one of the outstanding aeronautical authorities in America, the Vice Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, a man who has had wide experience in the matter of civil aeronautics. The speech bears on the subject of the Federal moneys that have been expended in the way of the development of civil aeronautics in this country in the past few years, and further dwells on a matter which I propose to bring before this body for its attention at the regular session, namely, the establishment by the Federal Government of airports in municipalities throughout the United States. I refer to the speech of Mr. Harllee Branch, of the Civil Aeronautics Authority of the United States, and ask that his speech, delivered recently, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

The question as to whether the Federal Government is going to spend money on civil aeronautics is, of course, already answered. The Federal Government has been spending money on civil aeronautics since 1918 when it first began, through the Post Office Department, spending money on an experimental Air Mail System.

From that modest and historic beginning the Federal Government has assumed heavy obligations for the inauguration and maintenance of an adequate domestic and international air mail and air transportation system and for the general development of civil aviation.

Government support of the Air Mail System, including domestic and international services, has grown to the point where, even deducting the amounts received from air-mail postage revenues, the Government's payments for the carriage of air mail during the past 20 years totals approximately $150,000,000.

The early steps in furnishing a few beacon lights at emergency landing fields for the experimental Air Mail Service have resulted in the present extensive Federal airways system. To safeguard air transportation the airways in this system are equipped with revolving beacon lights, radio ranges which project courses over the route flown, teletype circuits, continuous weather reports, intermediate landing fields, and other air navigation aids. To date the Federal Government has expended for these aids approximately $78,000,000.

Since 1927 the Federal Government has borne the cost of inspecting and certificating all aircraft manufactured in this country and the cost of inspecting, certificating, supervising, and regulating all types of civil flying. It is estimated that $11,000,000 have been expended for such services.

During the past 5 years the Government has spent more than $170,000,000 on airport projects in connection with its relief program. All of these expenditures by the Federal Government are independent of the amounts expended by the Government for military aviation purposes.

At its last regular session the Congress appropriated $4,000,000 for a civilian pilot-training program and more than 400 colleges and universities throughout the country have been selected to provide the courses of study and training called for by this program.

While this program is an expansion of vocational education and training and in nowise a subsidy, nevertheless it is an expenditure of Federal funds to encourage and develop civil aviation. I might say in passing that it is my opinion that this program will do more to encourage and develop civil aviation than any program yet offered.

The Federal aid for civil aeronautics over the period of the last 20 years has totaled over $400,000,000, or an average annual expenditure of more than $20,000,000. Such sums can hardly be called excessive when viewed in the light of the results obtained or from the standpoint of the value of civil aviation to this country.

Therefore, there is little meaning to the question, Is the Federal Government going to spend money on civil aeronautics? A more appropriate inquiry would be, At what rate is the Government going to continue to spend money on civil aeronautics? It is my opinion that there is no present prospect that the Federal Government can hope to avoid maintaining and even increasing the present rate. So important has air transportation become to the national economy; so important are our airports, our airmen, and our airplane factories to the national defense, and so great is the industrial promise of private flying that no one would even venture to suggest that the Federal Government should discontinue its policy of supporting civil aeronautics.

Aviation is a costly but necessary enterprise. Every nation has come to this realization, and all the major nations of the world are appropriating vast sums for civil as well as military aviation.

The manufacturing branches of the aviation industry are now not only self-supporting but in numerous instances are making a substantial profit. There are indications that the domestic air transport operations may soon be largely self-supporting. Although the Civil Aeronautics Authority has granted increases in the rates of mail pay to a number of air lines, reliable statistics indicate that the cost of this rapidly increasing service to the Post Office Department may soon be equaled by the constantly increasing income received by the Government from air-mail postage. The international air transportation ledger is not yet in such a satisfactory financial balance, but the current volume of international air mail is almost double that of a year ago. Overseas operations are much more costly than the domestic overland operations, and up to this time the postage income received by the Government represents only 31.80 percent of the total mail payments for the international services rendered during the last 11 years.

The cost of maintaining the Federal airways and the cost to the Government of the certification, inspection, and regulation of aircraft, airmen, and air transportation companies necessarily will increase as these air activities expand. These functions of the Authority are essential to safety in aviation, and safety must continue to be the watchword for the Authority and for all branches of the aviation industry.

Another item in the air-transport picture which has implications of increased Federal expenditures is the demand for the extension of the present air-line network. At present there are more than 80 applications for certificates for new routes on the docket of the Authority, and many of these petitions are from new companies. The Authority is faced with very grave responsibilities in passing upon these applications. It must be careful not to authorize new routes which cannot be justified on the basis of the value of the services which they will perform. It must avoid placing upon the Public Treasury the heavy financial burdens incident to the permanent operation of air lines which have no prospect of ever becoming self-sustaining and which at best can expect but a nominal mail and passenger traffic. It must assure itself that the proposed new routes will fit into an economically integrated national air transportation system.

An important factor to be considered in connection with new air lines is that under existing law the Federal Government provides through mail pay a very substantial portion of the revenues of such lines. It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the Authority were to permit air lines to spring up like mushrooms all over the country with no greater justification than that those promoting them will establish for themselves a remunerative business which largely would be financed and supported in perpetuity by the Federal Government. Anyone who is familiar with the disastrous consequences which resulted from haphazard railroad promotions 30, 40, and 50 years ago, or with the more recent uneconomic and planless development of power utilities in many areas of the country will appreciate the gravity of this question.

In still another field of aviation the Federal Government has assumed financial obligations, namely, private flying. The entire time and attention of one of the divisions of the Authority is devoted to the interests of private flyers and much of the work of the inspection force of the Authority is given over to the examination and certification of private flyers and the inspection of the aircraft they fly.

There are at present approximately 27,000 certificated civilian pilots, and it is estimated that by the end of 1941, largely as a result of the stimulus provided by the civilian pilot training program, this number will be increased to more than 75,000.

I know you are all interested in the aeronautical activities I have just mentioned, but undoubtedly at this time you are more interested in the development of airports. Everyone must agree that such activities are of little value if we do not have adequate airports. Yet, on the other hand, without these other activities there would be little need for airports. Consequently, all phases of aeronautical development must move forward together.

Some spokesmen for municipal and civil aviation organizations recently have been quite critical of the Authority because it did not in some way induce the last Congress to appropriate and make immediately available millions of dollars for airport construction. While the Civil Aeronautics Authority has no desire to shirk any of its responsibilities, it must be remembered that the Authority is an independent agency of Congress, whose powers and functions are fixed by law. The Civil Aeronautics Act definitely imposes upon the Authority the duty of advising Congress upon aeronautical matters, at the same time prescribing the procedure by which that advice shall be given. It is not the proper role of the Authority to draft bills and lobby them through Congress, no matter how desirable such legislation might appear to the Authority or to any other person interested in aviation. The Authority legally cannot and morally should not constitute itself a high-pressure agency for influencing the Members of Congress. However, it can and should advise the Congress in the manner prescribed and sanctioned by law as to what legislation in its opinion is necessary to the sound development of civil aviation. And it has done just that in the matter of airports.

The Civil Aeronautics Act which created the Authority required it to make a national airport survey and recommend to the Congress (1) whether the Federal Government should participate in the construction, improvement, development, operation, or maintenance of a national system of airports; and (2) if Federal participation is recommended, the extent to which and the manner in which the Federal Government shall so participate. The Authority made such a survey, and in its report to Congress last February made such recommendations.

To be specific, the Authority advised Congress that in its opinion the Federal Government should participate in the construction of airports, particularly those airports which are vital to the Federal system of airways and to the national defense. The Authority's report said: "In passing upon applications for Federal expenditure on airport development or improvement, the highest preference should be given to airports which are important to the maintenance of safe and efficient operation of air transportation along the major trade routes of the Nation, and to those rendering special service to the national defense." The Authority pointed out in its report that during the year ahead a total sum of $125,000,000 could be efficiently used for these purposes.

At the time the Authority made its national airport survey and its report to Congress the Federal Government was appropriating large sums for relief and had for several years devoted a sizeable portion of these funds to airport construction. With the relief problem still acute and the apparent certainty that Congress would for some time continue to provide appropriations for relief, the Authority thought that it would be wise specifically to allocate a certain percentage of the relief funds for airport construction, and it recommended an allocation of $100,000,000 of the 1940 relief appropriation for airports. In addition it recommended that a supplemental appropriation of $25,000,000 be appropriated for those airport-construction projects which could not be provided for from relief funds because of the limitation specified in the relief appropriation act on the ratio of expenditures for labor and for materials, thereby providing funds for those airport-construction projects which call for a larger percentage of the allocated funds for material and a lesser proportion for labor.

The Authority made it quite clear in its report to Congress that when the relief appropriations were reduced to a point where it would no longer be practicable to construct airports with relief labor, the Government should, through special appropriations, make provisions for such necessary construction. The Authority did not at the time it sent its recommendations to Congress, and does not now, hold to the opinion that the Federal Government should assume the full burden of airport construction. It feels that this burden should be reasonably shared by the municipal, county, and State governments.

We do not believe that there can be any uniform and universally applicable rule covering the division of costs among the various units of Government. Some airports exist primarily in the interest of the locality; others are of regional or of national importance. It is hardly possible to imagine an airport so placed that it would not be useful to somebody, but that does not mean that every conceivable location becomes a matter of national importance and of proper Federal concern. There are an indefinite variety of cases, and it has seemed to the Authority indispensable that there be a corresponding flexibility of procedure, and that there should be some discretion as to the extent of Federal participation in order that it may be directly related to the circumstances of the particular case. We have so expressed ourselves in our airport report, but we may have erred in not making that part of our recommendations emphatic enough, since it seems to have been very commonly overlooked in the subsequent discussions of the Authority's proposals. A discretionary role is not an easy one to occupy, and a flexible rule is not an easy one to administer. It would be far simpler from the point of view of Federal authority to have some such uniform rule as that the Federal Government will bear a fixed proportion of the total cost of every airport project that meets a certain minimum standard of acceptability, but we do not think that a uniform rule, despite its simplicity, would give the best results that can be obtained from a given amount of money.

We are justly proud of the advanced development of civil aviation in this country; that we have more privately owned aircraft and civilian pilots than any other nation; that our air-transport companies fly more miles and carry more passengers, with an unequaled record of safety; that we have more and larger and better airports serving an aviation-minded public; and that our aircraft manufacturers produce the best and latest in civil aircraft. All of this has been made possible by the continued cooperation of the States, municipalities, the industry, and the Federal Government. There is no problem confronting us today which cannot be answered if we have the unified support of all who are interested in aviation. The Authority hopes for the continued cooperation and the sustained help of these same agencies and groups. With it the limitlessness of the air space is our only barrier.

The Question of Embargo Repeal

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY RT. REV. MSGR. JOHN A. RYAN

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Right Reverend Monsignor John A. Ryan, director of the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, over the Columbia Broadcasting System last Tuesday, October 24, on the subject Shall the Embargo Be Lifted?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this broadcast, I am neither representing nor appearing under the auspices of any organization or institution. I am speaking only for myself, as an American citizen who believes that he knows something about the principles of international morality.

Much time has been wasted and millions of words uttered, within and without Congress, in an empty and futile dispute concerning the meaning of neutrality. Those who denounce the existing embargo on the sale of munitions to the belligerents maintain that it is unneutral because it favors Germany and is unfavorable to England and France; the opposing group declares that to lift the embargo would be unneutral because it would help England and France and injure Germany. Both groups are right.

In the present critical situation, the primary concern of our people and our Government is to keep out of the European war. Both the champions of the embargo and the proponents of repeal agree about this. Some of the arguments advanced by the former are illogical and unfair. They declare that to lift the embargo would be to take the first step toward involvement. This is a misleading metaphor and an unproved assertion. The only semblance of proof brought forward rests upon the assumption that history repeats itself. Selling arms to one belligerent party, we are told, "got the country into the last war and would have a similar effect now." As a matter of fact, history never repeats itself in exactly the same way after a change has taken place in the environment. Now, the knowledge, the determination, and the attitude of American people with respect to participation in war, have greatly changed since 1917. Moreover, it is simply untrue to assert that the sale of munitions was the one, or even the principal, cause of our entrance into the great war. Other factors contributed mightily to that unfortunate decision. Some of those no longer exist.

Happily, the repeal of the embargo would not only be consistent with our national welfare and safety but would be in conformity with the precepts of morality and religion. Some of the utterances by isolationists, both inside and outside of Congress, imply that our country has no obligations of love and charity to any other country. These men advocate not only political but moral isolation. They contend that the injustice inflicted by the Hitler government upon the peoples of Poland, Germany, and Austria, and the manifold injustices which it will perpetrate over wider areas if it is successful in this war, are no moral concern of ours. They remind us unpleasantly of Cain, who scornfully asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" They imitate the priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side, "remaining neutral" to the suffering and helplessness of the man who "went down to Jericho and fell among robbers." The person who asserts that we should be impartial and indifferent in our attitude toward the conflict between the Hitler government and the Allies, repudiates not only Christ's gospel of brotherly love but the principles of natural morality.

States, no less than individuals, are subject to the moral law. And they are bound not only by the precept of justice but likewise by the precept of charity. In the present crisis our country is morally obliged to do all that it reasonably can to defeat Hitler and destroy Hitlerism. Victory for this evil genius and his evil principles in this war would mean the destruction of Christian civilization throughout a large part of Europe. This tragic result would follow inexorably from the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi policies which have been pursued during the last 5 years.

Upon what specific grounds do I base this assertion? First, the Hitler government has been continuously engaged for more than 5 years in a cruel and insidious campaign for the destruction of the Christian religion in Germany, and latterly in Austria. In a joint pastoral letter issued about 4 years ago by the hierarchy of Germany, the bishops protested against "the propagation of a new paganism," and declared that the Hitler government was attacking not merely "a particular article of faith but the very essence and fundamentals of the Christian religion * * *" Three years later, or about 1 year ago, another joint pastoral letter of the German bishops declared that in the intervening 3 years the persecution of religion had become "more hostile and more violent," and that the government was striving for "the uprooting of Christianity in general and the introduction of a faith that no longer has the least relation to belief in God and the Christian belief in a future life."

In December 1937 the late Pope Pius XI declared that there had seldom been a religious persecution "so serious, so terrible, so painful, and so sad in its deepest consequences" as that carried on in Germany. "It is," the Holy Father continued, "a persecution where neither the use of violence nor the pressure of menaces nor the deceptions of cunning and the lie are missing."

The attitude of the American hierarchy toward the present regime in Germany was expressed at their annual meeting held in Washington in November 1937:

"Today the sense of all religious-minded men and women throughout the world is outraged by the satanic resourcefulness of these leaders of modern paganism and by the incredible excesses committed by them in their attempt to exterminate religion and to blot out from the minds of the German people all true knowledge and love of God."

Second, the Hitler government has consistently and continuously flouted and denied the principles of charity, justice, truth, and liberty which were brought to Germany by St. Boniface more than 1,200 years ago, and which have been diffused, developed, and made effective by Christian teaching alone.

Third, the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi Government have substituted the absolute and totalitarian state for democracy, for a government of and by the people. They have outraged in a hundred ways the dignity of the individual and the decencies of life in Germany; they have brazenly and contemptuously violated all the natural rights of German men and women. These enormities have, indeed, been most severe and most conspicuous against the Jews but they have been quite as deliberately and as definitely inflicted upon the Catholics and the Lutherans.

Fourth, while we do not know what Stalin will do, we can be certain that he will derive greater encouragement from a Hitler victory than from a Hitler defeat.

No genuine believer in Christianity or in the moral law can be neutral, or impartial, or indifferent in this awful situation. No intelligent man who holds that states as well as individuals have duties of charity to one another will deny that the United States is under moral obligation to do all that it reasonably can, to employ every means that can be employed without disproportionate inconvenience, in order to defeat Hitler and save Christian civilization in Europe. The United States is not morally bound to participate directly in the conflict, and it ought not to do so, but it is morally obliged to use every means short of war to prevent the moral, spiritual, and economic devastation that would follow the triumph of Hitlerism. To permit the sale of munitions and other materials under a cash-and-carry system would not cause us unreasonable inconvenience or grave risk. On the contrary, it would help to keep us out of the war. Supplying Britain and France with munitions would enable them to win a speedier victory and to make the war shorter. The shorter the war the less likely are we to be drawn into it.

The moral question confronting America is not that of "punishing villains in Europe," whether living or dead. It is the question of contributing so far as we reasonably can contribute to the valiant effort now being made by Britain and France to prevent the triumph of paganism and barbarism in Europe. As the president of Fordham University, Rev. Robert I. Gannon, S. J., said recently, "Hitler is the most pestilential and altogether infuriating character of all times." In order to find enemies of the human race comparable with this moral monstrosity one has to go back to the fifth century Hun, Attila, who came to be called the Scourge of God, or to the twelfth century Mongol, Genghis Khan, who believed that he had a divine call to conquer the world. And it is a question whether Hitler's capacity for evil is not greater than was that of either of those terrifying and devastating barbarians.

Result of Radio Survey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, after months of work, and I might say after a great deal of time and effort, I am prepared now to give the House the result of a postal-card survey I personally made of the broadcasting situation as it exists today. I made this survey in an effort to show that the action of the Federal Communications Commission in denying clear-channel stations additional power to meet the demands of rural listeners was arbitrary, unwarranted, and capricious.

You will recall that last May the Federal Communications Commission, and after a stormy hearing that lasted several months, decided—I might say against the weight of all social and economic evidence—to deny clear-channel stations a power output in excess of 50 kilowatts. This decision meant that people living in rural areas in many States of the United States would be left with poor, and in a very great percent of the instances, without any satisfactory radio reception. At the time the Commission arrived at this strange decision to put aside the public interest and to administratively legislate for a very small minority in the broadcasting field, I criticized this finding and called attention of Members of the Congress to this unexplainable act. At that time I did not have many facts and figures available other than the information which was brought out at the hearings. Because I found such a great deal of interest both in the House and on the outside in my criticism of the Commission I decided to make a survey of my own and see what the situation was at the present time.

With this in mind, I sent out 25,000 cards to rural route box holders in Louisiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Florida, Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, West Virginia, Alabama, North Carolina, Mississippi, Ohio, Indiana, and Arkansas asking them to select the first 4 stations of their choice both in the daytime and at night, and to also give me their comment on the business of broadcasting. I got back, to date, a 10 percent return on these cards and the result has been amazing, not only to me but I am sure it will be likewise amazing and probably very interesting to the Federal Communications Commission. The survey card which I sent was almost an exact duplicate of the one sent out by the Commission in 1935 and again in 1937, and bears out exactly what I said on the floor of this House on Tuesday, May 16, 1939, when I made the statement that rural America stands condemned to the "tongueless silence of the dreamless dusk." That rural and suburban America depend upon and listen to clear-channel stations has been demonstrated by the returns of this survey. This is unquestionably substantiated by the fact that in the 14 States mentioned, the clear-channel stations which now have the greatest amount of power are almost alone in the field of preference of the rural radio listener. Rural America depends upon the clear-channel stations and if I am to believe the comments contained in the cards that I got back, most of this cross section of the country, not only are anxious, but demand power that will put them on a par with their metropolitan brothers in the matter of radio reception.

In this connection I might add that many of the cards came back to me with the notation to restore the power of the Ohio station which was the only one permitted to operate in excess of 50 kilowatts for a specified time. The survey demonstrates beyond the shadow of a doubt that this station, in its experimental operation, was able to furnish good radio reception to the rural areas, a condition that cannot now be approached since the station was arbitrarily reduced from 500 kilowatts to 50 kilowatts power last March. From every section of the country comes the demand that Congress should take in its own hands the business of permitting clear-channel stations to operate on power greater than 50 kilowatts. If the Ohio station served the rural listener so effectively, I cannot see why the Commission does not probe the question a little further, and should it do this I am sure it will reach the unalterable conclusion that the only answer to reception parity in radio is power. If the Commission would decide to grant licenses to clear-channel stations for power in excess of 50 kilowatts the answer would be automatic in the affirmative.

I might add that when the Commission decided to reduce the Ohio station from its power output of 500 kilowatts to 50 kilowatts, many of the rural listeners, especially in the South and the Southwest were left without service except that furnished by XERA and other Mexican stations. This is not a surprising result. The people in the United States who are certainly entitled to the best radio reception within the power of the Commission to give them, found that they could not tune in on a good American station, so naturally to get any reception at all they were forced to pick up a wildcat operator selling goat glands and any such like commodity. Just how long these good people in the South and Southwest and many in the northern part of the United States will have to depend upon XERA and the other Mexican stations is a matter for the Federal Communications Commission and its new chairman, James Lawrence Fly, to decide. This station is blanketing certain areas in the United States with a signal beamed for American consumption. The operator of that station is reported to be using an output of 800,000 watts effective power, while regulations in the United States limit station operators to one-sixteenth of that amount.

From the foregoing it can be deduced that because of the unprecedented action of the Federal Communications Commission in denying radio reception to people in the rural areas, these good American listeners must turn now to Mexico and be bombarded by a station that thrusts upon them not only the relative merits of goat glands but the machinations of crystal gazers, fortune tellers, astrologers, and the like. My contention is that the Commission has in its power the right to give these people a chance to listen to American broadcasters and just as soon as licenses are issued to operators in the United States for power in excess of 50 kilowatts you will hear nothing more of stations like XERA and its ilk.

It will be noted from the break-down that I am including with my remarks that these people in the rural areas cannot get good service from local or regional stations despite the fact that there are hosts and hosts of these local and regional stations in the States where this survey was made. The rural listener in these areas therefore must necessarily depend upon the signal he gets from the clear-channel group of stations. In many instances this signal is not even strong enough to give him service because of the edict of the Federal Communications Commission, which says in effect "you can't increase your power above 50 kilowatts despite the fact we know there are hundreds of thousands of people in the United States who do not get satisfactory radio reception and must turn to the reception afforded by the questionable operators of other nations."

The break-down of the survey is made by States: I am attempting to show the listener preference for stations by individual States. Taking a typical State as an example, I direct your attention to the break-down for West Virginia. You will note that Station WLW of Cincinnati was selected by 57.8 percent of the people of West Virginia who responded to the survey as the station of first preference; and that 43 percent of the replies from that State named WLW as their second choice; and that 27.2 percent of the replies received placed it in third position; and that 14.2 percent of those responding to my questionnaire said it was the fourth station of their choice. In several instances a single station was the choice in all positions. This percent is based on the total for day and night reception in a particular State. The other stations, in the way they were selected by rural listeners who replied to the questionnaire, follow in consecutive order on the chart. I invite your attention to the fact that only the clear-channel stations were selected in any great number by all of the rural listeners replying to the questionnaire scattered in each of the 14 States, the small local and regional stations eliciting only a small percent of the total. This clearly indicates that the type of service which these stations furnish is wholly inadequate to the needs of that great proportion of the American population in the continental limits of the United States living outside the metropolitan areas.

The Debate on Neutrality Reviewed

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial The Debate Reviewed, from the Washington Post of October 26, 1939, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 26, 1939]

THE DEBATE REVIEWED

Five weeks ago today President Roosevelt asked Congress, assembled in extraordinary session, for amendment of the existing neutrality law. During the intervening period the subject has been debated from many angles in the Senate, to say nothing of its discussion in less important forums in every American community. To the arguments which have been given such full expression little or nothing remains to be added. The final vote which is now approaching in the upper House is overdue.

On both sides there have been some outstanding speeches during the Senate debate. It has served to clarify a number of points on which there has been much public confusion. But on the whole the discussion, in retrospect, seems disappointing. That is because it has been unnecessarily protracted.

From the outset it was apparent that no fundamental issue divides the two camps. Both sides are, above all, insistent upon securing the peace of the United States. Both sides are anxious to formulate a policy that will meet all the requirements of traditional neutrality. Both sides are willing to sacrifice unquestionable national rights in order to strengthen insurance against American involvement in the present war.

For that reason the division of opinion has revolved around matters of procedure rather than of principle. It is not the propriety but the practical desirability of the suggested revisions which has been at issue.

Probably the most important of the issues thus clarified is the desirability of the existing embargo on the shipment of arms to belligerents. Since neutrality in international law has always envisaged such shipments, this issue has been examined from the viewpoint of whether a proper policy is also a wise policy. The Senate has in effect concluded that it is wise as well as wholly proper for us to let Great Britain and France purchase munitions in this country, provided the supplies are paid for in cash and transported in foreign ships.

From this decision, soon to be confirmed by vote, few will differ. Indeed, considering the overwhelming hostility of Americans to the philosophy underlying the present German Government, no other verdict could be regarded as possible. Opponents of embargo repeal have throughout been in the invidious position of seeming to favor a government which repudiates every principle for which America stands. That is why there has been so little heart in most of the speeches directed against embargo repeal.

The opponents of embargo repeal, however, have had one seemingly reasonable argument which has provided the second issue of consequence in the Senate debate. There are some who feel that while the arms embargo should never have been written into the law, it is nevertheless there and cannot be changed, during the course of hostilities, without taking an unneutral action. This is perhaps the most forceful argument advanced by those who argue that the embargo should be retained. None the less, it has been unable to stand up under scrutiny.

As the discussion has brought out, belligerents continuously change their policies in wartime. To say that a neutral cannot do the same, as long as measures taken apply to all belligerents, is to say that the rights of those at peace are determined wholly by the interests of those at war. Such an attitude accords neither with international law nor with traditional American policies.

The third real issue which has commanded practical attention in the Senate debate is the desirability of the sweeping restrictions on American shipping which were at first projected. To an increasing extent, as the debate proceeded, it has been made clear that many of these restraints would seriously damage our merchant marine without in any way serving as safeguards against war. So there has been revision here based on the reasonable argument that every surrender of a neutral right must be balanced by some positive advantage in behalf of peace.

National thinking on the subject of neutrality has been raised to a more intelligent level by the Senate debate. Even the time devoted to speeches which contributed nothing was not wholly wasted. But there is certainly no point in further reiteration of well-worn arguments when the measure gets to the House.

There are many Members of that body who are at least as expert on the subject as the Senate has shown itself to be. For that very reason they should be the more anxious to avoid further repetitious oration, and to press for the final vote which a patient administration has the right to expect at the earliest possible moment.

POEM BY JOHN W. DODD

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief but beautiful and timely poem composed by Mr. John W. Dodd, of St. Louis, Mo., formerly Corp. J. W. Dodd, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Field Artillery, Thirty-fifth Division, A. E. F., with whom I served in France. The poem is as follows:

THE CRIMSON TRAIL

O'er rolling hills, through valleys wind
A crimson trail on towards the Rhine,
O'er which some million men had passed,
To live and die, or choke from gas.

A trail of life, of death and pain,
Where men had fought through fog and rain;
From shattered trees and shell holes deep,
Machine gun bullets danced and leaped.

Where trees once grew with foliage green,
And waving wheat, for miles was seen,
Came guns of hate, with shell and gas,
To blot all memory of its past.

All little towns along the way
Were crushed and battered as of clay;
While fields that once grew poppies red
Became a roaring hell of lead.

On misfit homes or mud-soaked trench
Hit screaming shells, to tear and wrench
The life and limbs from every man
Who saw his shelter crushed as sand.

With dugouts deep, now concrete made,
Came little nests, where guns were laid,
Then mustard gas and liquid fire
Joined hands with rows of treacherous wire.

Where guns were roaring day and night,
And planes above swept left and right;
Men waited the hour to move ahead
Through fog, mist, and machine gun lead.

When orders were given and maps were read,
And every man had then been fed,
The hour comes, at break of dawn,
And men went over to carry on,

To take some hill, or woods, or town,
Where shell and pill box cut them down;
Or rows of wire held them fast
To die from wounds or choke from gas.

Where bayonets clashed or grenades were thrown,
Where hundreds died as mines were blown,
Where rats and lice and knee-deep mud
Were churned anew with bones and blood.

Where men went blind or nerves were shattered,
While others lay, their bodies battered;
Where all men lived on borrowed time,
For months and months in muck and slime.

Where valleys green, and quaint old towns,
Were scarred or leveled to the ground;
Beneath it all, five million sleep
This countless toll that war has reaped.

Who they are, from whence they came,
We do not know their town or name;
They rest in peace where valleys wind
With rolling hills up to the Rhine.

Democracy at the Crossroads

OF

HON. JOHN F. HUNTER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. EDWARD J. McCORMICK BEFORE THE MICHIGAN STATE MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Dr. Edward J. McCormick, A. M., M. D., F. A. C. S., F. I. C. S. (Geneva), before the Michigan State Medical Association, at Grand Rapids, Mich., September 19, 1939:

The United States of America is, beyond all question of doubt, the greatest country in the world and the greatest country in the history of the world. Its future possibilities, if the course outlined by its founders is pursued, challenge the imagination of a modern Jules Verne. And why, we may ask, are these facts now beyond dispute? The answer is in the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: (1) That all men are created equal; (2) that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; (3) that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; (4) that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Those who first dared the threats of ocean and the wildness of North American shore came willing to sacrifice and give their all that their children might have outlet for initiative, opportunity, dignity, equality, freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of thought, that they might escape persecution, serfdom, and regimentation. As a matter of fact, they were actually fleeing from the totalitarian philosophy of their day as many Europeans are trying to escape it in our present day. They realized that there could be no progress and no enduring success, collectively or individually, in lands where class hatred and discrimination existed, where the mentally and physically weak were frequently born to the scepter and purple, and where man was stripped of his likeness to God and relegated to the plane of the beasts of burden. They sought a government which existed for them, the people; they were tired of existing as pawns for a government, without right or privilege. History is replete with man's efforts to break the chains of slavery and the advance of civilization to its present status is evidence of his success.

We Americans owe a great debt to those pioneer forefathers who recognized the "inalienable rights" given to man by the Creator and not by form of government and who realized that men are created equal. Because of them and through their efforts, we in America have gained a higher degree of social and political equality than the people of any other country. We are constantly striving for equality of dignity and opportunity and economic equality, remembering, of course, that as Dr. Butler has said, "We cannot hope to shackle the more efficient that they may not outrun the less efficient."

So democracy, a government "by and for the people" was born in America, fathered and mothered by sturdy, God-loving men and women who then turned their hopeful faces and strong bodies in the direction of the setting sun to conquer the forests, the hills, the swamps, the rivers, the lakes, and the plains. They advanced from the Atlantic to the Pacific and earmarked for their posterity the United States of America. A free country for free, unshackled people.

Because of their desire for freedom and opportunity, because they suffered untold hardships, because they remembered God and His law and man's relationship to God, because they died on many battlefields to gain their and our "inalienable rights," because the Creator had fashioned for them a rich country, we, of America, control a large share of the world's gold; we use a great proportion of the world's telephone and telegraph facilities, more people in America own their own homes, possess stocks and bonds, and buy more insurance policies than the people in any other country or group of countries. Likewise, we Americans operate the greater percentage of the world's motorcars, and it has been said that the housewives of the State of California own and operate more modern household equipment than any country outside of the United States. So have our schools and colleges come to represent millions and millions of dollars and our educational systems, public and private, to be superior to those of any other land and some of our States to have more and better elementary schools and high schools and colleges than are possessed in some instances by entire nations.

Our universities and professional schools now lead the world. America's cathedrals and art museums can fearlessly challenge those of the Old World. The skyline of New York City is a source of amazement to the educated European visitor. "See America first" is good advice, for nowhere under heaven's canopy can its wonders, its advances be remotely approximated. We are ahead of any country or group of countries in any department of necessity or luxury which one can care to mention. God has blessed us with fertile lands, with hills that are filled with gold and silver, with a great supply of timber, with coal and oil and gas. The climate in the United States is varied, and one can pick his or her own weather conditions. These things, and freedom of speech, of the press, of worship, and social and political equality are yours and mine. because we live in a democracy. Our engineers, our jurists, our writers, our financiers, our statesmen, and our medical and surgical men, though young as groups, have in every instance walked as world's masters in their various vocations.

Medicine in America has been in the vanguard of advance under democracy. Our medical schools, our medical centers, our great clinics, our hospitals, are now the envy of the civilized world. Those who have traveled in foreign lands in search of medical lore know this to be true. The greatest advances in medicine in the last half century have been made here by our physicians and research workers. They have written the most brilliant chapters in disease prevention and therapy in the history of medicine.

In spite of these facts and with American medicine at the head of the medical world, there are those who feel that the doctor's rights should be taken from him—medical men regimented and the treatment of the sick taken over by the Government, the first step in democracy's downfall and the beginning of the end of initiative and progress. This idea is based largely on the fallacious thought that medical service is not available and within the means of a large percentage of the people, and the idea is constantly emphasized by self-seeking politicians, job hunters, and others who are in some instances selfish, in others uninformed, and in still other instances, desirous of promoting basic changes which would eventually bring to us dictatorship or, to say the least, wreck democracy. It is safe to say that these individuals will not stop when medicine has been socialized.

Those who have studied the medical situation know, however, that "the number of physicians in the United States is greater by approximately 19,000 than the combined number of physicians in Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Poland, Belgium, and Holland, despite the fact that the combined population in these 11 countries exceeds the population of the United States by 90,000,000." In 1886 there was 1 physician for every 662 persons in the United States; in 1938 there was 1 physician for every 786 individuals. In addition, there have been great improvements in transportation and means of communication. In physician's and nurse's training, and in auxiliary personnel and equipment, we Americans occupy a position of leadership in the medical world. We have recognized quality rather than quantity, and medical standards and requirements in our country are exceptionally high by comparison and well-trained medical men have been distributed over our great land to the extent that in 1936 there were only 241 counties in the United States that had more than 2,000 persons per physician, which is a more equitable distribution than is to be found in the older and more thickly settled countries of Europe. This has been accomplished with an elevation of medical education standards for the protection of the public of our country against treatment by physicians who are inadequately prepared and gives assurance to all, throughout the land, of the highest type of medical training available in the world. It has been pointed out that trains, automobiles, and airplanes, today, can bring patients a hundred or even a thousand miles for treatment more easily than the patient of a generation ago could be transported over dirt roads to a doctor 10 miles away, and yet the supply of physicians in rural districts is far better in the United States than in any country which boasts "state medicine" or government control. The survey made by the American Medical Association, with the aid of State and county medical groups, though incomplete on August 1, 1939, showed that 25 percent of physicians gave free care to 3,000,000 individuals, and rendered 2,000,000 hours of free care to hospitals and clinics. It has been estimated that each day the physicians of this country contribute more than $1,000,000 in medical service, or the staggering sum of $365,000,000 a year in voluntary free service, to those unable to pay. Every doctor in the country has a part pay and a free clientele.

The elevation of standards in medicine in our country have progressed to a point where a physician must meet certain requirements before he can become a specialist in any field of medicine or surgery. There are now 13 boards which examine prospective specialists and if found sufficient in all requirements, certify him as proficient in his specialty. The so-called general practitioner today is a man who has completed high school, college, medical school, and 1 or 2 years' internship and taken postgraduate work at intervals. If he desires to specialize, several additional years of apprenticeship and study are necessary. The medical man of today has spent more time and money learning his profession than any man in any other profession or business. The system of private practice in the United States has offered a desirable field to a larger number of individuals in relation to the population to enter than any country in which state medicine prevails, and consequently we have more and better trained physicians per small-population quota. Free choice of physicians makes it possible for the doctor to be judged by his patients and to increase his practice according to his ability and his willingness to serve, and this system has gone further in the conquest of disease and the postponement of death, as shown by actual statistics, than the systems in any country that have abandoned private practice.

From 1928 to 1938 there was an increase of 61,987 hospital beds in the United States. During this period the number of unoccupied beds increased by 8,919. In 1938, there was an average daily census of 132,454 empty beds in general hospitals. A study of the distribution of hospitals shows that less than 3,000,000 persons throughout the vast area of the United States are farther than 30 miles from a hospital registered by the American Medical Association. We can rightfully ask, therefore, Why the proposed unwarranted expenditure of your moneys and mine for additional hospital beds when no real need has been shown? And why should the Government be expected to become the competitor of the private hospitals which have been serving and struggling and sacrificing through the years? In 1938 there were 132,454 empty beds each day in our general hospitals—if present construction trends continue, there would be 147,000 vacancies in 1942, but if the proposed construction program, now before our country's lawmakers, comes to pass, we would have 526,000 general hospital beds with a probable corresponding increase in vacancies. What a headache for our community-chest directors! As a matter of fact, what a headache for all of us!

Much has been said about morbidity and morality in States where the population has lower incomes, among so-called poorer people, and this has been advanced as an argument in favor of government medicine. But no amount of physicians and building of additional hospitals will substitute for lack of food, clothing, and housing. Give the people of these localities health education, proper and decent food, clean homes, toilet facilities, and shoes, and decent wages, and the incidence of malaria, hookworm, and pellagara, and other diseases will decline, Senator WAGNER to the contrary notwithstanding. Recent death-rate statistics prove that despite our large Negro population, which in some localities has a death rate of twice the white population, we in America have accomplished more than any other large nation, and it is pertinent to observe that in Australia and New Zealand, which countries have for years had the lowest mortality rates in the world for the entire population and also for mothers and infants, that those who have sought political and financial advantage from sickness insurance and government medical control have never ceased to fight to obtain it; and Australia, having spent $5,000,000 in preparation for its introduction, became convinced of its undesirability, and early in 1939 the Government withdrew its support.

I tell you of America's supremacy and greatness and of medicine's development to focus your attention upon the fact that under democracy a free people have captured world leadership in all phases of human endeavor. To the shores of this land of ours have come men and women who have realized that here the rail splitter would be given equal opportunity to prove himself worthy of the highest office in the land. Initiative of the individual has not been curtailed, and America is today the youngest, yet the greatest of countries.

Despite legion evidence of development, prosperity, and world leadership, we now find democracy and all that it represents threatened in many and devious ways; and there is danger, unless we become less complacent, that the very medium which made us great in art, in science, in finance, and in medicine will be taken from us.

I have but to remind you that in our public-school systems and in our great colleges and universities there are men and women who have cast God out of their hearts, who have turned their backs upon "government by and for the people," and who are openly advocating changes in our form of government that, to say the very least, would bring us to the brink of communism and totalitarianism. Like individuals have made their ways into city, State, and governmental agencies; they are holding offices in labor unions, stirring up strife and discord and doing everything possible to interfere with economic progress to the end that democracy may be discredited. I have said many times that labor is the backbone of democracy. We know that under democracy labor has made great strides and that the laboring man occupies a position in this country far above the plane on which he is placed in any other land, but you know and I know that unless labor relieves itself of the services of communistic racketeers the failure of labor is inevitable. The chains of regimented serfdom are likely to replace the full dinner pail and the machine in every garage. Recent investigations point to the so-called Workers' Alliance, an organization composed largely of W. P. A. workers, as being dominated by communistic individuals who are sowing seeds of discord, stirring up class hatred, and planning interference with all the orderly principles of government, preaching communism to its members, opposing all the ideals of Americanism, and encouraging the workers to scuttle the very ship that has saved them. I can but remind you this evening that one of the leaders of this sort of thing in America has written in his book, "The revolution does not simply happen, it must be made." The Dies committee has pointed out that documentary evidence indicated that "Communist leaders assumed great credit for the organization of steel, automobile, and other industries and the direction of the strikes which followed." "This committee has established," one reads in its report, "on the basis of the Communist Party's own literature, that Communists are actively boring from within churches, schools, youth organizations, and every other organization and institution into which they can find entrance." I feel that they are boring from within as far as medicine is concerned. All reports indicate that the largest of Communist front movements in the United States is the American League for Peace and Democracy, formerly known as the League Against War and Fascism.

Second only to this organization is the Workers' Alliance. Communism is definitely on the march in America. Likewise, I would warn you that the godless philosophy which has worked its reign of terror in Germany, is rapidly penetrating the United States and that many Fascist organizations, disguised as patriotic and Christian groups, are spreading a type of hatred and intolerance which is incubated on foreign soil and brought here to grow, and foreign dictators are using and will use every possible method to cause disintegration of democracy in the United States of America. The future of dictators is in danger so long as a free nation exists marching on to greater triumphs. The German-American Bund and the Italian Black Shirts have no place in the United States but they are here.

Can any sane American question the advance of paternalism, of socialistic tendencies, and communistic teachings? And who is there with the courage to state that socialized medicine is not a part of this type of philosophy? When government takes over medical facilities and personnel, it is only a step to similar control of dentistry, law, and business. Socialized medicine forms the opening wedge, not only for the loss of initiative and progress in medicine, but the loss of initiative and progress in all other fields. It is sponsored largely by job seekers and politicians who know little or nothing of medicine but who desire to create another political football and build a greater stadium for the massacre of the hapless taxpayer.

We voters, whether Republicans or Democrats, must soon realize that genuine prosperity must come from the productive industry of the citizens of our Republic. The Twentieth Century Fund has said, "That in the long run no government can continue year after year to incur substantial deficits and to increase its debts steadily if it wishes to maintain its credit." It likewise states that the total Government debts, of all governments, in the United States, "are the largest that any nation has ever had." It is fallacious indeed to believe, as the Honorable HARRY BYRD has said, "that a national debt is a national blessing and that recovery is born of debts and deficits." The proponents of the Wagner bill have the courage to propose to appropriate over $600,000,000 for its purposes and it is likely that the cost will exceed even the report of the Technical Committee on Medical Care of the Interdepartmental Committee on Coordination of Health and Welfare Activities of the Federal Government, which estimates that the Wagner bill, for the period 1939–42, would require $1,700,000,000. It is entirely in the realm of possibility that the Wagner bill program could double the present Federal Budget within the next decade. "Serious depression occurred in the summer of 1937," according to a bulletin of the Ohio State Chamber of Commerce, "and in the opinion of business and tax students, this depression was chiefly caused by excessive tax burden imposed by the Social Security Act, together with other high Federal taxes imposed upon business." Can the United States stand the shock of the Wagner program without another depression? The school child could answer that question.

Knowing that local medical facilities are adequate in the vast majority of all of our subdivisions, that local administration of health matters in the various States is to be preferred, and feeling that Federal interference is not needed and that all States can intelligently look after the medical needs of their indigent, and realizing that no adequate survey of supposed needs has been made, feeling that thousands of private institutions should not be forced to compete with Government institutions, recognizing the fact that the great structure of medicine in our Nation would be destroyed and inferior service given to all the people, and resenting political domination and useless expenditure of Government's funds, our money, and gigantic increase in the Nation's debt—believing that socialization of medicine is the first blow at the foundation of democracy, we, as citizens and physicians, are in duty bound to condemn Senate bill 1620, known as the Wagner bill, or any similar bill designed to undermine medicine and eventually destroy our democracy. Our system of free enterprise is at stake.

Every man and woman should give a part of his or her time each day to an interest in city, county, State, and National Government. Democracy has and will continue to function if each of us will take the time and trouble to do his duty. Physicians must come to realize that while they were born to heal, that they must likewise do their share in the preservation not only of the sacred traditions of medicine but in the preservation of the rights of man. Democracy in America is at the crossroads. Shall you and I permit the selfish, the unthinking, and the un-American to guide her onto the road of socialized medicine, in the direction of totalitarianism and communism, or shall we take our places in the political picture and fight for democracy, the very soul of American greatness and

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY HON. JOSEPH A. CONRY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a very interesting article written by Hon. Joseph A. Conry, of Boston, former Member of Congress, which appeared in the Daily Republican, of Springfield, Mass., on October 20, 1939.

The article is as follows:

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Daily Republican of October 20, 1939]

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS—PROPOSAL FOR ADHERING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LAW DOCTRINE

To the EDITOR OF THE REPUBLICAN:

Our metropolitan newspapers are devoting much editorial space to the matter of the plight into which Congress would push our merchant marine by way of the so-called neutrality bill. First, our shipowners were told they must keep out of the ports and harbors of belligerents; also out of adjacent waters where the belligerents were looking for game. Examination of the bill disclosed that this would most effectually drive American ships to their mooring berths at their home ports.

It is true the overwhelming sentiment of Americans is with the Allies at the present time. The brutality and wickedness of Hitler have aroused the hatred and abhorrence of the American people, stimulating their blood sympathy for England and sentimental affection for France.

Notwithstanding these facts, senatorial debate has aroused the American people to inquire, "Why should we be compelled to surrender our rights on the sea because two or more nations decide to enter war?" We are answered that to avoid every possibility of involvement in this war, our ships are forbidden by American law to enter certain danger zones, areas occupied by fighting ships of the belligerents. Thus the sharp juridical sword of modern war extends its sweeping reach and scalping edge from old-time 3-mile limits of port blockades to vast ocean spaces.

We may be reluctant to admit its justice, but we are compelled to recognize its potency. The United States has the industrial capacity to fabricate all the war weapons needed by world belligerents. As evidence of our acceptance of the rights claimed by the warring powers to establish so-called danger zones and our willingness to renounce our rights to freely sail the open seas, Congress has proposed that American ships must give up their rights to carry commerce, even of the most harmless nature, if any belligerent sails a submarine into a quiet haven for rest and observation. At the same time we invite all foreign ships to enter our ports to buy any and all goods they wish to carry, our only stipulation being that cash shall be paid for the goods before the foreigner leaves our harbor.

By forbidding American vessels this highly profitable trade we have presented to British shipping a magnificent monopoly, at the expense of the American taxpayer. When this fact is made clear, doubt appears in American minds as to the wisdom of the pending legislation. Our sympathies have destroyed our commerce on the sea.

Grotius, one of the earliest writers on the subject, insisted that every nation is free to travel and trade with every other nation, the fundamental theory of the freedom of the seas. Our own Admiral Mahan displayed a better theory in his Influence of Sea Power on History, where we learn that sea power is the decisive factor in war.

Beginning with our first treaty of amity and commerce with Prussia, in 1785, we have consistently sought protection for all private property not contraband of war, from capture and destruction by belligerents. Three of our wisest men, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson, negotiated that treaty which employed the slogan in article 12, "Free vessels make free goods."

Congress emphasized this doctrine by resolution of April 28, 1904, and our delegates to the second Hague conference, in 1907, brought this principle before the convention, securing 21 votes out of a possible 44.

Due to recent contemptuous dismissal of treaties, as well as our experience in the World War, common sense teaches us that freedom of the seas in time of war between two powerful maritime nations is a mere airy abstraction. We have renounced all we ever sought, abandoned our ideals, and have agreed with the belligerents to erect a lightning rod electric sign, "no trespassing," for American vessels, but open to any other ship which cares to make the try.

Vattel says, "A nation that without any other motive than the prospect of gain is employed in strengthening my enemy, without regard to how far I may suffer, gives me a right to consider and treat it as an associate of my enemy."

Our outspoken sympathies are for the Allies, yet we hope to preserve an outward appearance of neutrality. Are we facing a dilemma? Are we not inviting Germany to partake of a Barmecidal feast, while the Allies get their fill of everything?

Of course, we have the right to legislate for the sale and delivery of our own goods. We enjoy the absolute right of possession and sale, with all the rights of imposing conditions. Let us agree to sell war materials to all nations under the conditions that the goods shall be delivered in American ships and with a firm agreement with warring powers that no American vessels shall be attacked on any water of the world.

By this arrangement we favor no one, we exercise our right and privilege without fear or favor. It is beyond belief that any belligerent will refuse to accept these equitable terms as evidence of the full and absolute neutrality of the United States.

We advocate the freedom of the seas for all, we insist upon this freedom for American ships. If any nation declines to join with us in this wholesome rule of law, let him look for no assistance in his battles from the United States.

JOSEPH A. CONRY.

United States Exports of Agricultural Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, trade data released by the Department of Commerce today showing the foreign trade of the United States for September 1939 reveal some highly satisfactory increases in exports of agricultural products compared with September 1938.

Exports of unmanufactured cotton increased from a value of $20,511,000 in September 1938 to $35,661,000 in September of this year. In addition to the exports of cotton there were increases in exports of canned fruit, dairy products, lard, flour, vegetables and vegetable products, and other foodstuffs.

During the earlier months of this year the value of total exports of agricultural products was somewhat lower compared to the totals of last year. In a very large measure this falling-off was due to the necessity which European countries faced to purchase abroad huge quantities of articles for national-defense purposes. The enormous expenditures required for such purchases left foreign countries with very little available foreign exchange with which to buy certain other products from the United States, notably agricultural products. The value of total agricultural exports for September of this year rose to $74,579,000, or nearly the same value as in September 1938. Though exports of grain, fresh fruit, and tobacco were smaller in September of this year compared to the same month of last year, the increases in cotton, dairy products, canned fruit, flour, lard, and vegetables nearly counterbalance the decline in other items. Shipments of cotton to the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Spain, and a number of other European countries were much larger in September 1939 than in September 1938.

The following table shows United States exports of agricultural products for September 1938 and 1939:

United States exports of agricultural products

Items	September
	1938	1939
Cotton, unmanufactured	$20,511,000	$35,661,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	23,150,000	9,860,000
Wheat	3,483,000	2,530,000
Corn	4,788,000	1,121,000
Fruits, fresh, dried, evaporated, and canned	10,339,000	8,977,000
Meat products	2,179,000	2,384,000
Lard	1,670,000	1,906,000
Dairy products, except fresh milk	693,000	837,000
Wheat flour	1,646,000	2,434,000
Oil cake and meal	775,000	701,000
Vegetables, fresh, dried and canned	1,003,000	1,513,000
Other foodstuffs	4,772,000	5,607,000
Total	75,009,000	73,531,000

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] in a colloquy this morning was complaining of our trade treaty on vegetables. It will be observed that our vegetable exports have increased 50 percent in 1 year.

The outbreak of armed hostilities on the European Continent brings into sharp relief against the background of our sad experience during the past quarter of a century the necessity to give intelligent support to the efforts of our Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, in expanding the trade-agreements program in order to increase our commerce and promote more friendly feelings with our South American sister republics in order to cushion as much as possible the impact of the extraordinary conditions arising from the European conflict.

But there is a larger economic consideration involved in the desirability to expand and implement the reciprocal trade agreements program. Wars come to an end, and if we are to avoid the impairment of normal international economic relations which so disastrously retarded our material progress during the period of reconstruction following the first World War, there must be kept alive somewhere in the world a clear understanding of the failures of the recent past and of the dangers which lie ahead if these failures are repeated.

Repeal the Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 25, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GIFFORD PINCHOT

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me I include in my remarks a speech delivered over the radio by former Gov. Gifford Pinchot of my State. Governor Pinchot has eloquently defended the cause of those who are trying to repeal the unneutral arms embargo.

The address is as follows:

I am for repealing the embargo and for cash and carry, and I am here to give you my reasons. My first and most important reason is that we want—we all want—the United States to keep out of this war.

To begin with let's get politics out of the way. I am a Republican, but I am an American first. I am for the administration's plan of embargo repeal and cash and carry, but not because it will be good for the Republican Party or good for the Democatic Party or good for any party or individual whatsoever. I am for it because it will be good for all the people of the United States, regardless of party.

This question is too big to be dealt with on political lines. Through its influence on the world this war will affect every human being in America, and for the matter of that every human being in the whole earth, before we see the last of it. To play politics with so great a question would be cheap and small beyond description.

Now, let's get down to brass tacks. There are two main reasons why I believe every American ought to be for no embargo and cash and carry. The first reason for no embargo and cash and carry, I repeat, is that the sure way to keep us out of war is to do all we can to see that the Allies are able to win the war without us. If they win, we know that we shall be at peace.

The second reason is that we do not want to live in a world armed to the teeth and dominated by international gangsters and burglars. Yet that is precisely what Hitler's victory would mean.

With all the strength and conviction I can express, I say that it is vitally necessary for us—for the United States—that justice and not force shall rule the world of which we are a part.

That is what this war is about. This is a war to decide whether force shall rule the world, or whether justice shall have a chance. It is a war to decide whether small nations shall have a right to be safe, and whether great nations can be safe only when armed to the teeth. It is a war to decide whether we are to live in a world controlled on the principles of the wolf pack, or a world controlled on the principles of the New Testament—a world in which the faith of nations can be trusted.

This is a free country. We mean to keep it so, at any cost. We want to live in a free world. We want to live with and trade with free peoples. Therefore we cannot be indifferent to whatever threatens to destroy the freedom we prize.

Our country is the great example and apostle of freedom and democracy. We believe in those things. And if we believe in them for ourselves we must believe in them for others also. Naturally, we sympathize with the defenders of freedom and are opposed to the spread of totalitarian tyranny.

The extension of dictatorship in the world is wrong, and it is against our interest; the extension of freedom in the world is right, and it is for our interest. On that point we took our stand long ago when President Monroe enunciated the Doctrine which bears his name.

This war will decide whether we can live at peace and security, or whether we must be eternally on the watch, armed and ready to keep the abominable Hitler system of tyranny, paganism, concentration camps, blood purges, lying-for-conquest, and conquest by force out of this hemisphere. To Hitler right and wrong are just words. But it means something to us when principles are at stake.

If the Allies win, we know by long experience their victory will bring no threat to peace in the Americas. But if Hitler should win, the story will not be the same. Remember that the Nazis have already given abundant notice of their desire to dominate certain South American countries.

Have you thought what might happen if Hitler should win and should attempt to take over the English and French colonies on this side of the Atlantic—Bermuda, Nassau, and the Islands of the Caribbean? How would you like it if a despotism whose god is force, which denies to its people all the liberties guaranteed to us by the Constitution, which looks on small nations as its natural prey, and whose word is utterly worthless—how would you like it if such a tyranny should undertake to extend its military rule to America? We would stop it, of course, but how much trouble that would mean no one can tell.

Have you thought what it would mean to the world if Nazi victory should spread the Nazi standards of faith and conduct over the earth? What chance would there be of world cooperation for peace if Hitler should win the war? Can the world cooperate for peace with a despotism whose law is force? And yet world cooperation for peace is one of our greatest needs.

Do not get me wrong. If Hitler and his Nazis should win this war—which Heaven forbid—I do not believe he would send soldiers to invade the United States. But I do believe that a victory by Hitler would in the end force us to defend the freedom of this hemisphere against nazi-ism and all that goes with it.

I am deeply convinced that the United States ought to keep out of this war and can keep out of this war. But whatever we do we cannot keep from being affected by the war, and whatever we do we cannot avoid affecting the outcome of the war.

If we maintain the embargo, we shall be helping Hitler; if we repeal the embargo, we shall be helping the democracies. We are neutral and we ought to keep on being neutral. But whatever we do, we cannot help helping one side or the other.

We are neutral and we ought to be neutral, but there is no use hiding our heads in the sand. It is no more a violation of neutrality to repeal the embargo, which will help the Allies, than to maintain the embargo, which is helping Hitler right now. The question is, Which course will be best for the people of the United States? There can be but one answer to that.

General Washington was right. We want to stay away from purely European questions. But this is not the same kind of a world as when Washington spoke. Then it took a month or two to hear from a friend in Europe. Today the clippers make it in a day or two. Today you can telephone to a man in Europe and get him in 5 minutes. It's a whole lot smaller world than it used to be.

The time has long gone by when any nation on earth can live to itself alone in a watertight compartment. As President Cleveland said, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. We must deal with things as they are and not as they used to be. We must do the thing that will keep us out of this war today—and that is no embargo and cash and carry.

Not long ago Senator BORAH assured us there would be no war. Well, there is a war. It is just possible that he may be equally mistaken when he assures us that isolation is the answer to the maiden's prayer.

As a matter of cold fact, there is no such thing as isolation any more. Perhaps there was in 1492, when Columbus sailed the ocean blue, but not today. Whatever we do or whatever we don't, we are still a part of the world in which we live, and nothing that happens between nations can fail to affect us either for good or for evil.

I repeat that there is no such thing as isolation is the world today. Indeed, the embargo itself is a denial of isolation. Unless and until we can move to the moon, there is no way we can keep the actions and the affairs of the other nations of the world from having an effect upon us. Whether we like it or not, that is the fact.

So much for BORAH. What about Lindbergh?

For Lindbergh, the flyer, we all have the greatest admiration. But I see nothing whatever in his record that gives him authority to tell the American people what they ought to do in the face of a great war. Neither can I see the slightest sense or reason in his amazing demand that Canada shall give up her membership in the British commonwealth of nations.

In spite of the overwhelming demonstration now being made in Europe that a strong defense is often the most powerful attack, Colonel Lindbergh, like Mr. Hoover, wants us to make a distinction between offensive and defensive weapons for export to the Allies. To my mind, this Hoover-Lindbergh distinction is just what Major Eliot called it—"emotional nonsense." Perhaps Colonel Lindbergh can tell us on which side of his distinction a rifle in the hands of an infantryman would fall.

Furthermore, and far more important, this is the second time Lindbergh has given Hitler a helping hand. The first time was when his report on the air strength of Hitler and the Allies had so large a part in bringing on the surrender at Munich. And now, again, the Nazis are comforted and encouraged by what Lindbergh has to say.

Another matter. You may not like England or you may not like France. You may hear it said that France and England are not democracies. If that were true, how did it happen that the people of France and England refused to stand for Hitlerism when their Governments were sunk in appeasement? But it was Hitler who forced this war, and not the German people, who wanted and still want peace.

You may hold it against the Allies that the war debts have not been paid. You may charge them with having acquired many parts of their empires by methods of which today we do not approve. But when you make that charge, don't forget that times have changed, and especially don't forget that nothing either France or England ever did in times gone by begins to compare in brutality and outlawry with what Hitler has done in the last year.

The Allies are charged with imperialism. I could argue that point. But if we admit it, which would you rather have, the imperialism of the Allies or the nazi-ism of Hitler? It seems to me there is only one choice.

Suppose a gang of burglars had begun to operate in your town and had broken into and robbed the houses of people you knew and thought well of. Suppose the chief of police had not always led a model life, that he owed you money, and that you did not like him anyhow; would you let that keep you from encouraging him to put down the burglars? I don't think it would. Yet that is precisely the kind of situation which faces us as between Hitler and the Allies.

The sort of thing Hitler stands for we can't stand for. We know that if the Allies win, this will be a better world, for Hitlerism will not be on top. If the Allies win, there will be a chance, and I believe a good chance this time, for a peace that will last—a peace in which no nation will be deprived of what it needs to live.

But we know that if Hitler wins it will be a worse world—a very much worse world, a world in which force and not justice will be on top. You who are listening to me know that just as surely as I do.

There is not a man or woman listening to me tonight who is more anxious to keep out of war than I am. I don't want my son to go to war any more than you want yours. What I do want above all lesser matters is to see the sons and daughters of American fathers and mothers freed from the threat of service overseas. I am for no embargo and cash and carry because that is the way to keep them home, because that is the way to peace, because that is the best thing for America.

We are fortunate indeed that other nations across the sea are fighting the things we hate—cruelty, aggression, the ruthless rule of force. If they win, the whole world, ourselves included, will win with them.

The way for us to stay out of war, now and in the future, is to help in every way we can short of war to prevent the victory of Hitler and the spread of Hitlerism over the earth. And the more we postpone doing what Hitler does not want us to do, the longer we put off repealing the embargo, the harder will be the task of keeping freedom alive.

It is almost unthinkable that we should be helping the unspeakable Hitler, as we are doing by maintaining our embargo. That we should not only be helping Hitler but helping him against the right and against our own interest—that is just simply ridiculous.

Let me repeat. Like you, I am for America, first, last, and all the time. I am for staying out of the war. No embargo and cash and carry—there you have the answer.

Chronology of American Foreign Policy From July 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

STUDY PREPARED BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a study of the chronology of American foreign policy which I have prepared.

There being no objection, the chronology was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Here is a chronology of important events, including excerpts from speeches, relating to American foreign policy from the summer of 1937 to date. It indicates the trend of the administration's foreign policy since the dramatic "quarantine" speech by the President on October 5, 1937, which was a startling reversal of the Democratic Party platform pledge respecting neutrality and the President's Chautauqua speech. The purpose of this foreign policy has been twofold: The first of these is to have the United States play a decisive role in the affairs of Europe and the Far East. The second is to throw the weight of the United States toward helping England and France in every possible way, short of war. The latter has been manifest in the administration's support of the foreign policy of England and France, whatever it happens to be at a particular time—nonintervention toward Spain, appeasement toward Hitler and Mussolini through Munich and up to March 1939, a united front against Germany since then. It identifies our own national interests with those of England and France and is based on the assumption that they are our first line of defense. This chronology must be read against the background of popular American determination to steer clear of foreign quarrels and stay out of foreign wars—as manifested in the neutrality legislation of 1935, 1936, and 1937.

The proposed repeal of the arms embargo, the proposed weakening of the credit provisions of the act, the proposed repetition of the armed-merchantmen-submarine controversy, the proposed discretionary power to the President on war zones—all these are only the latest, but evidently not the last, measures and indications of an attitude of partisanship and involvement from 1937 to 1939.

(NOTE.—The Washington Information Service (W. I. S.) used sometimes as a reference in the following pages, is written by William T. Stone, vice president of the Foreign Policy Association.)

JULY 1937

JULY 16. OUTBREAK OF ARMED CONFLICT IN FAR EAST—SECRETARY HULL LAYS DOWN PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL CONDUCT

On outbreak of fighting in Far East, Secretary of State Hull, on July 16, issues circular note to nations of the world laying down principles of international conduct. The United States stands, he says, "for the maintenance of peace. We advocate national and international self-restraint. We advocate abstinence by all nations from use of force in pursuit of policy and from interference in the internal affairs of other nations. We advocate adjustment of problems in international relations by processes of peaceful negotiation and agreement. We advocate faithful observance of international agreements. Upholding the principles of the sanctity of treaties, we believe in modification of provisions of treaties, when need therefor arises, by orderly processes carried out in a spirit of mutual helpfulness and accommodation. We believe in respect by all nations for the rights of others and performance by all nations of established obligations. We stand for revitalizing and strengthening of international law. We advocate steps toward promotion of economic security and stability the world over. We advocate lowering or removing of excessive barriers in international trade. We seek effective equality of commercial opportunity and we urge upon all nations application of the principle of equality of treatment." (And So to War, by Hubert Herring, p. 25.)

"This Government does not believe in political alliances or entanglements, nor does it believe in extreme isolation. It does believe in international cooperation for the purpose of seeking through pacific methods the achievement of those objectives set forth in the statement of July 16." (State Department Press Releases, August 28, 1937, pp. 166–167.)

SEPTEMBER 1937

SEPTEMBER 22. STATE DEPARTMENT PROTESTS BOMBARDMENT OF NANKING

State Department protests bombardment of Nanking, reserves "all rights" of United States Government and nationals, and objects * * * "both to such jeopardizing of the lives of its nationals and of noncombatants generally, and to the suggestion that its official and nationals now residing in and around Nanking should withdraw from the areas in which they are lawfully carrying on their legitimate activities." (State Department Press Releases, September 25, 1937, p. 256.)

SEPTEMBER 25. ADMIRAL YARNELL ON PROTECTING CITIZENS IN CHINA

"The policy of the commander in chief during the present emergency is to employ United States naval forces under his command so as to offer all possible protection and assistance to our nationals in cases where needed. Naval vessels will be stationed in ports where American citizens are concentrated and will remain there until it is no longer possible or necessary to protect them or until they have been evacuated.

"This policy, based on our duties and obligations, will be continued as long as the present controversy between China and Japan exists, and will continue in full force even after our nationals have been warned to leave China and after an opportunity to leave has been given.

"Most American citizens now in China are engaged in businesses or professions which are their only means of livelihood. * * *

"In giving assistance and protection our naval forces may at times be exposed to dangers which will in most cases be slight, but in any case these risks must be accepted." (New York Times, September 25, 1937.)

OCTOBER 1937

OCTOBER 3. LONG-DISTANCE BLOCKADE OF JAPAN

On October 3 the New York Sunday News carried in its pictorial section a two-page map of the Pacific under the caption "Long-distance blockade." This line was divided in two parts, one of which was labeled "Blockade line controlled by British Fleet," and the other, "Blockade line controlled by United States Fleet." (And So to War, by Hubert Herring, p. 30.)

OCTOBER 5. PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S "QUARANTINE" SPEECH AT CHICAGO

President Roosevelt delivers "quarantine" speech at Chicago, in which he declares: "* * * The peace-loving nations must make a concerted effort in opposition to those violations of treaties and those ignorings of humane instincts which today are creating a state of international anarchy and instability, from which there is no escape through mere isolation or neutrality. * * *

"It seems to be unfortunately true that the epidemic of world lawlessness is spreading.

"When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease.

"It is my determination to pursue a policy of peace and to adopt every practicable measure to avoid involvement in war. * * *

"War is a contagion, whether it be declared or undeclared. It can engulf states and peoples remote from the original scene of hostilities. We are determined to keep out of war, yet we cannot insure ourselves against the disastrous effects of war and the dangers of involvement. We are adopting such measures as will minimize our risk of involvement, but we cannot have complete protection in a world of disorder in which confidence and security have broken down.

"If civilization is to survive, the principles of the Prince of Peace must be restored. Shattered trust between nations must be revived.

"Most important of all, the will for peace on the part of peace-loving nations must express itself to the end that nations that may be tempted to violate their agreements and the rights of others will desist from such a cause. There must be positive endeavors to preserve peace.

"America hates war. America hopes for peace. Therefore, America actively engages in the search for peace." (State Department Press Releases, October 9, 1937, pp. 277–279.)

Reiterates sentiments expressed on July 16. He went on to say:

"It is the common duty of all nations not only to practice such relations with respect to each other but to stand ready to contribute, in every practicable way, toward the creation of conditions and toward the formulation and application of specific measures which will render possible the upbuilding of a peaceful and prosperous world." (State Department Press Releases, October 23, 1937, pp. 318–320.)

In reply to Congressman FISH'S criticism of the President's failure to apply the neutrality law in the Far East, Congressman MCREYNOLDS defended administration policy on the following grounds: (1) That the President was acting within his legal authority in declining to recognize a state of war; (2) that the purpose of the neutrality bill was to keep the country out of war and the present policy followed this idea; (3) that the policy of the State Department has been the wisest policy that could be pursued. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, November 17, 1937, p. 93.)

DECEMBER 4. CONGRESSMAN CASE QUESTIONS STATE DEPARTMENT ON FOREIGN POLICY

November 24, Congressman CASE introduces H. R. 364, asking the Secretary of State nine questions on our foreign policy in the Far East. In replying December 4, to a question regarding application of the Neutrality Act Secretary Hull says:

"The entering into force of the restrictive provisions of the Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, is left to and is dependent upon decision of the President by a finding that 'there exists a state of war.' The policy of the Department of State in reference to this act is dependent upon that decision. The Department of State keeps constantly in mind the fact that the principal purpose of the act is to keep the United States out of war."

In reply to a question regarding United States armed forces in the Far East, Secretary Hull says:

"American armed forces in China are there for the protection of American nationals, primarily against mobs or other uncontrolled elements. They have no mission of aggression." (State Department Press Releases, December 11, 1937, pp. 415–417.)

Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden, speaking in House of Commons on December 21, states that, "There are two possible forms of sanctions: Ineffective, which are not worth putting on; and effective, which means a risk if not a certainty of war. No one can contemplate any action of that kind in the Far East unless they are convinced that they have overwhelming force to back their policy." (New York Times, December 22, 1937.)

JANUARY 1938

JANUARY 6. PRESIDENT'S LETTER OPPOSING WAR REFERENDUM

Speaker BANKHEAD, on January 6, reads the President's letter to the House in which he characterized the war-referendum resolution as "incompatible with our representative form of government." He stated further:

"Such an amendment to the Constitution as that proposed would cripple any President in his conduct of our foreign relations, and it would encourage other nations to believe that they could violate American rights with impunity." (State Department Press Releases, January 15, 1938, p. 99.)

JANUARY 8. HULL'S LETTER OPPOSING WAR REFERENDUM

On January 8 Secretary Hull addressed a letter to Congressman McReynolds in which he said:

"It is my judgment that under our present form of government 'of the people, by the people, and for the people,' our foreign affairs can be conducted far more efficiently from the standpoint of keeping this country out of war than would be at all possible under the operation of any such plan as the Ludlow resolution proposes. After the fullest consideration I am satisfied that this plan would most seriously handicap the Government in the conduct of our foreign affairs generally, and would thus impair disastrously its ability to safeguard the peace of the American people." (State Department Press Releases, January 15, 1938, p. 100.)

JANUARY 10. WAR REFERENDUM REJECTED

January 10, House rejects Ludlow war referendum amendment by vote of 209 to 188. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 10, 1938, pp. 282–83.)

The Senate, on January 6, approved Senate Resolution 210, requesting information from the State Department on American investments, nationals, and armed forces in China. Secretary Hull writes Vice President Garner in reply to resolution on January 10:

"There is a broader and much more fundamental interest which is that orderly process in international relationships be maintained." (State Department Press Releases, January 15, 1938, p. 101.)

JANUARY 11. THE PRESIDENT ANNOUNCES THAT PHILIPPINE ECONOMIC TIES ARE TO EXTEND TO 1960

A plan for cushioning the economic impact of independence on the Philippine Islands has been agreed to in principle, and only the details remain to be worked out, President Roosevelt announced today. The projected arrangement envisages a gradual imposition of American tariffs against Philippine products from now until about 1960, he explained. * * *

As outlined by the President, the plan would envisage the retention for a certain number of years of a preferential tariff for the Philippines, for which there is adequate precedent in existing relations with Cuba. (New York Times, January 12, 1938.)

JANUARY 13. UNITED STATES NAVAL VESSELS TO VISIT SINGAPORE

Assistant Secretary of State Messersmith, speaking before annual meeting of the National Council of Jewish Women in Pittsburgh, January 26, says:

"Beyond our frontiers we are already on the defensive; and, incredible as it may seem, the forces undermining law and order appear not to be content with interfering with our lawful activities and the rights of our citizens beyond our frontiers, but are making attacks on our ideals and institutions from within the country itself." (State Department Press Releases, January 29, 1938, pp. 181–189.)

JANUARY 28. THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS ASKS A NAVAL INCREASE

In his message to Congress, January 28, the President says:

"Adequate defense means that for the protection not only of our coasts but also of our communities far removed from the coast we must keep any potential enemy many hundred miles away from our continental limits.

"We cannot assume that our defense would be limited to one ocean and one coast and that the other ocean and the other coast would with certainty be safe. We cannot be certain that the connecting link—the Panama Canal—would be safe. Adequate defense affects, therefore, the simultaneous defense of every part of the United States of America." (State Department Press Releases, January 29, 1938, pp. 190–191.)

JANUARY 28. STATE DEPARTMENT PROTESTS JAPANESE INSULT IN CHINA

State Department, on January 28, publishes protest against slapping of Third Secretary Allison, of American Embassy, in Nanking by Japanese soldier, presented to Japanese Government January 17. (State Department Press Releases, February 5, 1938, pp. 196–197.)

JANUARY 31. LEAHY TESTIFIES ON WHAT NAVY IS FOR

Admiral William D. Leahy, on January 31, testifies before House Committee on Naval Affairs that the Navy must be "maintained at a strength which will prevent a serious challenge by any nation or nations to any of America's vital national policies, which will insure respect by foreign states and their people for our citizens abroad and which will make an attack on any part of our territory too costly and too hazardous for any foreign nation or nations to attempt." (Hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, January 31, 1938, p. 1940.)

JANUARY 31. PRESIDENT SPEAKS OF OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO THE WORLD

Speaking to a group of Protestant clergymen he is receiving at the White House. the President on January 31 expresses his gratification over the "spiritual awakening" which has come about in America. "It makes me realize more fully that we do have, in addition to the duty we owe our own people, an additional duty to the rest of the world. Things have been going on in other countries—things which are not spiritual in any sense of the word—and that is putting it mildly. * * * I must make a confession. I did not realize until the last few years how much influence America has in the world. I did not really, deep down in my heart, believe very much in church missions in other lands. Today I do." (New York Times, February 1, 1938.)

FEBRUARY 1938

FEBRUARY 1. PITTMAN STATES FOREIGN POLICY AS NONINTERFERENCE AND NONINVOLVEMENT

Senators JOHNSON and BORAH criticize the "vague and dangerous trend" of our present foreign policy. In reply, Senator PITTMAN declares our policy to be one of "noninterference and nonintervention in the domestic relations of other governments." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 1, 1938, p. 1326.)

FEBRUARY 5. UNITED STATES WARNS JAPAN ON WARSHIP BUILDING

United States joins Britain and France in serving notice on Japan that three powers will scrap existing limitations on battleships and cruiser building unless Japan agrees by February 20 to divulge naval building plans and abide by qualitative limits of London Naval Treaty of 1936. (State Department Press Releases, February 5, 1938.)

FEBRUARY 5. NEWSPAPERS REVEAL SECRET VISIT OF CAPTAIN INGERSOLL TO LONDON

No clear light as yet has been thrown on the visit here (London) last month of Capt. Royal E. Ingersoll, head of the United States Navy War Plans Division. * * * Although the Embassy denies reports that he used a false name on his passport, it is a fact that he did not use his title, and he was known at the Admiralty either as Mr. Smith or else watch officer.

His presence in London was ordered kept secret, and even now, after the visit has been revealed by Washington, both the Embassy and the Admiralty are preserving the strictest silence on the purpose of the visit. It is indicated that these orders came direct from President Roosevelt. (New York Times, February 6, 1938.)

FEBRUARY 7. SENATOR JOHNSON ASKS IF WE HAVE ALLIANCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN

Senator HIRAM JOHNSON introduces formal resolution demanding that Secretary of State "advise the Senate whether or not any alliance, agreement, or understanding exists or is contemplated with Great Britain relating to war or the possibility of war." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 7, 1938.) Secretary Hull answers with catagorical denial. (Department of State Press Releases, February 12, 1938, p. 251.)

FEBRUARY 8. NEW INDUSTRIAL-MOBILIZATION BILL INTRODUCED

February 8, Congressman MAY introduces new industrial-mobilization bill, H. R. 9391. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 8, 1938, p. 1679.) This bill, allegedly aimed at taking the profits out of war, did nothing but give its blessing to the idea. Actually, the bill proposed to clothe the President with authority for a virtual dictatorship over the economic life of the Nation in time of war.

FEBRUARY 9. "GOODWILL" MISSION TO ARGENTINA

Six Army bombers are sent to Argentina to help celebrate inauguration of Dr. Roberto M. Ortiz as President. (New York Times, February 10, 1938.)

FEBRUARY 7–10. REPRESENTATIVE LUDLOW ASKS WHAT NAVY IS FOR

Representative LUDLOW asks Secretary Hull "Whether all of the ships and auxiliary services provided for in the proposed program are regarded as necessary for defense of our homeland and our possessions, or whether the program contemplates the use of some of the units in cooperation with any other nation in any part of the world." Secretary Hull denies that we have any "understandings" or "alliances" and adds that "While avoiding any alliances or entangling commitments, it is appropriate and advisable, when this and other countries have common interests and common objectives, for this Government to exchange information with governments of such other countries, to confer with those governments, and, where practicable, to proceed on parallel lines, but reserving always the fullest freedom of judgment and right of independence of action." (State Department Press Releases, February 12, 1938, pp. 251–255.)

FEBRUARY 15. PRESIDENT WARNS OF WAR ON BOTH COASTS

"On February 15, 1938, the President in his press conference assured the country that it was important * * * to remember * * * we might be faced with a war on both sides of the continent." (And So To War, by Hubert Herring, pp. 58–59.)

FEBRUARY 11. VINSON PROPOSES STATEMENT OF NAVAL POLICY

Congressman VINSON proposes an amendment to naval bill, stating United States naval policy. Amendment says in part:

"It is declared to be the fundamental naval policy of the United States to maintain an adequate Navy in sufficient strength to guard the continental United States by affording naval protection to the coast line, in both oceans at one and the same time; to protect the Panama Canal, Alaska, Hawaii, and our insular possessions; to protect our commerce and citizens abroad; to maintain a Navy in sufficient strength to guarantee our national security, but not for aggression; to insure our national integrity, and to support our national policies.

"It is further declared to be the policy of the United States that an adequate naval defense means not only the protection of our continental coast line, the Canal Zone, Alaska, Hawaii, and our insular possessions, but also a defense that will keep any potential enemy away from our shores. (New York Times, February 12, 1938.)

FEBRUARY 24. ANOTHER INDUSTRIAL-MOBILIZATION BILL INTRODUCED

On February 24, the industrial-mobilization bill, introduced by Congressman MAY on February 8, was withdrawn and a substitute bill introduced, H. R. 9604. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 24, 1938, p. 2408.) This bill is substantially the same as previous May bill, see page 15.

FEBRUARY 25. UNITED STATES HOLDS JAPAN RESPONSIBLE FOR INJURIES TO AMERICANS

February 25, 1938, Ambassador Grew delivered to the Japanese Foreign Office a note serving notice that Japan will be held responsible for all injuries to Americans or their interests by Japanese armed forces in China. The American note, according to the summary released by the State Department, assured Japan that "there rests upon American officials and other American nationals in China no obligation whatsoever to take precautionary measures requested * * * if American nationals or property are injured in consequence of the operations of Japanese armed forces, the United States Government will be compelled to attribute to the government controlling the armed forces responsibility for the damage." (And So To War, by Hubert Herring, p. 60.)

MARCH 1938

MARCH 2. BILL INTRODUCED FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM FAR EAST WAR ZONES

Senator FRAZIER, on March 2, introduced S. 3574, requiring withdrawal of all American nationals, troops, and naval vessels from Far East war zones. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 2, 1938, p. 2660.)

MARCH 2. WAR PROFITS BILL ATTACKED AS DANGER TO DEMOCRACY

Defended by a majority of the House Military Affairs Committee as "a statement of broad policies * * * seeking to avoid" legislating in advance of war, the May bill was bitterly attacked by the minority [Maverick, Anderson, and Kvale] in an accompanying report (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 2, 1938, p. 2721), as "unnecessary, full of pretense * * * and a serious danger to democracy. It does none of the things it says it does. It takes absolutely no 'profits out of war,' it 'equalizes burdens of war' in no manner whatsoever; it does not 'promote peace.' Yet in its title it claims to do all these things.'" (Washington Information Service, March 15, 1938, p. 7.)

MARCH 4. HULL SAYS OUR FOREIGN POLICY IS NEUTRALITY AND NONINVOLVEMENT

On March 4 Secretary Hull made public a memorandum on American foreign policy during the last 5 years, in which he said, "We avoid entering into alliances or entangling commitments but we believe in cooperative effort by peaceful and practicable means. * * * This Government has scrupulously adhered to the fundamental principle of neutrality; it has followed a policy of noninvolvement and nonparticipation in conflicts within and between other nations." (State Department Press Releases, March 5, 1938, pp. 288–292.)

MARCH 12. GERMANY MARCHES INTO AUSTRIA

Austria collapses as independent state. (New York Times, March 13, 1938.)

MARCH 14. M'NUTT CALLS FOR REEXAMINATION OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Paul V. McNutt, High Commissioner to the Philippines declared in a Nation-wide broadcast on March 14 that the whole question of Philippine independence "should be reexamined in the light of recent disquieting world events." In private conversations he voiced his personal opinion that Philippine independence would be a "tragedy" for the United States and the islands. (Washington Information Service, March 15, 1938, p. 3.)

MARCH 17. HULL OUTLINES PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

In a speech before the National Press Club on March 17 Mr. Hull said:

"On July 16, 1937, I issued a public statement setting forth the fundamental principles to which our Government adheres in the formulation of its foreign policy. * * *

"The most important of these principles, which are indispensable to a satisfactory international order, are as follows:

"Maintenance of peace should be constantly advocated and practiced.

"All nations should, through voluntary self-restraint, abstain from use of force in pursuit of policy and from interference in the internal affairs of other nations.

"All nations should seek to adjust problems arising in their international relations by processes of peaceful negotiations and agreement.

"All nations should uphold the principle of the sanctity of treaties and of faithful observance of international agreements.

"Modification of provisions of treaties, when need therefor arises, should be by orderly processes carried out in a spirit of mutual helpfulness and accommodation.

"Each nation should respect the rights of others and perform scrupulously its own established obligations; in brief, international law and the spirit which underlies it must be revitalized and strengthened.

"Steps should be taken toward promotion of economic security and stability the world over through lowering or removal of barriers to international trade, according to effective equality of commercial opportunity, and application of the principle of equality of commercial treatment.

"National armaments should be limited and be progressively reduced; at the same time, realizing the necessity for maintaining armed forces adequate for national security, each nation should to that end be prepared to reduce or increase its own armed forces in proportion as reductions or increases are made by other nations.

"Apart from the question of alliances with others, each nation should be prepared to engage in cooperative effort by peaceful and practicable means in support of these principles.

* * * * * * *

"The crucial issue today is whether these principles will be vitalized and be firmly established as the foundation of an international order, or whether international anarchy based on brute force will inundate the world and ultimately sweep away the very bases of civilization and progress. * * *

"On August 17, and with frequent reiteration thereafter, I stated that we did not intend to abandon our nationals and our interests in China.

"From time immemorial it has been the practice of civilized nations to afford protection by appropriate means and under the rule of reason to their nationals and their rights and interests abroad. This policy has been pursued by the Government of the United States throughout the existence of our country.

* * * * * * *

"In a world in which the rule of force has not as yet been firmly and surely supplanted by the rule of law, it is the manifest duty of a great nation to maintain armed forces adequate for its national defense. * * *

"It is my considered judgment that, in the present state of world affairs, to do less than is now proposed would lay our country open to unpredictable hazards. * * *

"* * * Prudence and common sense dictate that, where this and other nations have common interests and common objectives, we should not hesitate to exchange information and to confer with the governments of such other nations and, in dealing with the problems confronting each alike, to proceed along parallel lines—this Government retaining at all times its independence of judgment and freedom of action. * * *

"In the present far-eastern emergency we have consistently collaborated with other peace-seeking nations in the manner I have just described. I have said often, and I repeat again, that in this collaboration there is not a trace of alliance or involvement of any sort. * * *

* * * * * * *

"We have affirmed on every possible occasion and have urged upon all nations the supreme need for keeping alive and for practicing sound fundamental principles of relations among civilized nations. We have never entertained and we have not the slightest intention to entertain any such notion as the use of American armed forces for 'policing the world.' But we equally have not the slightest intention of reversing a tradition of a century and a half by abandoning our deep concern for and our advocacy of the establishment everywhere of international order under law, based upon the well-recognized principles to which I have referred. It is our profound conviction that the most effective contribution which we, as a nation sincerely devoted to the cause of peace, can make—in the tragic conditions with which our people, in common with the rest of mankind, are confronted today—is to have this country respected throughout the world for integrity, justice, good will, strength, and unswerving loyalty to principles.

"The foregoing is the essence of our foreign policy. * * *

* * * * * * *

"* * * The interest and concern of the United States—whether in the Far East, in any other part of the Pacific area, in Europe, or anywhere else in the world—are not measured alone by the number of American citizens residing in a particular country, or by the volume of investment and trade, or by exceptional conditions peculiar to the particular area. There is a much broader and more fundamental interest, which is that orderly processes in international relationships, based on the principles to which I have referred, be maintained.

* * * * * * *

"It would be absurd and futile for us to proclaim that we stand for international law, for the sanctity of treaty obligations, for nonintervention in internal affairs of other countries, for equality of industrial and commercial rights and opportunities, for limitation and reduction of armaments, but only in one-half of the world, and among one-half of the world's population. * * *

"Those who contend that we can and should abandon and surrender principles in one-half of the world clearly show that they have little or no conception of the extent to which situations and developments in any part of the world of today inevitably affect situations and conditions in other parts of the world.

* * * * * * *

"* * * we will continue to give full and sincere adherence to the fundamental principles which underlie international order; we will continue to urge universal acceptance and observance of these principles; we will continue, wherever necessary and in every practicable and peaceful way, to cooperate with other nations which are actuated by the same desires and are pursuing the same objectives; we will persevere in appropriate efforts to safeguard our legitimate rights and interests in every part of the world; and we will, while scrupulously respecting the rights of others, insist on their respecting our rights." (New York Times, March 18, 1938.)

MARCH 18. KENNEDY IN LONDON SAYS OUR POLICY MISUNDERSTOOD

Ambassador Kennedy, speaking before the Pilgrims' dinner in London on March 18, said: "My country is unwilling to bind itself to any course of action in the future without an opportunity to examine the situation in the light which then envelops it.

"It seems to me, to judge from conflicting and contradictory reports which reach us from abroad, that this attitude of the United States is not well understood. In some quarters it has been interpreted to mean that our country would not fight under any circumstances short of actual invasion. That is not accurate, in my opinion, and it is a dangerous sort of misunderstanding to be current just now. Others seem to imagine that the United States could never remain neutral in the event a general war should unhappily break out. That, I believe, is just as dangerously conceived a misapprehension as to the other." Department of State Press Releases, March 19, 1938, p. 388.)

MARCH 21. HULL STATES SPANISH EMBARGO WILL STAND

In reply to a letter from Raymond L. Buell made public March 22, in which Mr. Buell pointed out that the conditions which caused the President to issue the proclamation on which the Spanish embargo rested had ceased to exist, Secretary Hull wrote: "I am of the opinion that there has been no change in the situation in Spain such as to warrant the President in revoking his proclamation of May 1, 1937." * * * Furthermore, the "joint resolution of Congress approved January 8, 1937 (Spanish embargo) * * * is likewise still in force." (State Department Press Releases, March 26, 1938, pp. 398–399.)

MARCH 21. UNITED STATES ASKS INDEMNITIES FOR "PANAY" AND MERCHANT VESSELS

United States submits indemnity note to Japanese Government, March 21, "regarding the attack upon the U. S. S. Panay and American merchant vessels on December 12, 1937, by Japanese armed forces," and asks a total indemnity of $2,214,007.03. (Panay was convoying American oil tankers.) (State Department Press Releases, March 26, 1938, p. 410.)

MARCH 31. UNITED STATES AND BRITAIN ABANDON 35,000-TON-BATTLESHIP LIMIT

Department of State issues note saying that the United States "finds it necessary to exercise the right of escalation reserved in paragraph (1) [of the 1936 London Naval Treaty] and of effecting a departure from the limitations and restrictions of the treaty.

"The above action is motivated by the fact that upon the receipt of reports to the effect that Japan is constructing or has authorized the construction of capital ships of a tonnage and armament not in conformity with the limitations and restrictions of the treaty, the Government of the United States addressed an inquiry to the Japanese Government and the Japanese Government did not choose to furnish information with regard to its present naval construction or its plans for future construction." (State Department Press Releases, April 2, 1938, p. 437.)

Britain takes same action. France "will persist in respecting, insofar as regards naval construction, the qualitative limitations fixed by the Treaty of London so long as no continental power departs from that standard." (State Department Press Releases, April 2, 1938, pp. 437–438.)

APRIL 1938

APRIL 13. AMBASSADOR WILSON'S SPEECH IN BERLIN

Speaking to the American Chamber of Commerce in Berlin on April 13, Ambassador Hugh R. Wilson said, "There are people in our country who believe that we would under no circumstances go to war; there are also people who believe that our participation in any major conflict is inevitable. Neither of them can be sure of their assertions." (State Department Press Releases, April 16, 1938, pp. 482–486.)

APRIL 18. PRESIDENT ASKED TO NAME TREATY VIOLATORS

Congressman Scott, one of the leading supporters of the "quarantine" policy, introduced House Resolution 465, "reputedly administration supported" (New York Times, April 19, 1938) asking the President to name the nations that have violated treaties to which the United States is a party. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 18, 1938, p. 5499.) The following day the President read a prepared statement to the press conference. He "recalled that this Government has always supported 'maintenance of international law and order,' and the 'promotion of peace through the finding of means for economic appeasement.' Without passing on 'political features' of accords such as that between Britain and Italy, this Government viewed the conclusion of this particular accord with 'sympathetic interest' because it was proof of the value of peaceful negotiations." (Washington Information Service, May 1, 1938, p. 1.)

Measure reported adversely April 26. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 26, p. 5791.)

APRIL 21. PRESIDENT SAYS REPEAL OF SPANISH EMBARGO WOULD VIOLATE NEUTRALITY OBJECTIVES

On April 21 President Roosevelt in a press conference "voiced some dissatisfaction with the Neutrality Act, as he has done before. He implied that its application to Spain had not been entirely satisfactory. But he declined to give much comfort to these leading the movement for a change in policy at this time. The neutrality law, he said, had two objectives—to keep the United States out of war, and to avoid giving aid to one side against the other in armed conflicts anywhere. While the law had been difficult to operate, he felt that neutrality had been applied to Spain as well as was possible under the act, and to change the act now would violate the second objective. By indirection, he implied that it would not be possible to apply the act against Germany and Italy." (Washington Information Service, May 1, 1938, p. 2.)

MAY 1938

MAY 2. NYE RESOLUTION TO LIFT SPANISH EMBARGO

Senator NYE introduced Senate Joint Resolution 288 to lift the embargo and allow export of munitions to Spain on a cash-and-carry basis on May 2. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 2, 1938, p. 6017.) Tabled by vote of Senate Foreign Relations Committee after committee received letter from Secretary Hull opposing change in present law. (State Department Press Releases, May 14, 1938, pp. 578–579.)

MAY 7. HULL DENIES ARMS SHIPMENTS TO GERMANY VIOLATE TREATIES

Secretary of State Cordell Hull vigorously defended administration foreign policy at an unusual press conference today, when he clashed with Drew Pearson, coauthor of a newspaper column entitled "Washington Daily Merry-Go-Round." * * *

The issue involved American neutrality policy, and especially the policy of the United States in issuing export licenses for shipment of munitions to Germany, which Mr. Pearson had asserted was in violation of treaties and law. This Mr. Hull emphatically denied. (New York Times, May 7, 1938.)

MAY 20. REPORT ON PHILIPPINES—RE EXTENSION OF PREFERENTIAL TRADE RELATIONS

Report of Joint Preparatory Commission on Philippine Affairs (signed in Washington May 20) provides for an extension of preferential trade relations until 1960.

"The basic plan underlying the recomendations of the committee is that, instead of assessing the full tariff duties on each other's products in 1946, the two countries will then assess 25 percent of their prevailing rates of duty, and thereafter annually increase these rates by 5 percent of the prevailing duties, until the complete elimination of preferences is brought about at the close of the year 1960." (State Department Press Releases, May 21, 1938, pp. 603–604.)

MAY 28. HULL REMINDS GERMANY AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA OF THEIR OBLIGATIONS

An urgent reminder for Germany and Czechoslovakia to observe their obligations under the Kellogg-Briand Pact and compose their difficulties by peaceful means was issued unexpectedly by Secretary of State Cordell Hull today in a statement referring to the central European situation as "critical" (New York Times, May 29, 1938).

Secretary Hull's statement says: "That pledge is no less binding now than when it was entered into." (State Department Press Releases, May 28, 1938, p. 619.)

JUNE 1938

JUNE 1. HULL EXPRESSES CONCERN TO JAPAN OVER INTERFERENCE WITH AMERICAN RIGHTS

Secretary Hull sends note to Japan expressing concern over interference with property and other rights of missionaries and businessmen. (State Department Press Releases, June 4, 1938, pp. 635–637.)

JUNE 3. WELLES PROTESTS BOMBING OF CIVILIAN POPULATION

Acting Secretary of State Sumner Welles protests that "any general bombing of an extensive area wherein there resided a large population in peaceful pursuits is contrary to every principle of law and of humanity." (State Department Press Releases, June 4, 1938, pp. 642–643.)

JUNE 3. HULL CALLS FOR "WORLD ORDER BASED ON LAW"

Speaking before the Tennessee Bar Association on June 3, Secretary Hull called for "strong and united" backing of a program to restore throughout the world the principles of "order under law."

"The rise of 'international anarchy,' and 'savagery' makes urgent the need for action to reverse 'the present disastrous trends,'" he declared. * * *

Declaring "isolation" not only a "bitter illusion" but harmful and dangerous to the Nation as well, Mr. Hull went on to outline the United States program for world cooperation. * * *

In measured words the Secretary denounced "anarchy" and traced the emergence of "international order under law" with the rise of civilization since the Dark Ages. * * *

"The most important problem now confronting the human race," he declared, "is that of establishing throughout the world, as the foundation of further progress, an unshakable regime of order under law. * * *

"I can wish for our country no more glorious course than to be a leader in devotion to these principles and in service of their preservation and advancement.

"* * * Attempts to achieve national isolation would not merely deprive us of any influence in the councils of nations but would impair our ability to control our own affairs." (New York Times, June 4, 1938.)

JUNE 5. UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN AGREE ON BATTLESHIP TONNAGE

The United States and Great Britain will announce shortly an agreement on the size of new superbattleships and the heavy guns that they will carry, a State Department official said today.

The official could not tell details of the agreement, but reliable information indicated that it would be somewhat along the lines of the recent American proposal for 45,000-ton ships armed with 16-inch guns. (New York Times, June 6, 1938.)

JUNE 6. SAYRE CONDEMNS SUPINE INACTION

When forces of lawlessness are abroad, supine inaction in effect means siding with evil against the good. The strongest encouragement which can be given to lawless aggressors is to make it quite clear that they have nothing to fear from those with power to withstand them.

The United States cannot afford to be a cipher at this crucial moment of the world's history. We must be resolute and prepared, if necessary, to withstand the aggression of the lawless. (New York Times, June 7, 1938.)

JUNE 11. HULL DISCOURAGES SALE OF AIRPLANES TO JAPAN

The United States is taking measures to discourage the sale of American airplanes to Japan because of the repeated bombing of the Chinese civilian population at Canton and other cities.

This was revealed today by Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, who said the policy was to let everyone know that this Government condemns the aerial attacks and material encouragement of them through supplying means for the operations. The position is being made known repeatedly, he added, to foreign countries, to the American people at home, and especially to the manufacturers of bombing planes. (New York Times, June 12, 1938.)

JUNE 13. YARNELL REAFFIRMS POLICY OF PROTECTION

Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, commanding the American Asiatic Fleet, has "reaffirmed" the American policy of protecting American citizens wherever they might be found in Chinese territory.

Navy officials said that Admiral Yarnell in reaffirming the policy previously enumerated by the State Department had reiterated that Japanese military authorities must hold themselves responsible for attacks on American property and lives under all circumstances. (New York Times, June 14, 1938.)

AUGUST 1938

AUGUST 11. UNITED STATES AND BRITAIN EXTEND HOLDINGS IN PACIFIC BY JOINT AGREEMENT

On August 11 United States and Great Britain announce they have "agreed to set up a regime for the use in common of the islands of Canton and Enderbury in the Phoenix group and for the employment of these islands for purposes connected with international aviation and communication, with equal facilities for each party." (State Department Press Releases, August 13, 1938, p. 114.)

AUGUST 16. HULL SPEAKS FOR ADHERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL LAW

Speaking over the radio on August 16, Secretary Hull declared that "the reestablishment of order under law in relations among nations has become imperatively necessary." Our program is "economic reconstruction; adherence to the basic principles of international law as the guiding and governing rules of conduct among nations"; "respect for and observance of treaties [including modification]"; "abstention from the use of force"; and from "interference in the internal affairs of other nations"; reduction of armaments; "collaboration between and among representatives of the nations"; "international cooperation" for the "advancement of this program."

"Whatever may be our own wishes and hopes, we cannot when there is trouble elsewhere expect to remain unaffected * * *

"When the dignity of the human soul is denied in great parts of the world, and when that denial is made a slogan under which propaganda is set in motion and armies take the field, no one of us can be sure that his country or even his home is safe." (State Department Press Release, August 20, 1938, p. 117 ff.)

AUGUST 18. PRESIDENT MAKES PLEDGE TO CANADA ON DEFENSE

Speaking at Kingston, Ontario, on August 18, the President said: "* * * The Dominion of Canada is part of the sisterhood of the British Empire. I give to you assurance that the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened by any other empire." (State Department Press Releases, August 20, 1938, pp. 123–125.)

AUGUST 19. ROPER OPPOSES NEUTRALITY APPLICATION BECAUSE OF DAMAGE TO TRADE

Secretary of Commerce Roper on August 19, said, according to the New York Times:

"From the point of view of foreign commerce, Mr. Roper said, there must always be taken into consideration that even a temporary derangement of economic relations may result in a permanent transfer of trade from this country to some other nation.

"* * *'from our standpoint here, we do not wish to sacrifice our proper trade relationships and opportunities.'"

AUGUST 20. PORTUGAL TELLS UNITED STATES TO STOP PREACHING

In answer to Secretary Hull's July 16 statement the Portuguese Government sent a message which said in part:

"On general grounds * * * no objection can be raised against the assertions, advices, or wishes as a whole, of the Secretary of State; everyone desires peace, everyone proclaims the sanctity of treaties and the faithful compliance therewith, everyone desires that there be less difficulties in international trade, and everycne wishes to have the burden of armaments removed or lightened. Difficulties begin only when it is sought to pass from the field of intentions into that of action or, more concretely, what is to be done so that the events—in the development of which it is very difficult to establish individual or national responsibilities—will not contradict the good intentions.

"The repeated affirmation, especially on the part of the great powers, of the principles advocated by the Secretary of State, the intellectual or sentimental adhesion of many to the said principles, their inclusion in many treaties between nations or in a document of greater scope aiming at defining the rules of life common to all states, will have, we believe, the effect of a certain moral pressure, but will produce rather limited practical action. We would be mistaken if we were to expect important results therefrom.

* * * * * * *

"Now, in the political field, it is pertinent to ask whether the internationalism of our days is a factor of peace or of war. It seems to us that internationalism, covering as it does pronounced leanings toward national imperialisms, is a source of complications and dangers. The idea of the supernational organization and the tendency toward 'world citizenship' are either essentially erroneous and humanly impossible or are so far removed from present conditions that they can only act—even if the fact noted above did not exist—as perturbing elements.

* * * * * * *

"In commenting at length on the note of the Secretary of State, the Portuguese Government did not intend to indicate solutions or the best way to find them. This would be an excessive presumption. However, the nations are attached to false ideas, and have taken the habit of entrusting the solution of grave external problems to vague formulas and inconsistent combinations; and to acknowledge by means of an impartial examination the inanity of the efforts made in that direction appears to this Government to be the first step and the indispensable preparation of the ground for any constructive work." (State Department Press Releases, September 18, 1937, pp. 229–234.)

OCTOBER 1938

OCTOBER 3–26. FOUR IMPORTANT POLICY PRONOUNCEMENTS—WELLES SAYS TIME IS RIPE FOR NEW WORLD ORDER

October 3: Under Secretary Welles, in a Nation-wide radio broadcast, voices the opinion that "today, perhaps more than at any time during the past two decades, there is presented the opportunity for the establishment by the nations of the world, of a new world order based upon justice and upon law. (Washington Information Service, November 1, 1938, p. 1.)

AMBASSADOR KENNEDY CALLS ON DICTATORSHIPS AND DEMOCRACIES TO COOPERATE

October 19: Ambassador Kennedy, in a Trafalgar Day speech in London, expressed the view that "it is unproductive for both democratic and dictator countries to widen the division now existing between them by emphasizing their differences which are self-apparent. Instead of hammering away at what are regarded as irreconcilables, they could advantageously bend their energies toward solving their common problems by an attempt to reestablish good relations on a world basis." (Washington Information Service, November 1, 1938, p. 1.)

ROOSEVELT DECLARES NO PEACE IF NATIONS ADOPT THREAT OF WAR POLICY

October 25: President Roosevelt, in a speech to the New York Herald Tribune Forum on World Affairs, declares that "there can be no peace if national policy adopts as a deliberate instrument the threat of war. * * * Greater reassurance than can be given by words must be provided if we are to 'be relieved' of the necessity of increasing our own military and naval establishments." (Washington Information Service, November 1, 1938, p. 1.)

STATE DEPARTMENT REVEALS TEXT OF NOTE TO JAPAN

October 26: State Department makes public full text of a note presented to Japan on October 6, calling attention to repeated violations of the open-door principle by Japan and hinting at possible reprisals if Japan fails to take prompt and effective measures to safeguard legitimate American rights and interests in China. (Washington Information Service, November 1, 1938, p. 1.)

OCTOBER 26. PRESIDENT REAFFIRMS MONROE DOCTRINE

A strong reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine, which the Buenos Aires Conference declared was a doctrine for all the American states, was found in President Roosevelt's speech of October 26, in which he said, "We are determined to use every endeavor in order that the Western Hemisphere may work out its own interrelated salvation in the light of its own interrelated experience." (Washington Information Service, November 1, 1938, p. 4.)

OCTOBER 28. STATE DEPARTMENT REFUSES EXPORT LICENSES FOR AIRPLANES DESTINED FOR SPAIN VIA NEUTRAL STATES

Secretary of State explained that export licenses for airplanes had been refused because it was discovered that the goods were actually, though not ostensibly, destined to the Spanish Loyalists. (State Department Press Releases, October 29, 1938, pp. 293–294.)

NOVEMBER 1938

NOVEMBER 7. STATE DEPARTMENT MAKES REPRESENTATIONS TO JAPAN ON NAVIGATION RIGHTS

State Department makes representations November 7 regarding navigation rights on the Yangtze River. Since British and French shipping is also affected by the Japanese restrictions on the river traffic below Hankow, parallel but not identical notes were delivered in Tokyo by the three Governments. (Washington Information Service, November 15, 1938, p. 5.)

LATE NOVEMBER—FOUR MAJOR FOREIGN-POLICY DEVELOPMENTS

These developments include:

Ambassador Wilson recalled from Berlin: "(1) The return of Hugh R. Wilson, our Ambassador to Berlin, for 'consultation and report' and the subsequent departure of Dr. Hans Dieckoff, the German Ambassador." (Washington Information Service, December 1, 1938, p. 1.)

New defense program formulated rapidly: "(2) The rapid formulation of the administration's all-embracing national-defense program." (Washington Information Service, December 1, 1938, p. 1.)

British trade agreement signed: "(3) The signing of the long-awaited trade-agreements program with Great Britain and Canada." (Washington Information Service, December 1, 1938, p. 1.)

Japan's reply to "open door" note of October 6: "(4) Japan's reply to Secretary Hull's 'open door' note of October 6, in which Tokyo affirms its purpose to establish a 'new order' in east Asia." (Washington Information Service, December 1, 1938, p. 1.)

NOVEMBER 27. AUSTRIAN DEBT SERVICE

United States holds Germany responsible for Austrian debts. Calls attention to fact that Germany is servicing similar Austrian debts to European nations. Germany denies legal responsibility and declares Germany does not have export surplus with United States to make foreign exchange available for debt service in United States. United States objects to discrimination. (State Department Press Releases, December 3, 1938, pp. pp. 375–379.)

NOVEMBER 29. PHILIPPINES

Joint Preparatory Committee on Philippine Affairs declares advancement of independence date would increase difficulties of Philippine adjustment problem. Recommends negotiations of treaty, to effectuate recommendations applicable to period after independence. (State Department Press Releases, December 3, 1938, p. 383.)

DECEMBER 1938

DECEMBER 10. BERLE DENIES MILITARY ALLIANCE OF AMERICAS

The second indication of restraint (first was President's denial of "pump priming" in armaments program) came on the eve of the opening session of the Eighth Pan-American Conference at Lima, in the form of a broadcast by Assistant Secretary of State Adolf A. Berle, Jr. In a carefully worded statement, Mr. Berle declared that the United States had no thought of "proposing a military alliance" among the nations of the Western Hemisphere. "It is perfectly plain," he added, "that the American Continent does not feel that a system of military alliances is needed" for the defense of the New World. (Washington Information Service, December 15, 1938, pp. 1–2.)

DECEMBER 15. WELLES PROTESTS ANTI-JEWISH DECREE LAWS

On December 15, Acting Secretary Sumner Welles made public another sharp note protesting against the application of Germany's anti-Jewish decree laws to American citizens. (Washington Information Service, December 15, 1938, p. 3.)

DECEMBER 15. $25,000,000 CREDIT TO CHINA

Evidence of a stiffer policy is found in the $25,000,000 credit extended to China by the Export-Import Bank on December 15, coupled with the announcement by Secretary Morgenthau that the Treasury will continue to allow credits against Chinese gold held in this country. (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 2.)

DECEMBER 31. STATE DEPARTMENT REJECTS JAPANESE THESIS

Evidence of a stiffer policy is found in the State Department note of December 31 to Japan, firmly rejecting the Japanese thesis that a "new order" has arisen in eastern Asia, and reserving "all rights of the United States as they exist." (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 2.)

JANUARY 1939

JANUARY. THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS ON METHODS "SHORT OF WAR"

In President Roosevelt's message to Congress the President further clarified the position taken in his Chicago speech, and extended the theory set forth there. In his message the President not only expressed his attitude toward "aggressor nations," but advocated action against these "aggressors." The President stated:

"Swords may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people.

"At the very least, we can and should avoid any action, or any lack of action, which will encourage, assist, or build up an aggressor." (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 1.)

STEPS TOWARD A POSITIVE POLICY—PITTMAN ASKS COUNTRY TO OSTRACIZE JAPAN

The public statement on January 1 by Senator PITTMAN, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, declaring that if the Japanese Government does not make a satisfactory reply to recent State Department notes, this country should ostracize the Japanese. (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 2.)

UNITED STATES REJECTS GERMAN PROTEST ON ICKES' SPEECH

The blunt rejection of Germany's protest against the speech of Secretary Ickes, and the tentative decision not to send Ambassador Hugh Wilson back to his post until the German Government gives satisfactory assurance that American citizens will not be discriminated against on grounds of race or creed. (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 2.)

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OPENS COMMERCIAL CREDITS TO LATIN AMERICA

The opening of commercial credits through the Export-Import Bank to finance American exports in Latin America in competition with German, Italian, and Japanese trade. (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 2.)

TURKISH TRADE AGREEMENT INITIALED

Initialing on December 18 of a new trade agreement with Turkey (which lies in the path of Germany's trade expansion in the Balkans and Near East) providing for unconditional most-favored-nation treatment. (Washington Information Service, January 4, 1939, p. 3.)

FORTIFICATION OF GUAM

Plans were discussed for the fortification of the island of Guam in the Pacific:

"A fortified base, while difficult to defend, would extend the offensive power of the American Navy well into Japanese waters, and would doubtless be interpreted in Japan as a direct threat against that country." (Washington Information Service, January 15, 1939, p. 4.)

CRASH OF PLANE WITH FRENCH OBSERVER IN CALIFORNIA

The airplane crash near Los Angeles involving a representative of the French Air Ministry aroused considerable public curiosity. In a secret session of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, the President was reported to have said:

"That in the event of war in Europe, the frontiers of the United States would be in France; and that the responsible heads of European democracies know the position of the President with respect to furnishing supplies in time of war * * *." (Washington Information Service, February 1, 1939, p. 4.)

FEBRUARY 1939

FEBRUARY 3. PITTMAN ON THE BALANCE OF POWER IN EUROPE

The administration began to formulate its program for keeping America out of war. On February 3 Senator PITTMAN handed a prepared statement to Washington correspondents:

"The only thing, in my opinion, that could prevent war in Europe and the possibility of its extension to the United States in the future would be such an equal balancing of military power that neither side to a controversy would be willing to undertake the chance of a defeat." (Washington Information Service, February 15, 1939, p. 1.)

FEBRUARY 3. THE PRESIDENT STATES BASIC PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

President Roosevelt stated in press conference what he considered the basic principles of American foreign policy: "We are against any entangling alliances, obviously. We are in favor of the maintenance of world trade for everybody—all nations—including ourselves; we are in complete sympathy with any and every effort made to reduce or limit armaments. As a Nation—as American people—we are sympathetic with the peaceful maintenance of political, economic, and social independence of all nations in the world." (Washington Information Service, February 15, 1939, p. 2.)

FEBRUARY 14. MORE AIRPLANES FOR FRANCE

The trade in war materials continues to mount. On February 14 the French military mission in the United States announced the purchase of 500 new war planes, at a cost estimated at over $60,000,000. (Washington Information Service, February 15, 1939, p. 3.)

FEBRUARY 20. PITTMAN ATTACKS DICTATORS. OUR PEOPLE WILL DIE FOR CHRISTIANITY, MORALITY, JUSTICE, AND LIBERTY

Senator Pittman, denouncing dictator states as intent on dominating the world, declared tonight that Americans would die if necessary to preserve the things they "consider worth more than life."

Ridiculing the British policy of appeasement and the American isolationists, the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee called for a firm stand in defense of American rights "throughout the universe."

"The policy of appeasement has not only been unsuccessful and ultimately destructive but has been immoral. It is evident that a person can die but once, and the period of life is limited, and that it is far better that he die a few days earlier for Christianity, justice, and liberty than that he live a little longer in cowardice and degeneracy." (New York Times, February 21, 1939.)

MARCH 1939

MARCH 1. SECRETARY HULL COMMENTED AGAIN ON THE LUDLOW WAR REFERENDUM

He spoke as follows:

"There was no question more acutely in the minds and purposes of the founders of this Republic than that of keeping the American people out of war.

"After the fullest deliberation they reached the conclusion that the representative form of government by the people which they established was best calculated to accomplish this end.

"Needless to say, experience has proved the wisdom and the practical judgment of the patriots and statesmen who founded our system of free institutions, and I believe that most of our people, upon careful examination, will desire to continue unaltered this thoroughly successful system of representative government as thus handed down to us over a period of 150 years." (State Department Press Releases, March 4, 1939, p. 159.)

MARCH 9. THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK ADVANCES CREDITS TO BRAZIL

Credits were advanced to Brazil in an endeavor to counteract Fascist influence in Latin America and meet the Nazi barter menace.

MARCH 13. ARMS FOR LATIN AMERICA

Senator PITTMAN and Representative BLOOM introduced a bill authorizing the War and Navy Departments to sell ordnances, naval vessels, and other war materials to Latin America.

"The resolution permits transmission to Latin American republics of 'restricted and confidential plans, specifications, and information' on United States armaments sold to them, provided this information be kept secret for a year and is not resold to any country outside of South America." APRIL 8. SECRETARY HULL'S STATEMENT REGARDING THE INVASION OF ALBANIA ON APRIL 8

"The forcible and violent invasion of Albania is unquestionably an additional threat to the peace of the world. It would be shortsighted not to take notice of this further development. Any threat to peace seriously concerns all nations and violates the will of all peoples in the world that their governments shall lead them, not toward war, but along paths of peace. It is scarcely necessary to add that the inevitable effect of this incident, taken with other similar incidents, is further to destroy confidence and to undermine economic stability in every country in the world, thus affecting our own welfare." (State Department Press Releases, April 8, 1939, p. 261.)

APRIL 9. "IF WE DON'T HAVE A WAR"

On leaving Warm Springs, Ga., the President remarked: "I'll be back in the fall if we don't have a war." Two days later the Washington Post editorialized:

"None knows better than the President that his office makes the most casual public observation subject to interpretation as a matter of national policy. And no President was ever more skillful than Mr. Roosevelt in making the most of every opportunity." (Washington Information Service, April 14, 1939, p. 2.)

On April 14 the President requested, in identical messages to Chancelor Hitler and Premier Mussolini, a 10-year nonaggression pledge from Germany and Italy, in return for which he promised American participation in a prompt discussion of the armaments problem and economic matters. (State Department Press Releases, April 15, 1939, p. 291 ff.)

APRIL 15. SURPRISE ORDER RETURNS FLEET TO PACIFIC

Most of the United States Fleet was ordered suddenly today to return to the Pacific. The reasons for the surprise order were kept secret by the Government. President Roosevelt personally approved the order, White House attachés revealed. (New York Times, April 16, 1939.)

APRIL 27. SANCTIONS

JUNE 21. AMERICAN DIPLOMATS IN CHINA PROTEST JAPANESE BLOCKADE

On June 21 Secretary Hull announced that the American Consul General in Tientsin, utilizing a statement drawn up by the local American Chamber of Commerce, had formally objected to the adverse effects of the blockade on the interests and general welfare of the American nationals in the city. Finally, on June 22, Admiral Yarnell, commander in chief of the American Asiatic Fleet, bluntly rejected a Japanese demand that American nationals and naval vessels be withdrawn from Swatow, which Japanese military forces had just occupied. Similar action was taken by the British naval commander, and additional British and American naval vessels were dispatched to Swatow. (Washington Information Service, August 1, 1939, pp. 1–2.)

"The Government of the United States does not recognize the legality of unrestricted interference with American ships and commerce. Nevertheless, under the special circumstances at present, it is believed advisable to warn all American merchant vessels, except American passenger ships which do not carry cargoes to belligerents and are engaged in bringing home Americans from European countries, of the special danger incurred in entering such waters." (New York Times, October 5, 1939, p. 15.)

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an interesting and intriguing editorial from the Washington Post of Thursday, October 26, 1939. Under the guidance of its publisher, Eugene Meyer, the Washington Post has developed into one of the outstanding newspapers of the United States. Its brilliant editor, Felix Morley, one of America's greatest thinkers and intellectuals, has added even more luster to its columns. Its staff of scholarly and eminently fair reporters, both men and women, have given complete coverage to all activities in Washington. I am proud that such a newspaper exists in the National Capital, a newspaper the quality of which is worthy of its location in the shadow of the legislative Halls of Congress, a newspaper the editorial policy of which is transcendently fair and just to all causes and individuals on every occasion.

I include this editorial because it expresses a view entertained by the vast majority of intelligent and fair-minded citizens of our country. The editorial embraces sentiments to which I substantially adhere and is a restrained warning of the reaction of the people of America to the recent antics of the committee majority. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 26, 1939]

MR. DIES EXPLAINS

In seeking to justify publication by his committee of the local membership and mailing list of the American League for Peace and Democracy, Chairman DIES was careful to state that "the committee is not charging that the Government employees affiliated with the league are members of the Communist Party." He added: "There is no evidence to this effect."

It is good to have Congressman DIES' disclaimer of any intent to pin the Communist label on all of the 563 Federal and District employees whose names are on the published list. It is certainly no crime, in this democracy, for a citizen to belong to any organization which does not contravene the law. It is neither a crime nor a misdemeanor for any Government employee to join such an organization. Nor is there any disgrace in being openly identified with it.

There is much to be said in favor of having continuously available to the public the membership lists as well as the financial backing of all organizations that espouse a particular political, economic, or social philosophy, be they conservative or radical. At least one State—New York—already has a rule of that kind on its statute books. Only those organizations which have something to hide, which to survive must operate behind a carefully guarded cloak of secrecy, have anything to fear from such publicity. The others cannot be harmed by it.

It is one thing, however, to have such publicity applicable to all organizations. It is quite another to single out, as the Dies committee has done in the case of the local branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy, a particular organization for special action along those lines.

What was the purpose? Evidently it was not to provide a Who's Who of Communists in the Government service. Such a list, if authentic, would be a valuable public document, and Mr. DIES, at one time, threatened to publish one. But the present list is, by his own admission, something else again.

If the local branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy includes, as one must now assume that it does, individuals of varying or no particular political faith, why focus on it at this time the spotlight of publicity?

An answer to this question is perhaps to be found in the rest of Chairman DIES' statement accompanying the published list of Government employees on the rolls of the organization.

In that statement, the Texas Congressman indicates that the intent of publication was punitive. Nine months ago, he says, his committee adopted a report in which the American League for Peace and Democracy was branded as a Communist-front organization. Yet the Government employees affiliated with it did not, as a result of this report, resign. Having ignored the committee's warning, they are now to be punished by having their affiliation with an allegedly "red" organization exposed.

Under the circumstances it is difficult not to agree with Congressman DEMPSEY, that the primary purpose of publishing the list is to "smear" a number of Government employees who, using their own judgment of the nature and purposes of the league, refused to quit it as a result of the committee's ukase.

For all of its valuable labors, this action indicates that the committee has not yet got over that habit of irresponsibility which has marked its conduct from the first.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, one of the deepest sentiments in the human heart is love of country. We in America have our customs and our institutions. We have our thoughts and our methods of life. I hesitate to think of an American who has so little love for his country that he could forget America and her traditions.

We in America are conservative in foreign affairs, I suppose, because we started with such doctrines as our first President, George Washington, preached, which have made us wary of mingling in the affairs of foreign countries. Upon this theory we do not permit foreign countries to dictate to Americans the policies and form of government to which we will submit for the welfare of the United States. In the course of recent events our relations to Europe have been totally revolutionized by the temper of the world with respect to war.

There was no glory in the last war. There was nothing that has contributed to the American welfare, nothing but sorrow and death. We have more at stake than anyone else in avoiding a repetition of the World War. Causes grow out of national policies as well as out of disputed rights of nations. Causes of war will arise and will continue to arise between other countries. I do not believe that it is our problem to prevent these causes from arising, but knowing that the causes have arisen, it is our duty to the American people to prevent our country from becoming embroiled in the conflicts of other nations.

The people of the United States are a peace-loving people. We do not wish to interfere with or harm in the least any other nation. We cannot barter away our independence or our sovereignty. We should never again entangle ourselves in the evils of Europe. We should never permit Europe to intermeddle with our affairs.

When the United States entered the great World War in 1917 three important measures were necessary to make our entrance effective:

First. Financial relief to the Allies.

Second. The raising of a very large army promptly.

Third. Sending that army across the seas to aid the Allies.

In our hospitals and institutions and on our streets we can see the effects of our entrance into the last war. We see the lame, the dismembered, and the blind. This reminds us of our promise to do what we could to prevent war in the future. It seems that if we were zealous enough to fight with foreign countries 21 and 22 years ago in order to put an end to a war that was forced upon us, they should be zealous enough to cooperate with us now for the purpose of preventing another such war.

During these critical times we have many serious problems of our own, and it is our duty to maintain a vigilance such as was proposed by President Washington in order to preserve the freedom which was transmitted to us by the founders of our Government.

It seems to me that the American people are entitled to understand more clearly what goes on in our country in the nature of foreign propaganda. In the language of George Washington:

> Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience proves that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

I conclude with the following editorial from the Johnstown Democrat:

[From the Johnstown (Pa.) Democrat of October 25, 1939]

NOT UNCLE SAM'S BUSINESS TO FRAME EUROPE'S PEACE

None of the warring nations in Europe have drawn up a list of their war aims. Such declarations, however, are evidently in the making. When they appear, they will probably carry features designed to attract neutral and world opinion to the causes they represent.

If Europe is to continue its war for very long, the people should know "what all the shootin's fur." The American Declaration of Independence begins, you know, with the proposition that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation." Sooner or later the war will get around to the stage where the nations will frame formal statements of what sort of a settlement they propose to make—if they win. Obviously, the only chance either side has to attract neutral support is the promise of a sort of world adjustment that will make less likely a repetition of 1939.

Just as the outbreak of the present European war found all countries better prepared for it than in 1914, so the coming of peace, which must fall some time, should find the peacemakers better prepared with plans for a promising settlement. Dr. Julian Huxley, the eminent biologist and writer, in a recent article says: "Our present American statesmen must provide a platform on which the neutral countries can take their stand with the view of playing an active part in the eventual settlement."

Of course, it is necessary for the neutral countries to be a bit wary. Efforts are being made to induce Uncle Sam to take a seat at the European council table. We did that once before—and to our sorrow. Those who frame peace terms for Europe must assume responsibility for the enforcement of the terms. Many Americans believe Europe must "learn its lesson" and that, therefore, the United States should not attempt to speak with a decisive voice when Europe frames its ground-arms program.

President Wilson was keenly conscious of the power the neutrals could exert. Many of his actions were guided by his determination to do nothing which would prejudice the position of the United States as a possible mediator. The democrat is not enamored of the mediator role. We mediated once upon a time between Russia and Japan. Following the mediation, the Japanese staged riots for the purpose of protesting against the terms which had been forced upon them. The Russians, in their turn, were convinced the United States had "betrayed them."

And so, while it's all very well and quite consistent of sound policy for the warring nations to tell the neutrals what they are fighting about, it isn't Uncle Sam's business to sit in and write the peace treaties. Europe must learn its lesson. It has been mulling over its own particular situation for at least 3,000 years. Quite evidently peace takes time. Not even the United States is big enough to enforce peace upon a "passel" of European countries inhabited by warlike people, a majority of whom wants to fight because somebody in Europe quite evidently wants to fight.

There's no use to argue Europe is at war because there's such a deep love for peace in the hearts of the people; and so, while it is quite all right for European nations to state their peace aims, a European war should lead up to a European peace rather than one imposed upon Europe by America.

LETTER FROM FRANK S. DAVIS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a very interesting letter received from Frank S. Davis, manager of the Maritime Association of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the contents of which are constructive and worthy of profound consideration in connection with a provision of the pending neutrality bill.

MARITIME ASSOCIATION OF THE BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Boston, Mass., October 17, 1939.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: There is widespread apprehension in New England that enactment of the Neutrality Act of 1939 (H. J. Res. 306) in its present form and without an amendment that would permit normal, peacetime cargo shipping services to Canada, West Indies, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, French Indo China, Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, and other noncombatant territories, would have a disastrous effect upon the industrial, commercial, maritime, and shipping activities of this section, and that the principal hardship would probably fall upon labor.

New England industries depend largely, and many of them entirely, upon raw materials originating in the noncombatant territories named, and if the normal, peacetime American steamship services to these territories were prohibited, as proposed in the pending bill, shortage of steamer space, exorbitant transportation costs, and loss of commerce to our ports would inevitably result.

It appears to be the general sentiment here, from all that I have been able to gather, and as expressed in local press editorials, that the American steamship services could be continued to the remote noncombat areas named without defeating or jeopardizing the objectives sought by the pending Neutrality Act, and with vitally important beneficial results to all New England.

We are informed that the United States Maritime Commission has submitted a proposed amendment to Senator BAILEY, and which he will probably soon bring before the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will define the combat area prohibited to American vessels to north of 30° north latitude and east of 55° west longitude.

Such an amendment would be acceptable and would afford the protection sought for New England. If it should develop that such an amendment, if proposed, would be defeated rather than have the Neutrality Act adopted in its present form, we would request that careful and favorable consideration be given to the amendment which we understand will be proposed by Senator JOHNSON as reflecting the sentiment and desire of the Pacific-coast interests. Senator JOHNSON'S amendment, however, would not, as we understand it, include permission to continue normal, peacetime cargo services to and from Nova Scotia and Bermuda.

While the Neutrality Act in its present form would apparently permit American-flag vessels to go empty to the noncombat areas mentioned, and return with cargo from such combat areas, no steamship line could afford to operate on such a one-way cargo basis and unless American-flag vessels were permitted to operate normal, peacetime cargo shipping services to and from such noncombat areas New England would be seriously affected as indicated, probably more so than any other section of the country.

I thought you might wish this expression of our views, and trust that you will do what you consistently can to give effect to the proposed amendment of the Maritime Commission, if and when brought up by Senator BAILEY, or if this amendment should not be adopted that the Johnson amendment receive your favorable consideration.

Respectfully,

FRANK S. DAVIS, Manager.

Tough Lines for Farmers in the Proposed Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

BRIEF OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have asked unanimous consent of the membership of this House to insert in the RECORD a very fine brief that was submitted by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, to the United States Tariff Commission in opposition to the proposed trade agreement with the Argentine.

The farmers and livestock men of this country are deeply concerned about the proposed reciprocal treaties that are being submitted by the administration whereby it is proposed that the tariff be lowered on many of the products that come in direct competition with the American farmer.

It just does not seem fair to the farmers and producers of this country, who are fighting with their backs to the wall, that the Government should permit the proposed schedules to go into effect. In each and every case it is proposed that the tariff rate be lowered, and in not one single instance do they offer to further protect the American farmer. I hope every Member of Congress will take the time to carefully examine this statement.

We are impressed by the fact that almost without exception the items or articles upon which the State Department has signified its willingness to make tariff concessions in the proposed trade agreement with Argentina, are such as will be brought into direct competition with the products of the American farm.

The list includes casein, which is made of skim milk and is used in the manufacture of paper and certain plastic materials; linseed oil and combinations and mixtures in chief value of such oil; tallow; oleo oil; oleo stearin; extract of meat; beef and veal, pickled or cured; beef and veal, prepared and preserved; turkeys, dead, dressed or undressed, fresh, chilled, or frozen; eggs in the shell; corn or maize, including cracked corn; dog food consisting of an admixture of grains or grain products, with other feedstuffs unfit for human consumption; grapes in bulk; grapes in barrels or other packages; pears; flaxseed; grass seeds; asparagus; wools of certain types; hides and skins of cattle, and dog food, manufactured, unfit for human consumption.

All of the foregoing commodities are dutiable under the tariff act. In addition to this list, the State Department is considering the advisability of binding on the free list various other commodities that are not now dutiable.

THE MANUFACTURE OF CASEIN

Beginning with casein, the present duty on this commodity is 5½ cents per pound. When the present tariff act was being framed 10 years ago, the farm and dairy groups made a special effort to secure a reasonable duty on this commodity. Domestic production of casein has increased rapidly during recent years. According to the United States Department of Commerce, there were 316 factories in the country manufacturing this product in 1931. By 1937 the number of factories had increased to 664. These plants are situated in 24 different States. Under the present rate of duty, domestic manufacturers have demonstrated their ability to supply the home market, so that it is no longer necessary for us to depend upon imports.

Statisticians of the dairy industry indicate that in round figures there are 53,000,000,000 pounds of skim milk produced annually in the United States. We have enough skim milk to make annually more than 20 times as much casein as is consumed today. The fact is that millions of gallons of skim milk are thrown away every year, because there is no profitable use to which it can be put. The little creameries throughout the country cannot afford to make this product unless the price therefor will at least pay the cost of manufacturing. The manufacture of casein and the manufacture of dry skim milk are alternate operations, depending upon the price return. Lowering the tariff on casein and thereby bringing about a corresponding reduction in price will cause the flooding of the dry skim milk market, and this, in turn, will ruin farm prices for skim milk. As is well known, we have a surplus of dairy products and the Surplus Commodities Corporation every year makes large purchases for distribution among those on the relief rolls and in the effort to stabilize the prices of dairy products. Under these conditions, as we see it, there is no justification whatsoever for reducing the present tariff on casein.

Tallow is one of the commodities on which the Grange and other farm groups succeeded in securing an excise tax in 1934 to equalize competitive conditions. The tax on the first processing of the imported article was written into the general revenue legislation after a long fight in both Houses of Congress. This tax cannot be lowered in making a reciprocal-trade agreement. Our concern in the present situation is that it should not be bound against any possible future increase that Congress may deem wise and necessary for the protection of American producers.

Considering beef and veal, pickled and cured, while this is a different classification from canned beef, it is beef, nevertheless. The bulk of the canned beef consumed in the United States is imported. According to our information, for every pound of canned beef produced in the United States we import 12 pounds. It will be recalled that in the last session of Congress, when the President of the United States advocated the purchase of Argentine canned beef for the use of the American Navy on the ground that it was better and cheaper than the domestic article, there was a distinctly unfavorable reaction both in Congress and throughout the country. Since American producers of beef and other farm commodities are taxpayers and contribute their proportionate share toward the support of Government, it would seem, in all fairness, that they are entitled to first consideration.

Any reduction in the duty on cheese in the proposed agreement with the Argentine would benefit other countries more than the Argentine itself, because that country is not the principal supplier of this commodity. The cheeses we import from other countries are competitive with those produced in New York, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and other dairy States. A reduction in duty on this commodity would be another severe blow to the dairy farmers of the United States.

TURKEY GROWERS DESERVE PROTECTION

There is no justification for lowering the present duty of 10 cents per pound on turkeys. Two years ago, there was such a surplus of turkeys in the United States that the growers made a special plea to the chain food stores to help them market this surplus, the stores responded to this appeal, performing a noteworthy service to agriculture. The average production of turkeys in the United States from 1931 to 1935, both inclusive, was a little more than 21,000,000 birds; the figure for 1936 was 27,725,000; while in 1938, it was 26,279,000. According to a circular issued by the United States Department of Agriculture on September 20, 1939, this year's turkey crop will be 22 percent larger than that of last year, with an indicated production of nearly 32,000,000 turkeys. With abundant crops of grain available at reasonable prices, it is likely that turkeys will be heavier than the average this year.

The principal States in the production of turkeys are Texas, California, Minnesota, Oklahoma, Iowa, North Dakota, Oregon, Missouri, Ohio, Kansas, Idaho, and Virginia. Rockingham, a single county in Virginia, is producing 500,000 turkeys this year. It is not only the commercial growers of turkeys who would feel the adverse effects of a reduction in duty, but the losses entailed would reduce the income of hundreds of thousands of farmers throughout the country. Nothing could be clearer than the fact that it is not necessary for us to import turkeys in order to have a plentiful supply at fair and reasonable prices to the consumer.

The duty on eggs of chickens in the shell was reduced from 10 cents a dozen to 5 cents in the revised trade agreement with Canada, which became effective on January 1, 1939. Since this is the maximum reduction permitted under the Reciprocal Tariff Act, we assume that the inclusion of eggs in the list of commodities scheduled for possible tariff concessions in the proposed trade agreement with the Argentine means that the existing rate of 5 cents per dozen is to be bound against change for the duration of the agreement. We have long had a surplus of eggs in this country. Aside from commercial producers, this is an item of particular interest to farm women in every State of the Union. In many instances it is the farmer's wife who takes care of the farm flock and she depends upon the income thus derived to furnish many of the necessities of the household. According to the United States Department of Agriculture, on August 15, 1939, the average price received by farmers for eggs at local markets throughout the country was 17.5 cents per dozen, which is below the cost of production.

HAULING COALS TO NEWCASTLE

In considering the wisdom and fairness of reducing the tariff on corn, it is proper to say that the United States produces the bulk of all the corn or maize grown in the world. We plant more than 90,000,000 acres of corn or nearly one-third of the tilled acreage of the United States. While we had a shortage of corn in the drought years 1934 and 1936, we had bumper crops in 1937 and 1938. The prospects are that this year's corn crop may reach a total of 3 billion bushels. Hundreds of millions of bushels of corn produced during the past 2 years are under Government loan and sealed in cribs throughout the 12 states of the Corn Belt. As the Grange sees it, no sound and justifiable reason can be given for reducing the present duty on corn. On the contrary, there is every reason why the present tariff rate on this commodity should be maintained.

What excuse could be offered to the grape growers of California, Michigan, New York, Arkansas, and many other States, for reducing the present tariff of 25 cents per cubic foot on this commodity? We nearly always have a surplus of grapes, and prices as a rule, when viewed from the viewpoint of the producer, are pitifully low and inadequate.

The present tariff act contains a duty of 65 cents per bushel on flaxseed. During recent years the farmers of the spring wheat belt, in particular, have been urged to grow flax and correspondingly reduce their acreage of wheat. The present tariff was intended to give them some encouragement to follow such a course. During 1936 production of flaxseed in the United States totaled 5,273,000 bushels. The figure for 1937 was 6,974,000 bushels. The net imports of flaxseed for 1936 amounted to 26,060,000 bushels. A reduction in the present duty on this commodity would be well calculated to drive the flax growers of the United States out of business.

THE DUTY ON WOOL

When we cut the duty on woolen rags in half in the British trade agreement, it was a blow to the wool growers of the United States, because under present conditions it is possible for manufacturers of reclaimed wool or shoddy to sell their product as an undisclosed substitute for virgin wool. If we should reduce the duty on new wool to the Argentine, it would react to the distinct detriment of our domestic wool growers.

No argument is needed to prove that we have a surplus of nearly all the products listed for possible tariff concessions in the proposed trade agreement with the Argentine. To reduce the tariff on commodities contained in this list would infallibly result in reducing the prices received by domestic producers of farm products. According to the Monthly Price Index of the Department of Agriculture, issued on August 29, just before the outbreak of the European war, the exchange value of farm products as compared with industrial commodities at that time stood at 74 percent of the 1909–14 level. Under these conditions, what justification can be offered for deliberately pursuing a policy that cannot fail to further depress farm prices and throw countless thousands of farmers into bankruptcy? Against the continuance of such a misguided and ruinous policy we desire to register an earnest and most emphatic protest.

The Higher Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH B. SHANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD IN THE SENATE, MARCH 11, 1850

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a speech made by William H. Seward in the United States Senate March 11, 1850.

The speech of Senator Seward was known as the "higher law," as it affected the Negro slaves of that period. I think it is as tenable today applying to the lives of the youth of America, and should be invoked to prevent propagandists from carting American youth off to foreign wars. American youth has a right to live.

The speech is as follows:

But it is insisted that the admission of California shall be attended by a compromise of questions which have arisen out of slavery! I am opposed to any such compromise in any and all the forms in which it has been proposed. Because, while admitting the purity and the patriotism of all from whom it is my misfortune to differ, I think all legislative compromises radically wrong, and essentially vicious. They involve the surrender of the exercise of judgment and the conscience on distinct and separate questions, at distinct and separate times, with the indispensable advantages it affords for ascertaining the truth. They involve a relinquishment of the right to reconsider in future the decision of the present, on questions prematurely anticipated. And they are a usurpation as to future questions of the providence of future legislators.

Sir, it seems to me as if slavery had laid its paralyzing hand upon myself, and the blood was coursing less freely than its wont through my veins, when I endeavor to suppose that such a compromise has been effected, and my utterance forever is arrested upon all the great questions, social, moral, and political, arising out of a subject so important, and yet so incomprehensible. What am I to receive in this compromise? Freedom in California. It is well: It is a noble acquisition; it is worth a sacrifice. But what am I to give as an equivalent? A recognition of a claim to perpetuate slavery in the District of Columbia; forbearance toward more stringent laws concerning the arrest of persons suspected of being slaves found in the free States; forbearance from the proviso of freedom in the charter of new territories. None of the plans of compromise offered demand less than two, and most of them insist on all these conditions. The equivalent then is, some portion of liberty, some portion of human rights in one region, for liberty in another.

It is true indeed that the national domain is ours. It is true it was acquired by the valor and the wealth of the whole Nation. But we hold, nevertheless, no arbitrary power over it. We hold no arbitrary power over anything, whether acquired by law or seized by usurpation. The Constitution regulates our stewardship; the Constitution devotes the domain to union, to justice, to welfare, and to liberty. But there is a higher law than the Constitution which regulates our authority over the domain and devotes it to the same noble purpose. The territory is a part, no inconsiderable part, of the common heritage of mankind bestowed upon them by the Creator of the universe. We are His stewards and must so discharge our trust as to secure in the highest attainable degree their happiness. This is a state, and we are deliberating for it, just as our fathers deliberated in establishing the institutions we enjoy. Whatever superiority there is in our condition and hopes over those of any other kingdom or estate, is due to the fortunate circumstances that our ancestors did not leave things to "take their chances," but that they added amplitude and greatness to our commonwealth by introducing such ordinances, constitutions, and customs as were wise. We, in our turn, have succeeded to the same responsibilities, and we cannot approach the duty before us wisely or justly, except we raise ourselves to the great consideration of how we can most certainly "sow greatness to our posterity and successors."

And now the simple, bold, and awful question which presents itself to us is this: Shall we, who are founding institutions, social and political, for countless millions, shall we, who know by experience the wise and just, and are free to choose them, and to reject the erroneous and unjust; shall we establish human bondage, or permit it by our sufferance to be established? Sir, our forefathers would not have hesitated an hour. They found slavery existing here, and they left it only because they could not remove it. There is not only no free State which would now establish it, but there is no slave State which, if it had had the free alternative, as we now have, would have founded slavery. Indeed, our revolutionary predecessors had precisely the same question before them in establishing an organic law, under which the States of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa have since come into the Union, and they solemnly repudiated and excluded slavery from those States forever.

Columbia's Peace Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

POEM BY JENS K. GRONDAHL

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a poem entitled "Columbia's Peace Prayer," written by Jens K. Grondahl, editor, Daily Republican, Red Wing, Minn.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA'S PEACE PRAYER

(By Jens K. Grondahl, editor Daily Republican, Red Wing, Minn.)

I am keeper of the treasure—God protect the sacred trust.
Teach us, in this hour of peril, to be calm and meek and just.
Thou hast kindled here a beacon that shall guide mankind aright—
While the world is plunged in chaos, God of Peace, preserve the light.

I am keeper of the treasure—all that human hand hath wrought,
All the heart-throbs of the ages that have crystallized in thought,
All the blessed benefactions Thou hast vouchsafed unto man—
Let me keep them pure, unsullied, until peace shall reign again.

I am keeper of the peace-pact—if in battle that should burn,
In the final throes of conflict whither might the nations turn
For a friendly hand to lead them to disarmament and peace?
Guide my sons to walk in wisdom in portentous days like these.

May our brothers o'er the seas revere this haven in the West—
Neither touch nor tempt our eagles in the fratricidal quest;
May our own sons leash their strength, although provoked and unafraid,
And revive a world in anguish when its sacrifice is made.

The best blood of every nation floweth strong within my veins,
I have mothered every people from the foreign hills and plains,
I have welded them together, wreathed with liberty their brow,
'Neath the Stars and Bars they flourish—we are all Americans now.

We shall keep alive the culture of the Old World and the New,
Safe from taint of war and hatred, Lord, so lead us that we do—
Keep in motion wheels and spindles and the garnering of grain,
That this land of countless blessings succor may the realms of pain.

Thou, O Lord, who seest the hearts of men and all the struggling horde,
Thou who knowest where injustice draws the keen, avenging sword,
Waken Thou the battling hosts to know that war is darkest crime;
Spare this Nation, born of nations, for the noblest task of time.

I am keeper of the treasure—in my hands, Lord, may it be,
That the Nation, born of nations, thus may serve humanity—
An oasis in the desert whence new life shall come again
To the famishing, the stricken—God of Peace, hear us. Amen.

A Moral War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL BY H. L. MENCKEN

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by H. L. Mencken entitled "Notes on a Moral War," published in the Baltimore (Md.) Sun of October 8, 1939.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of October 8, 1939]

NOTES ON A MORAL WAR

(By H. L. Mencken)

Five weeks have sufficed to blow up all the lofty pretensions on which the current combat in Europe was set going. The English went into it, so they announced on September 1, to make good on a solemn promise to protect Poland against the archfiend Hitler, but they actually never made a single overt move in that direction, and by the end of the first week they had forgotten the Poles altogether. The chief Polish jobholders, both military and political, took in that fact at once and immediately loaded the Polish gold reserve on trucks and eloped with it over the border. But the poor soldiers penned up in Warsaw, being less well informed, fought on to the bitter and bloody end, hoping against hope that the promised aid would reach them. No such aid was ever sent or ever intended.

The English are in the war for a simple and single reason, to wit, their desire to prevent the rise of a powerful rival in Europe, offering an inevitable challenge to their general supervision of the world. That is why they went to war the last time, and that is why they go through the motions of being at war today. It is a rational reason, but it is as devoid of moral content as a theorem in algebra or a college yell. If the English, with the help of the French, American, and other mercenaries, manage to scotch Hitler, and Poland is restored, they will try to operate it as a puppet state, just as they operate Egypt and Iraq. And if Hitler turns out to be unscotchable, they will gladly let him collar as many Polands as may be needed to quiet and content him, just as they let him collar Czechoslovakia when Czechoslovakia seemed enough.

That the majority of Americans appear to have fallen more or less for the English pretension to altruism, and even favor supporting it with munitions and money, not to say men, is only one more proof that human beings learn little by experience. Certainly anyone who sets the full powers of his intellect to the job must be able to recall what happened the last time. When the war was over England had the loot and the United States had a headache and a huge file of bills. In Congress the other day a Congressman, whose name I forget, was trying to figure out the sum total of those bills. He concluded that, with pensions and other trimmings added, they have run to more than $60,000,000,000 to date, with new ones still coming in every day.

This calculation, it seems to me, was extraordinarily modest. For one thing, it took no account of the useful lives lost, the young men crippled and ruined, the wreck of families, the huge destruction of earning power. And, for another thing, it quite overlooked the twin curses of prohibition and the New Deal, both of which we might have escaped if we had minded our business in 1917. I have seen estimates that prohibition cost the country, first and last, fuly $10,000,000,000, and everybody knows that the New Deal has already set us back at least $25,000,000,000, with more and worse to come.

What did we get out of it? The most I can think of is the pleasure of looking at an American Legion parade once a year. All our professed objects in the war failed. The chief product of the salvation of democracy was the creation of the Russian colossus—the most formidable enemy to democracy that has been seen on earth since the fall of the great Asiatic empires of antiquity. Self-determination, having served its term as a shibboleth, converted itself into a whole series of preposterous puppet states, all of them outfitted with oppressed minorities. And the Kaiser had hardly cleared out before Hitler began to edge in.

England got more, in fact, a great deal more. It not only gathered in millions of square miles of new territories and an almost endless store of miscellaneous loot, it also made secure—or, at all events, apparently secure—its hegemony throughout the world. International law at the end of the war was hardly more than a series of decisions by English prize courts. No other country had any right that England admitted itself bound to respect. It owned and operated the sea and, owning and operating the sea, it had a firm grip upon the land. It ran Europe, it ran Africa, it ran more than half of Asia, and at both ends of the Americas it was triumphant and dominant.

The United States not only acquiesced in this huge access of power; it even promoted it, and at no cost to the beneficiary. We acted precisely like an English colony; indeed, we were even more complacent than any actual English colony of ponderable importance, for both Canada and Australia hastened to get something for themselves, and so did South Africa. In Europe, France rebelled very quickly, and was slapped down only with difficulty; it is a forced and unwilling ally at this moment, and may be trusted to prove it if the war goes on. Russia got off the reservation by 1920 and Italy by 1923. Germany, by 1930, began to prepare darkly for a new "Tag," and Japan was ready to throw off the yoke in Asia by 1935. But the United States, despite an occasional groan over the unpaid war debt, continued idiotically in the English orbit, and there it is today.

Worse, we are now asked to strengthen our bonds with more money and more blood. Once again, it appears, the world is to be made safe for democracy. Once again the wicked Kaiser, in the person of his even more wicked heir and assign, is to be prevented from ravaging our coasts, burning our cities, and selling our people into captivity. Once again we are to fall for the old "hooey," and hail with hosannas a return engagement of the old bills. It sounds incredible, but there is the plain fact. Let it revolve a bit in your mind.

I am the last man on earth to object to the English effort to preserve and extend their great Empire. It is a magnificent edifice, and no rational people, having once erected it at large cost and made it pay, would willingly let it go. To be sure, a great deal of sharp dealing and worse went into its erection, and it is maintained today only by a constant resort to brigandage and false pretenses. But it is clearly absurd to hold great states to the simple morality of private men, beset alike by the police and the fear of hell. They operate at levels far above, or below, the common levels of right and wrong. All of them that history records have engaged freely and gloriously in acts that would land you and me in jail, if not in the death house, and the same line, I suppose, will be followed by all that come hereafter, world without end. Even the United States, though it may be better than most, has engaged in frequent proceedings of an excessive dubiousness.

But why should the United States dedicate itself to the dirty work of another country, traditionally our enemy and only transiently, and for revenue alone, our contemptuous, patronizing, and deadbeat friend? Why should we convert our own country into a mere client and goon of England, and waste our men and money protecting and augmenting England's empire and fighting England's rivals? Why should we denounce and threaten the Germans because they object to being hedged in and ruined by English bribery and intrigue, or the Italians because they rebel against living in an English lake and under English guns, or the Japs because they believe that the affairs of China, which lies at their very gates, are of more concern to them than to the English, 10,000 miles away?

The answer we get is that England is a great Christian nation, the guardian of civilization, the consecrated fosterer of "morality and religion," radiating a special and incomparable virtue, and with a special mission to protect the United States.

That answer is buncombe. England is a country exactly like all the rest, no worse and no better. Its one aim and purpose is to promote its own interest; it has no other whatsoever. It was willing and eager, only 6 weeks ago, to embrace Comrade Stalin as a brother, and it is trying to buy him back even now, just as it is trying to buy Mussolini, Franco, and the Turks. So long as the Japs kept their paws off China it was their ally and buddy, and if Hitler manages to survive the present moral crusade it will make terms with him quickly and gladly—at the expense of France, even at the expense of the United States.

To admire such a great and successful nation is one thing, and quite reasonable; to fall for its Pecksniffery, pay its bills, and tote its slops is assuredly something else again.

Gold Star Mothers' Day Observance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS, SEPTEMBER 24, 1939

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me at the Gold Star Mothers' Day observance in Washington, D. C., Sunday, September 24, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Presidential proclamation, pursuant to an act of Congress, we have gathered together to observe, in the Nation's Capital, Gold Star Mothers' Day—a day set aside for reverential recognition of the mothers of America who gave their sons to war and death.

We honor and respect them for the sacrifice so unselfishly made, but especially, on this day, we recall our inexpressible debt to them, one that we cannot too often acknowledge.

My regret is that because of the genius, inspiration, and sympathy that such an occasion demands, no words of mine can fittingly portray the services given, and the sacrifices made on the altar of patriotism by the war mothers of America.

Dark and ominous clouds hang over mothers all over the world today. Mothers hate war. All American mothers today are praying and pleading that they be spared your experience.

Well they realize that what is taking place in Europe at this hour is increasing the number of brokenhearted, disconsolate, and impoverished war mothers by the millions!

Here, in the presence of you, surviving victims of the sacrifices made by American mothers during the World War, can we not visualize millions of American mothers with uplifted eyes and hands, pleading to the God of Mercy to bestow upon the officials of our Government the wisdom and courage to keep us free from the devastating plague now waging in Europe.

It was men, not mothers, who invented arms and munitions of war for the slaughter of human beings. If mothers had their way, they would not only prevent American-made instruments of human destruction being sent to all belligerents but they would make such war weapons unavailable to any nation at any time for the shedding of blood.

They would permit the making of arms and munitions solely for ourselves, to be used only when our homes and firesides were attacked and our democratic institutions threatened.

In order that the homicidal strife now waging in Europe may effectively be barred from America, may you, Gold Star war mothers, living symbols of war's unspeakable cruelties and sufferings, proclaim aloud your heartbreaking experiences to other and younger mothers and thereby assert your power and influence for peace.

Counteract by your tears and sighs the barrage of propaganda that seeks to divert America from peace. In the midst of this war-involving propaganda, let it be your mission to portray the irreparable human and social losses of war, to make known the horror of the conflict's aftermath, the foulness and fever of the hospital, the maimed and shattered humanity beneath its canvas, the torn fields disfigured with broken forces of glory, the days of pain and the nights of anguish of mothers at the bedside of the victims of the battlefield which call for that pity and patience and courage that are inherently in the hearts and souls of women.

Tell America, lest she forget, that the trials and perils, that the roar and rush of conflict know nothing of, come to test the very fiber of the souls of mothers; that the patriotic work of mothers is done amid the silence and pathos of the home where few come to cheer and where silent women sit, amid the confusion and consternation of news from the battle, wondering what sorrowful and harrowing message of affliction will come to them after the guns have ceased to speak.

After the war only the women, the mothers, the handmaids of pity, remain to bear the cross and to suffer the human losses the shouting world has forgotten.

Instead of pleading for traffic in arms or war profits, your plea must be against every possible step that will lead to traffic in human lives—the youths of America.

No living being contends that we are morally bound to sell implements of war to any nation at any time. We are free to sell or not to sell.

Our present policy, the Federal law, now forbids sales.

Candor compels me to state that I think of nothing that threatens more certain to involve us in the present European holocaust than to deliberately reverse our present policy of positive refusal to sell war weapons to any or all belligerents, and now that war has swept over Europe, by solemn enactment offer the output of our munitions' factories for sale, knowing that only one group of belligerents can be our customer.

How long would Switzerland, Holland, or any other neutral country remain at peace if it declared in advance of war that it would not sell arms, and following the outbreak of war, turned its munitions plants over to supply death bombs to one group of belligerents?

Why, if we really seek peace, should we dare, merely because we are not adjoining the war fields of Europe, and merely because we are larger in area and population and wealth, do what we conceive no other neutral nation would dare do unless it deliberately sought involvement in war?

If our sole and only problem is safety for ourselves, instead of removing existing restrictions to help keep us out of war, let us strive mightily day and night to increase and multiply these restrictions.

To my mind, the repeal of the arms-embargo law will be tragic. It will enormously increase our present serious peril. It is tragic enough to become involved in war by having a public opinion favoring peace changed to one of war through the ordinary mute incidents of war, our hatreds, our fears, or our sympathies, but it is criminal to plunge a free people into war by incidents and situations which are resultant from efforts made to make war profits. War through financial entanglements is the most indefensible of all wars.

Mothers have a great opportunity at this hour. I know of no higher or nobler way on this Gold Star Mothers' Day to honor our war mothers than to rescue the mothers of today from the horrors of war now being borne by millions of frenzied mothers and starving children in other lands.

May the Prince of Peace spare the mothers of America the dark and dreary days, the nights of pain and suffering which you mothers experience from the horrifying thoughts and the woeful losses of the seamy side of war.

America will keep out of this war if America places above all other considerations the happiness of mothers, and unceasingly demands the God-given right of every mother to protect her children from becoming cannon fodder.

Embargo History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Reciting History," published in the Saturday Evening Post of October 28, 1939.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 28, 1939]

RECITING HISTORY

"The single exception was the policy adopted by this Nation during the Napoleonic wars, when, seeking to avoid involvement, we acted for some years under the so-called Embargo and Nonintercourse Acts. That policy turned out to be a disastrous failure: First, because it brought our own Nation close to ruin; and, second, because it was the major cause of bringing us into active participation in European wars in our own War of 1812. It is merely reciting history to recall to you that one of the results of the policy of embargo and nonintercourse was the burning in 1814 of part of this Capitol in which we are assembled." (President Roosevelt, addressing the Congress, September 21, 1939.)

If this is reciting history, we are afraid the President must be given a bad mark. In the first place, Jefferson's embargo, which was in force from December 1807 to March 1809, cannot be compared to the present arms embargo. It was complete and absolute. No American ship could clear for any foreign port, and foreign ships could sail only if their holds were empty of cargo. The Nonintercourse Acts of 1809, 1810, and 1811 modified this policy so as to apply it only to England and France. The object was to demonstrate by economic pressure that England needed our products as much or more than we needed hers. Jefferson thought that by cutting off our commerce with England we might force her—by a method "short of war"—to observe the ordinary usage of international law and to abandon her claim to impressment.

But it should be remembered that at that time we were already deeply involved in the Napoleonic wars. The English orders in council and the Emperor's Berlin and Milan decrees had virtually outlawed American shipping in European waters. The direct cause of the embargo was the Chesapeake-Leopard incident, when an English warship fired on an American frigate within sight of Cape Henry. Three sailors were killed and 18 wounded. The Chesapeake was forced to haul down its flag and submit to the impressment of four of its crew. Faced with this outrage, Jefferson said the choice before him was embargo or war, and he preferred embargo.

His policy was not a failure. According to contemporary English testimony, the embargo was decidedly effective. Workingmen rioted in the Midlands because the lack of cotton and other raw materials from America closed down their places of employment. Nor was this country brought to the verge of ruin. American shipping interests generally were badly hurt, as were the southern planters. But modern historians agree that it gave American industry a golden opportunity. For the first time we discovered that we could process our own raw materials. The necessities imposed by the embargo created new factories and foundries throughout the Middle Atlantic States and New England. This was an unforeseen dividend of Jefferson's peace policy, but a very real one nevertheless.

Finally, the burning of the Capitol at Washington can hardly be blamed on the Embargo and Nonintercourse Acts, even indirectly. The British captured Washington only because we were disgracefully unprepared. They set fire to the Capitol, in all probability, as a retaliation for the burning of the capitol of Upper Canada by General Dearborn's troops in 1813.

Whatever may be the fate of the arms embargo, it should be discussed realistically for what it is—an act to keep us out of the munitions trade with belligerent nations. As such, it has no precedent in our history, and can no more be compared to Jefferson's embargo, either in purpose or probable result, than it can be compared to the gold embargo of 1933.

America's Commercial Air Transport Industry Makes Rapid Progress; Serves as Backlog for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the commercial air transport industry in the United States is rapidly becoming of major importance. Americans generally take justifiable pride in the strong strides being made by the air lines which operate throughout the United States.

NEW LINES ESTABLISHED

Our people have in recent years taken an added interest in all phases of aviation. New services have been added in many parts of the country and rapidly our operating network is becoming the envy of the other nations of the world. This is due in large measure to the splendid, effective management, the carefully trained personnel, the safe and modern equipment, and the aid and encouragement from the Federal Government.

We like to think of this advancement in the days of peace, and yet we are acutely aware of the fact that the great commercial air-line industry would be of tremendous value to this Nation in time of war. We shall continue fervently to hope and work to the end that America will remain at peace. If conflict should come to our Republic, this great industry would be of real value in our national-defense program.

BUSINESS ON INCREASE

As an indication of the present status of our operating air lines, I quote the following article by John L. Beckley, Associated Press statistician, as carried yesterday in the press:

NEW YORK, October 24.—Air travel is booming. Maybe it's the war, maybe it's the business revival, or perhaps it's just the fact that America is becoming air-minded; but at any rate the usual fall slump in passenger traffic hasn't materialized. For the first time summer schedules are being carried right through the fall without reduction in service.

Instead of the customary let-down at this time, a survey today of several leading air lines disclosed that the flow of passengers over the Nation's airways is setting new high records.

BETTER THAN IN 1938

Transcontinental and Western Air reported that September revenue passenger-miles were 47 percent greater than a year ago and were the highest in the history of the company. It was the seventh consecutive month that total revenue passenger-miles had established a new record. October traffic was estimated to be running 40 to 45 percent ahead of a year ago and keeping pace with September.

Eastern Air Lines stated that last Friday marked the fourth time in the last 10 days that their planes had set a new record for the number of passengers carried on one day. The performance was unusual at this time because the company's business usually picks up in November and reaches its peak in March, when the previous high occurred.

Another instance of the increasing air-mindedness of travelers was cited by American Air Lines. On October 15, a Sunday, ordinarily a dull day in a relatively inactive month, the system had the fourth largest day it has ever had for passenger traffic out of New York City. Each month of this year the company has established successive new highs for passenger traffic.

NO LET-DOWN IN TRAVEL

United Air Lines estimated that September and October business was running about 37 percent above a year ago and also failed to note the customary fall let-down. Volume was said to be not quite up to the 50 percent increases over last year experienced during the summer months, but was holding up exceedingly well.

The Pan American Airways system has also felt the increase in air travel. Flights between here and Europe are not booked to capacity as they were for a short time after the outbreak of war, as nationals on both sides of the oceans scrambled to return home, but travel was said to be holding up well in view of tightening restrictions. Mail loads are setting new highs.

In South American traffic the company is enjoying an unprecedented rush of business. Increasing travel for both pleasure and business purposes lifted the September passenger traffic of Pan American-Grace Airways 100 percent above the same month a year ago. During the summer months the volume was about 50 percent better than last year.

Patriotism Versus Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

ARTICLE BY ADOLPH STARR, OF LA FAYETTE, IND.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein a very interesting article written by Adolph Starr, of La Fayette, Ind., who is the national chaplain of the Navy Club, which article appeared in the La Fayette Leader, of date October 6, 1939. The article is upon the subject of Patriotism versus Neutrality, and follows:

PATRIOTISM VERSUS NEUTRALITY

What is it? My answer is simply this: The Golden Rule, practiced and exemplified. The supremacy of God, spirit, principle, love, and good must be demonstrated. The universe must be interpreted by science from the divine principle God, so that it may be truly understood. When we try to explain the universe on the basis of physical sense and represented as subject to growth, maturity, and decay the universe remains a puzzle, an enigma like man. Life is spiritual and not material. The Holy Scriptures say that God made everything that was made and it was very good, like Himself. You will find that "In the Saxon and many other tongues good is the term for God." So it must be that the spiritual universe is good, and that it reflects God as He really is. Patriotism, therefore, is not sole regard for the place or town where a man was born, not at all; this is not the character of the virtue we call patriotism, it soars much higher for its object. It is not self-love, mingling with all the pleasures and joys of life; but, the Golden Rule applied to the service we render to our fellow men. We obey the laws of society because they are what society calls the laws of virtue. In their authority we see the image of venerability, upon which we look with honor and deference, not upon the soil and land of our country, but its people and the virtues which our neighbors practice, and to hold in mingled love and honor with something of sacred fear, as for that which, while lovely, is sublimely exalted and brings upon us by contrast a sense of our unworthiness or inferiority; it is to revere our country's honor which is entirely and wholly a spiritual act. Every good citizen should make that honor his own and should cherish it not only as precious, but also as sacred. He should be willing to give up his life in its defense, and be conscious that he gets the protection from his government in authority while he does so; when a state violates, or disregards the principles which make for the security and safety of its people, then, what rights of a citizen will be deemed inviolable?

Or let us say today as war is threatening America, if his life should not be invaded or interfered with, what could his enjoyments really be living in a country regarded with disgust or aversion, foul and infamous in the eyes of other people, and dishonored in his own. It certainly is not expected of such a one to look with veneration and affection to that country as his parent to love and cherish; he would be made to blush for his patriotism; that is, if he had any left, and justly so, for to him it would be a vice. He would be a man without a country or a banished citizen in his own community. Therefore, I hope and trust in God, that the American citizens—the veterans of all wars will at this time join that hope and trust with me—that they be not without reason, principle, and honor in this trying time and not be swayed by false newspaper and radio propaganda, and that the issues in this European war be not confused; I am not confused. I am once and always decidedly pro-American—an ex-service man who has had experience in war—and have traveled around the world, and understood life in other countries. I speak from experience, which is mankind's greatest school, and we must not forget our lessons of the last World War. I know from experience and contacts with well-informed people abroad and so far as the nations of Europe are concerned, I feel justified in saying that they are all aggressors, persecutors of minorities, repudiators who refuse to pay or acknowledge their debts to other nations. None of them has ever understood or even tried to uphold the right of the Golden Rule; none of them knows the meaning of a "bill of rights"; none of them has ever been influenced in international dealings by international law or by the Sermon on the Mount. History proves that for more than 300 years the leading nations of Europe have been practicing greed for possessions, land grabbing on all six continents and trying to dominate the seven seas.

For over 250 years they have been fighting each other for the lion's share in extent of land and value. England won that distinction and for 150 years has been a boaster of pride that the sun never sets on her domain. Germany and Italy have been nations since 1870, Japan since 1852, all less than 150 years ago; they demand places in the sun. England and France don't want them to expand: Why? Because of the reasons already stated. These big four nations of Europe have no doubt developed great social and cultural values which have grown out of their genius which the world cannot afford to lose, and so it behooves America to stay out of their own family quarrels, their envies, and jealousies, and not arouse any of their enmity. Let's mind our own business. Keep our sons out of this bloody fight; keep our cash and credit; take no sides, and stay within our laws of neutrality; but be ready to advise all to a rational and spiritual understanding for a profitable and durable peace. Let's be Americans in deed as well as in spirit. If we sell to one, let's sell to all; don't take sides or we will surely get into trouble, as that is just how all trouble starts, domestic, State, and National. May God bless America and keep us out of war. Practice the Golden Rule and not the rule of gold and neutrality will become a reality. Let's practice patriotism, Christianity, and Americanism, and then democracy will automatically save itself. No one ever won a war; every nation bears a loss.

Address by Secretary Ickes to the National Coal Association at New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2D

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. HAROLD L. ICKES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address recently delivered by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, to the National Coal Association at New York, on the subject of national fuel resources and supplies, including coal, oil, gas, and electricity, their conservation and control, and the administration of the Bituminous Coal Act in his Department. The address is an important one, of much value, and should be appropriately disseminated and preserved.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the National Coal Association, when the President, under the Reorganization Act charged me with the task of supervising the administration of the Bituminous Coal Act, I accepted a responsibility that I had not asked for, with full appreciation of the difficulties of my task. I knew that this act was of tremendous importance to the producers and consumers of coal as well as to half a million miners and their families. I realized that, although most of the industry was eager for help and willing to cooperate, there was a persistent minority determined to resist any effort of the Government to aid the industry as a whole.

For many years your association and those engaged in the same business have realized that the task of stabilizing the coal industry is closely related to the management of other natural resources—oil, natural gas, and water power—in all of which the Department of the Interior is interested and has administrative responsibilities. Since the problem of the conservation and utilization of all natural resources is a national one, the Federal Government has taken vigorous steps to coordinate the various phases of it. The administration fully recognizes that conservation is not a hodgepodge of independent objectives. For instance, you cannot separate the coal problem from the oil and natural gas problems. All of the resources of the Nation form one large pattern and must be treated as a whole.

Your industry has recognized this. As you well know, coal has been losing markets to competing fuels, principally to oil and natural gas. The reasons for this lie partly in the last war. At that time there was a tremendous increase in the demand for oil as well as for coal. High prices brought a great boom to oil and gas, new fields were found and exploited to the fullest extent possible. But coal, likewise, shared in the war boom. Prices rose sharply. For some 3 years after the war shortages of coal and high prices recurred. Then came the inevitable reaction. By 1923 coal and oil went begging. Coal sold for whatever buyers would pay. Even during the boom years from 1925 to 1929, when business as a whole enjoyed a champagne prosperity, coal could only watch the bubbles rising to the surface from a distance. To a certain extent, it may be said that the general business boom of that period was purchased at the expense of our resource industries.

The difficulties of coal during this time were due partly to an overabundant supply, partly to the collapse of its price structure, partly to labor difficulties, and partly to the competition of oil and natural gas. To be sure, much of the oil and gas was availed of for uses for which coal was not adaptable, and therefore they did not compete directly with coal. Undoubtedly, however, much coal has been displaced by these other fuels.

The success of oil and natural gas as a competitor was due, not merely to their own availability, such as convenience of use and price, but also to the demoralization of the coal industry. The desperate financial condition of the industry and its internal strife prevented adequate coal research or cooperative promotion. Under the pressure of invested capital and overhead charges—which piled up whether or not coal was being mined—and the necessity of supplying a livelihood, meager as it might be, to miners and their families, producers continued to hunt desperately for purchasers at any price. When these facts were added up the sum amounted to a disastrous depression in the bituminous-coal industry—a sort of industrial suicide.

To these factors, we must add a major social demand of the post-war years—the desire of the people to have the conveniences which accompany electric power, and to have them cheaply. This led to the development of water power. But while some coal has thus been displaced, we should not exaggerate its effects on your industry. Comparing the production of water power in the United States for the year 1937 with that for the year 1918, we find an increase of 188 percent in kilowatt-hours generated. But the increase in the amount of coal displaced is nowhere near as large as this figure would indicate. This is due to the remarkable increase in the efficiency of combustion during this period. For instance, in 1918, electric-power stations consumed an average of 3.35 pounds of coal per kilowatt-hour; in 1937 only 1.42 pounds.

I am convinced, however, that if the development of water power does succeed in demonstrating the social possibilities and advantages of cheap power, the long-time results will be helpful to the fuel industries. The way to enlarge the use of power is to make it abundant at the lowest possible cost. The experts tell us that future increases in power must come chiefly from fuel, since there are not many water-power sites left which can be developed at low cost. Nevertheless, I recognize that the competition between coal and water-power development is of present concern to you, although it is far less important than the effects upon your industry of oil and natural-gas competition.

This competition is not merely your problem; it is a national problem. This Nation's future is largely dependent upon its resources of fuel. Our world of tomorrow is likely to be shaped by the availability of coal, oil, and natural gas. Our industrial progress, the well-being of our population, and indeed, the very nature of our political organization, are largely contingent upon these resources.

The National Resources Committee, of which I was chairman until recently, a short time ago issued a report on energy resources which analyzed this situation in detail. It found that our coal resources, though great, were not unlimited. Coal reserves in the United States have been estimated at 3,000,000,000,000 net tons, enough to last for more than 1,000 years. However, more than half of this represents low-grade bituminous coal and lignite. It is worth noting that 85 percent of our present production is from east of the Mississippi River. Almost 70 percent of our total reserves lie in the semi-arid plains or in the Rocky Mountains, far from our centers of population and industry. The depletion of our eastern reserves and a shift to these more plentiful but distant ones in the West would be likely to raise grave problems of economic and social adjustment, involving dislocations of business and population.

It is important to note that, while we are rich in total reserves of coal, our known supplies of high-grade coals are definitely restricted, and that the best coal beds are being mined at a rapid rate. Some of them, indeed, are well on their way to exhaustion. The anthracite deposits of Pennsylvania, for example, are more than 29 percent depleted. The high quality, smokeless coals of southern West Virginia in seams now considered mineable will last only about 85 years, at the 1929 rate of production. The life of the great Pittsburgh bed in Pennsylvania, the committee reports, is limited to 100 years by the same measurement, and Connellsville coking coal, which contributed heavily to the development of the American iron and steel industry, probably will be sufficient for only from 20 to 30 years.

The situation in oil and natural gas is much more critical. Our resources of these fuels are definitely and seriously limited. The National Resources Committee states that our proven oil reserves have been estimated at 15,000,000,000 barrels, which is only about 12 times our consumption in the 1 year of 1937. Our natural-gas resources have been estimated at from sixty to one hundred trillion cubic feet, or, at most, about 50 times the 1937 production. Despite this, we are allowing our oil and natural-gas resources to be exploited without that careful regulation that would have regard for both the immediate and the future needs of the Nation. This heedless exploitation is harmful to everybody concerned, not only producers but the Nation as a whole. We continue to deplete our reserves of oil faster than does the rest of the world. Unless we adopt a more conservative policy we will prematurely be forced to turn to synthetic gasoline or to expensive substitutes for our supply of liquid fuel.

To return to coal, we have not yet succeeded in dealing comprehensively and wisely with this vital resource. According to the careful studies of the John Hays Hammond Commission, the avoidable loss of bituminous coal in mining averages 20 percent. In a year of really active demand this means 150,000,000 tons a year, an amount sufficient to supply the entire annual requirements of France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, and Holland, with the three Scandinavian countries thrown in for good measure.

No other country in the world, I believe, would tolerate such shocking waste. It is the greatest of all the many wastes of our fuel resources. To make matters worse, there has been a reckless use of our limited supply of high-quality bituminous coal for ordinary steam-generating purposes when inferior grades, which we have in abundance, would do just as well. It would be just as sound economy to build a temporary shack out of some rare and expensive wood. We are burning for boiler fuel large quantities of these fine grade coals which would bring more money for the higher uses to which they could be put. We are doing this sort of thing because the people who own these coals are in business to make money in a market dominated by cutthroat competition. The first and indispensable step toward reducing these wastes is to place the mining and marketing of coal on a stable and orderly basis.

These problems are thrown into relief today by the wars in Europe and the Orient. In wartime, coal and oil are commodities that sell at a premium. Earl Grey said after 1918: "The Allies floated to victory on a sea of oil." Already orders for oil and coal have multiplied and prices have risen. Consequently, we must, so far as we can, survey the situation and take care that the unhappy consequences of the last war be avoided this time.

You all remember how ruinous those consequences were. The collapse of purchasing power in the coal industry after 1923 was felt directly by such businesses as food, clothing, household furnishings, and automobiles. The collapse spread like a cancer through the country, crippling and closing factories. Whether we like to admit it or not, we—the Nation as a whole—cannot afford to let any major industry, no matter how much it wants to do so, bankrupt itself. Every business and industry is an integral part of a whole, like the strands in a tapestry. You cannot tear one without damaging the whole fabric.

For the sake of the Nation we must prevent the rape of our natural resources. Naturally, we must, and can, supply all reasonable demands; but, at the same time, we must, and can, observe the principles of sound economy and good husbandry. So far as we can, we must so conduct our affairs as to avoid another post-war collapse in our natural-resource industries. In time of war one must prepare for peace. Our problem today is not merely to avoid actual participation in the current international madness; it is also to avoid the danger that the economic effects of war and its aftermath will reduce us, as well as the belligerent nations, to the despair that is the result of destitution.

I know that intelligent self-restraint, which must be the basis of the conservation of our resources, is difficult, even in peacetime. But now the important task of conservation is especially hard, because it calls for moderation after a number of lean years; it demands that those who have hungered for volume and profits proceed with caution when they catch a glimpse of a rich feast. Let there be no mistake about it, however. The problems which I am discussing are not problems created by the war. They are problems which are and have been with us both in war and in peace. War conditions abroad have merely accentuated the situation.

The coal industry is in a comparatively good position to deal with these problems. As I have said, unlike oil, there is no prospect of a general shortage of coal in the early future. The problem of conservation is essentially an obligation of preventing unnecessary waste. In large part, such waste is the result of prices that are so low as to offer no real incentive for a higher recovery of the coal underground. Such prices cause cutthroat competition which results in debasing the market value of even high-grade coals.

But the bituminous-coal industry can do something to improve its price structure and marketing practices. It has experience dating from the N. R. A. At the present time the coal industry, in cooperation with the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior, is in the process of fixing prices below which the various sizes and grades of coal may not be sold. It must be clear that price stabilization and improvement of mining practices in this industry are fundamental to any attempt to bring order to our fuel resources.

Ultimately this Nation may take steps to coordinate the conservation of all of our fuel and energy resources. Such a coordination necessarily would, of course, take into account not only the interests of the Nation as a whole, but also the welfare of those in each of the affected industries; it would have a duty to proceed with justice and fairness to all who had a stake in them, and this would include the consuming public.

The Government recognizes that each of the three great fuel industries has its own special problems which require separate consideration. The interests of the oil industry must not be sacrificed to aid the coal industry, nor should the welfare of the coal business be sacrificed in the effort to assist oil and gas. However, no unprejudiced person would deny that it is essential to the Nation and to the industries themselves that the petroleum and natural-gas businesses should be conducted on an orderly basis, without waste of either oil or natural gas; and that the prices and practices of the coal industry should be both reasonable and orderly.

I hope that the fixing and enforcement of prices will bring your industry into its own as a stable, well-organized unit in the national economy. I believe that the result will be to put an end to further economic wreckage resulting from wasteful methods of mining, and that it will stop the crumbling of the investments and the wastage of the livelihoods of thousands of persons engaged in the coal industry. You have cause to rejoice because, alone among our industrialists, you are in a favorable position to prepare yourselves to cope with the economic aftermath of the European war. You are ready to enjoy whatever benefits may derive from a possible war boom with comparative confidence that you are not neglecting your long-time interests. If a war boom should come—I am not prophesying that it will—you can face the possibility of a post-war depression with the assurance that there will be a bottom to prices for your coal, a level which can be readjusted, but which cannot drop so low as to bring ruin and destruction to you, your stockholders, and your workers. You are indeed fortunate because you have this legal machinery by which you may now prepare yourselves for peace and protect yourselves against the too great hazards of an unpredictable future.

We have been pressing forward to fix prices for coals. Many of you may feel that they are somewhat overdue. I was given direction of the Coal Division on July 1. I can only say that we are doing our utmost to expedite the work. Moreover, I am satisfied that the job is being done as carefully, objectively, and thoroughly as is possible. I know that some of you honestly feel that any effort of the Government to aid your industry—particularly through this Coal Act—is objectionable, and I respect your opinion, although I do not agree with it. I am aware also that in your industry, as in others, there are a few who are in a favorable position to prosper in the midst of economic chaos.

To these all I can say is that I hope they will realize their obligation not only to their industry as a whole but to the Nation; that they will cheerfully subscribe to the theory that the concern of government necessarily is the greatest good of the greatest number. No one, whether in the coal business or otherwise, can afford to adopt the policy, "may the devil take the hindmost." I trust that the entire industry, whatever differences there may be between individuals, will cooperate in the fixing of minimum prices in accordance with the law, and that when prices are actually fixed, the industry will cheerfully work with the Government in a genuine effort to give the Guffey Coal Act an adequate opportunity to prove its worth.

Similarly, I hope that the consumers of coal will appreciate what the Government and the industry are trying to do, and will not regard the Coal Act as an evil, because it may raise somewhat the price of their coal. Actually, the average increase in bituminous coal prices will be small. The average per-ton increase over prices in the last 9 months of 1937, necessary to return to producers the average cost of production, has been estimated at only about 11 cents per ton. In 1937, the Interstate Commerce Commission authorized an increase in freight rates which raised the 1938 cost of bituminous coal 10 cents per ton. This rise in price was accepted by the consuming public with hardly a murmur of protest. If the consumer is willing to accept an addition of 10 cents to cover the cost of transporting coal, it is not unjust to ask him to accept a comparable increase to cover the cost of mining the coal.

I have a great interest in fair treatment for consumers—whether of coal or of other commodities, and I have fought many battles in their behalf. I shall insist that, in the administration of the Coal Act, consumers be given the consideration that is their right and that their interests be protected. As you know, the act itself requires that the well-being of the consuming public be safeguarded. The Consumers' Counsel Division, which is in the Solicitor's office of the Department of the Interior, fulfills the requirements of the Coal Act by lending aid and assistance to all consumers. Lest you might think that I am an American version of a Gilbert and Sullivan Pooh-Bah, let me hasten to explain that the Consumers' Counsel functions independently of the Division which administers the Coal Act; in fact, the Counsel serves as a watchdog over the activities of the Coal Division in the interest of the consumer. Not being a Pooh-Bah, I know what the Coal Act is supposed to accomplish and whom the Consumers' Counsel is supposed to represent; and knowing these things, I shall continue to insist that each perform its independent functions as provided by the law.

I want to assure you that I shall do my utmost to supervise and direct the administration of the Coal Act so that it will benefit the industry and the public. This law is the result of a chaotic condition of long standing. It represents the demands of a large portion of the producers of bituminous coal, as well as of the miners, for governmental aid in helping to rescue the industry from the depths to which it has been plunged as the result of prolonged price cutting. It is therefore only fair that industry and labor should join hands with the Government in giving the Coal Act a fair and honest trial. This is not the time to press for a new or different act. We must first see whether the one that we have will work. I promise you as honest, efficient, and impartial an administration of this statute as I am capable of giving. I also promise you that if it is given a fair trial and then proves wanting, I will join you in seeking its modification.

First and last, this task is a cooperative undertaking. Industry without government cannot do the job; and government without the support, aid, and counsel of both industry and labor must inevitably fail to accomplish it. Individual producers, your district boards, and labor, as well as the public, must participate actively in the price-fixing process and in the enforcement of the act; they must participate, not with a view to extracting the utmost possible satisfaction of their personal desires but in order to make the act work on a fair and just basis for the benefit of the whole industry, as well as for the country as a whole. The successful administration of this complex statute requires from the Government sympathetic understanding and statesmanship. It requires from those in your industry, including your district boards and your trade associations, as well as from labor and the public, understanding, forbearance, at least a modicum of unselfishness, and statesmanship.

It is my earnest hope that we shall work together in harmony for success.

Investigation by Fortune of Price-Pegging System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

PRESS RELEASE BY FORTUNE MAGAZINE

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release by Fortune relative to the operation of the price-pegging system.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATION-WIDE INVESTIGATION BY FORTUNE REVEALS HOW PRICE-PEGGING SYSTEM WORKS IN ALMOST EVERY CITY

NEW YORK, October 25.—Retail milk prices can be brought down as much as 4 cents per quart in almost every American city, Fortune magazine will declare tomorrow in its November issue.

"Careful inquiry has convinced the editors that the milk enigma is not just another one of those incurable ills of our times, and that the answer is, in fact, currently being found in practice. It is now possible to say that:

"If fluid milk is 5 cents to farmers and 12½ cents to housewives, then with adjustments that will do no violence to present economic beliefs milk can be distributed so as to bring the farmer the same 5 cents or better and cost the average housewife from 9 to perhaps 10 cents at the outside. In fact, one large chain of stores is in a position to sell milk 4½ cents under the average home-delivered price and still make a profit."

In urging the necessity for a readjustment of milk prices, Fortune will point out that the $3,500,000,000-a-year milk business is one of the biggest in the country, accounting for 19 percent of all farm income and 5 percent of the entire national income from all sources.

"The trouble with milk is price," Fortune will declare. "From 1929 to 1936 per capita consumption of milk in the United States dropped 6.8 percent, and it would be vain indeed to look elsewhere than to the steady high price of milk to the consumer for an explanation. In 1938 the milk price index stood at 91, the cost of living index at 83, the food component at 78.9, clothing at 82.3, and rent at 69.5.

"Most Americans know that there is a milk problem. They know it because milk is continually in the news, and the news is always bad.

"It is news of farmers who, having milked the American cow, proceed to dump her product into the country lanes in fierce milk strikes. It is news of racketeering and of upset milk delivery wagons in the city streets. It is news of endless investigations into the milk trust.

"But behind the headlines Americans know there is a milk problem in a very practical and specific sense," Fortune will point out. "They know that whereas the farmer gets between 3 and 5 cents for his milk, housewives are asked to pay from 9 to 16 cents for it. They know that this is neither equitable to the farmer nor to the consumer. They know that the average American drinks 80 less quarts of milk each year than his minimum health requirement.

"American ingenuity and American business have a long record of bringing products such as the automobile and the radio and a hundred other marvels to the ever-larger public. But in the case of the basic commodity, milk, it might be said that the last great landmark seems to have been back in 1893, when pasteurization came into use.

"And the problem of low-price mass distribution remains unsolved.

"The one solid and immediate hope that more people can get the milk they want and need lies with the store method of distribution," Fortune will declare. "With maximum economies it is fair to say that the store price of milk would be at least 4 cents under the home delivered price and at least 2 cents under any home delivered price that is remotely possible.

"Why, then," Fortune will ask, "are stores in some cities forced by law to sell at the same price that is charged for doorstep delivery? Why, in other cities, are they limited by law to a 1-cent differential? Why, in cities where there is no such regulation, do stores fear to reflect the full differential in their prices?

"There must be powerful pressures so to dam up the workings of a supposedly free economy," Fortune will state, proceeding to cite detailed instances of racketeering and Government restrictions resulting from "a type of play in which the farmer runs with the ball while the union makes interference and the big milk companies sit on the bench and coach."

"On learning of the appalling obstructions to the sale of milk at low prices, the first feelings of the enraged citizen suggest that 'there ought to be a law.' But one of the chief troubles with the milk business is precisely that there already are laws," and Fortune will call particular attention to the one distributor in Chicago who tried to bring milk to consumers at a lower price and found himself in trouble with the law.

"The important point to keep in mind is that the present price of milk is set by the cost of home delivery, a service that many people cannot afford," Fortune will declare.

"Stores now make over half of all sales of milk in a few big city markets, and the trend to stores is apparently on the increase. There is no disputing the fact that store distribution is intrinsically cheaper than home delivery, no disputing the fact that there is a powerful body of law and sentiment trying to keep that differential from appearing."

Fortune will cite examples from all over the country to show that lower prices under store distribution are an established, practical fact:

"Meadowmoor Dairies has managed to make a dent in the milk price and the milk business of Chicago by low-cost selling through independent grocery stores. But here it turns out that a company that has tried to make money by getting milk to the consumer at low prices has had to fight labor, big business, and the Department of Agriculture itself.

"George Johnson in Detroit has sold milk at retail from central stations at prices that have ranged from 2 to 4 cents a quart under the going price.

"Highland Farms in Washington, D. C., set up a chain of milk stations selling at 11 cents when the normal price was 14 cents and is reported to have netted its owner $75,000 in 1 year on an investment of $100,000.

"There is Ralphs' in Los Angeles, a chain of supermarkets that runs a creamery of its own and reports a whopping return on the investment. Ralphs' had led many of the price-cutting moves in the market, and when the law was invoked to fix a narrow differential between store and home-delivery price, Ralphs' put out a high-quality ice cream at around 25 cents a quart.

"The position of the big grocery chains throws more light on the central aspects of the problem Fortune will point out. Take the case of the progressive First National chain, which started to sell milk in its Boston stores at 2 cents under the home-delivery price and was increasing its business rapidly until a new law forced a 1-cent differential as a maximum and, for good measure, added that milk sold in paper containers (which reduce delivery cost) should be priced 1 cent above bottled milk. After that law went into effect, milk consumption in the Boston area dropped 100,000 quarts a day.

"More illuminating still is the current embarrassment of Safeway Stores. In many communities its stores are forced by law to sell milk at the going home-delivery price, and Safeway is in the uncomfortable position of making much more money out of milk than it thinks is proper.

"For Safeway, delivering milk to 29 units in its chain in 18 towns in the San Bernardino-Riverside area, discovered that the cost of delivery, including truck maintenance, depreciation, and wages, came to only four-tenths of a cent a quart, and the whole cost from farm to consumer, including pasteurization done by Safeway itself, was 3 cents.

"These operations and others like them prove that milk can be distributed much more cheaply when a large-volume come-and-get-it system is used.

"The motives of the Milk Wagon Drivers' Union to keep the store price up are as obvious as its methods are sometimes questionable," Fortune will also explain. "The union men want to keep their jobs and they want to be paid a good, sound wage for performing their work, so quite naturally they use their influence to preserve the home-delivery system.

"And hand in glove with the big farm cooperatives all over the country and towering above the local and regional milk companies in size are the two great national holding companies, National Dairy and Borden, whose subsidiaries distribute fresh milk in most of the dairy regions.

"The motives that actuate the big milk-distributing companies to preserve home delivery and go easy on store sales are harder to discern because the milk companies claim they make little or no profit from fluid milk.

"Their immediate incentive, however, is clear. With their own salesmen, the milk drivers, calling on the home, the companies have a relatively closed market. They are in far more competition with other suppliers of milk, actual and potential, when they sell to storekeepers.

"As for the farmers, the reason they almost always play the big distributors' price game is that they have been convinced that the costs of distribution are irrevocably fixed and a lower home-delivered price means a cut in the price paid to them.

"There are a great variety of ways in which price parity may be achieved and the general level of retail milk prices held up," Fortune will explain. "Generally speaking, the big farmer cooperative is a rather clumsy and arbitrary instrument, coming into action chiefly on price negotiations with the milk companies, but it does exert a powerful influence through the State and Federal Governments to keep the price of fluid milk up.

"San Francisco has an ordinance that pasteurization plants must be within the city. Since city land is very high in price, new plants have been discouraged and 'raiders' kept out.

"San Mateo and Santa Clara Counties in California require all milk sold to be pasteurized and bottled within the county. A similar regulation in Minneapolis was found unconstitutional by the State supreme court.

"In New York the union succeeded in having public milk stations, opened by Mayor LaGuardia, shut down. In San Francisco union members called on grocery stores and asked them not to buy from Clara-Cal, a small group of dairy farmers selling through independent grocery stores at 1 cent below the going store price.

"Across the bay in Oakland another cooperative met the same treatment and was further discouraged when only 25 percent of its bottles came back intact.

"The high point of labor tactics on another occasion was the needling of paper containers with a hypodermic syringe filled with lemon juice. The milk inside was soured, and the brand got a bad name with the housewife.

"An even more powerful weapon in price maintenance is the ability of health authorities to limit the milk supply by refusing to inspect and license farmers who want to sell in the city. * * *

"It looks like a deadlock," Fortune will conclude. "And so, for the moment, it is. But it is a deadlock that is ready to be resolved, and the speed at which this foreseeable unwinding will proceed is largely up to the consumer."

The Monroe Doctrine and the War in Europe—Repeal of the Embargo an Act of Self-Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. THOMAS HEWES

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting, by request, a comprehensive statement made with respect to the Monroe Doctrine and the war in Europe, prepared by the Honorable Thomas Hewes, formerly Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, as well as formerly an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The statement follows:

In considering the proposal to modify the existing Embargo Act and deciding upon a course of action which will be for the best interest of the United States, it is unquestionably necessary to endeavor to envisage, as far as practicable, the ultimate effects, if any, of the present war in Europe on this country. In doing this, I, for one, have reached the conclusion that among the effects is a probable challenge of the Monroe Doctrine by Germany if that country should be successful. If this conclusion can be demonstrated to be sound, then I think it can be established that it would be more advantageous to us than not to alter the Embargo Act to permit trade with any ccuntry in any commodity. To do so on a cash-and-carry basis will, at the moment, aid England and France. To thus aid these countries would, in my judgment, be a clear-cut act of self-defense, anticipatory in nature but, nevertheless, the most effective and the least costly form of future protection now available.

The Monroe Doctrine is a name applied to a principle of American foreign policy, namely, that the establishment in the Western Hemisphere by a European nation of any political control or ownership of land, other than that which existed at the beginning of the last century, is dangercus to the safety of the United States, and, therefore, would not be permitted by us if we could prevent it. The English equivalent, for example, of this doctrine is that Belgium, the Netherlands, and France must be either friendly or neutral so that a protective land belt will lie between the channel and the North Sea and any other European power. This policy of England, which is entirely a matter of self-preservation, has more than once been the cause of war.

As long ago as 1823 the United States, through President Monroe, speaking to Congress, asserted that it was vitally concerned in the activities of foreign countries beyond its territorial borders. In effect, that not alone by direct attack might the welfare and safety of this Nation be jeopardized; that, in reality, our welfare required that we should constantly be on guard against the occurrence of acts, even though geographically remote, that contained the seed of destructive forces which in the natural course of events would imperil our people. He clearly was not an isolationist; and in days of sailing ships seemed convinced that the waters of the Atlantic were not a sufficient and solely to be relied upon safety zone. "In the wars of European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense."

President Grant, in 1870, elaborated this principle of hands off, saying: "The doctrine promulgated by President Monroe has been adhered to by all political parties, and I now deem it proper to assert the equally important principle that hereafter no territory on this continent shall be regarded as a subject of transfer to a European power."

President Cleveland, in 1895, further extended it by intervening in a boundary dispute between British Guiana and Venezuela.

Thus, since the beginning of our Nation we have viewed the course of events beyond our own borders with eyes continually open to the effect of these events upon our own well-being. This sound principle, accepted for a century and more, has no demonstrable geographical limitations on the origin of the cause of concern. Only the end of the chain is limited to this hemisphere. And this lack of restraint on the source of necessity must be true if the test is, as it certainly is, our own self-interest. The utility of the doctrine has been demonstrated to the complete satisfaction of generations of Americans.

So, when we view the European conflict from a selfish point of view, we are not embarking on a new venture. Our ancestors early recognized the need of security, acted as required from time to time, and did not shrink from risks if the end seemed to warrant them. This same courage, happily, is as visible today as in 1789.

While circumstances in our past history have focused the doctrine at the moment of application to situations limited initially to this hemisphere, that is coincidence merely and not a restriction of the doctrine. We are entirely familiar with the principle of elasticity in construing our Constitution, the need arising out of changing conditions. In like manner, as requires no great elaboration, modifications in the world political, economic, and social picture may demand the expansion of the field of circumstances which call into play a particular foreign policy. To name a few changes, we find growing populations allegedly pressing on the subsistence of inadequate land areas, as for example in Japan; we have increasing urban numbers, relying for life as they must on manufacture, demanding indispensable raw materials, as for example in Germany. If these are not available in an ordinary way, they will be sought in another. It is simply primitive self-preservation which compels this country to observe these modern phenomena and quaere their ultimate effect on ourselves. And, if in doing so we have sufficient foresight to recognize the probability of a future invasion of this hemisphere flowing as a matter of course from a current situation, it is clearly the duty of statesmen to determine whether or not it is better to endeavor to forestall that invasion instead of waiting for its impact. Can anyone successfully demonstrate that the principle of the Monroe Doctrine does not extend to such a case?

Let us now be specific. If Germany defeats England and France, and assuming as we must in making a currently required decision that no new and unpredictable factors will develop which, if we could know them, might affect our decisions, will we or will we not in all probability be face to face with a challenge of the Monroe Doctrine? I think that the answer, more probably than not, is "yes," and because of the very seriousness of the threat we must give considered weight to the significance of this probability.

The avowed and implicit object of Hitler's military policy is the securing of a living space. This living space of necessity contemplates a physical area of abode and equally important sources or supplies of raw materials. Raw materials are required for ordinary living and also as the food of factories for export. Some raw materials are available in Germany's neighborhood; others are not. If a raw material source can at the same time furnish a market for finished goods, so much the better. As partially illustrative, witness Japan's attempt to create monopolistic market in China. Such a one is infinitely preferable to a competitive market so far as the exploiter goes. Hence, in a degree, Germany's demand for colonies.

If Germany wins this war, she is going after raw materials at places and in a manner most suitable to her, and what better available places are there than the British dominions or colonies and Central and South America? The Far East would seem to be out, but not necessarily Africa. Canada is certainly one of the possibilities. To the south of us, a peaceful invasion of years' standing facilitates a more aggressive front.

If these assumptions are reasonable, and they certainly seem so, they obviously involve the Western Hemisphere. And is it going too far, knowing the German approach, to anticipate that at some point force or power will manifest itself? This is certainly true, I think, so far as Canada goes, and I can easily picture the attempt to the south. Naval and air bases in the Carribean are obvious possibilities. Garrisons are not improbable. Any of these eventualities of course run straight into the Monroe Doctrine. If you say that this is getting too remote or far ahead, I say, why not? Desperate things are abroad in our world, as we all know, and why under Heaven should we assume that our part will be free from the desire and will of nations impregnated with the poison of superiority and the virtue of force?

Now if the doctrine is thus challenged, what are we going to do about it? Obviously we must fight if diplomacy fails and the past 3 years have proven that diplomacy will fail if the other side thinks it is more powerful or can work a bluff. Suppose then we must finally fight to keep the Western Hemisphere free—solely as a matter of our own self-protection. What of a Canadian border of 3,000 miles under German control? What of the need of guarding the Pacific and Atlantic coasts? What of the Panama Canal approaches? What, in addition, of the possibility of an actual theater of war several thousand miles away?

England and France are fighting today for their very lives, and they are in this strait because enough people thought that it couldn't happen to them.

I submit, therefore, that from the American point of view, the Monroe Doctrine is decidedly in issue in Europe today. The presence in the political world of relatively friendly nations like England and France, embracing in a general way our own concepts of right and wrong and international good manners, has heretofore rendered the doctrine potent and self-operative, merely by its pronouncement by us, plus, of course, the unwelcome possibility of a war. With this balance of power gone and force in the saddle over great sections of the world's surface, who can say that the doctrine will thus persist in its automatic efficacy? Japan, as we all know, looks with favor on American markets. Is it beyond the possible that she might cooperate with a victorious Germany, in seeking it?

To me the conclusion is inexorable.

The present Embargo Act is acknowledged by all to be potentially helpful to Germany and harmful to England and France. Because, from the foregoing, I hope it is clear that it is to our advantage to aid England and France, the act should be changed to accomplish this effect. Furthermore, in doing so, we obtain on the proposed cash-and-carry basis, a partial restoration of foreign trade. As the most powerful Nation in the world and acknowledged to be such, why must we abandon our right to trade, the case for which has been set forth so cogently by the President. We didn't start this war and we are vitally concerned in free access to foreign markets, and vice versa.

The arguments against any change in the Embargo Act are familiar. They can be briefly stated.

It is urged by millions of voices that to repeal the Embargo Act will, without doubt, lead us into war. This is pure conjecture. It is equally reasonable to assert that it will not lead to war, that it will prevent war. My own feeling is that it will aid the avoidance of war rather than otherwise. But I suggest that war is not the issue before Congress. The one and only issue is, What course of action will be for the ultimate best interest of the United States? Can we really say in the light of the great swings of history and of peoples that no end is worth fighting for; that no cause is worth a struggle of arms? I don't feel that Americans think that.

It is claimed that to now change the law would be unneutral. First, it should be noted that strictly speaking neutrality is simply a word to describe a legal concept, a principle of international law. It is immensely complicated and subject to contract changes. But I have not heard that the proposed methods of sales to belligerents has been attacked as technically unneutral. Neutrality, however, has no virtue in and of itself. It is entirely a matter of national self-interest. It is assumed or rejected as an instrument of foreign policy solely because of its expected effect on the common good. What people really have in mind is that the result of the passage of the proposed law would amount to taking sides and that this might get us into trouble. There is no doubt that at present one side would be more benefited than the other; this might really change overnight. On the general proposition of taking sides I am wholly in agreement that this should not be done unless in pursuit of what we deem our benefit, and in such pursuit, of course, we must take into account the consequences which can be anticipated. To my way of thinking, individual sympathy or interest should have no conclusive place whatever in a sound American foreign policy. Our complex population, if there were no other cause, would be a sufficient reason.

It is clear that only the service of all can warrant the United States in intruding in matters beyond its borders. If that coincides with a general sympathy well and good, but entirely incidental. Thus, while as individuals, many of us may be violently aroused by the destruction of Poland, the threat to the Scandinavian countries by Russia, or the possibility of the conquest of England and France, none of these events by themselves could possibly support any act of intervention or intrusion on our part. Territorial struggles have marked the history of Europe for centuries and may possibly continue to do so but the United States can have no part in the issue of which country shall dominate affairs for the time being, provided, always, that this country is not unduly affected. But if the country is so affected then the whole business of being unneutral has to be appraised in that light.

We must of necessity take sides. To do otherwise is unreal. If we are convinced that the defeat of England and France will be decidedly harmful to our common good, and if, while maintaining a position of neutrality wholly defensible in international law, the result will be beneficial to our Nation, we are simply fortunate in not having to do more. Under these circumstances there can be no significance to the charge of being unneutral or taking sides. It is only under circumstances where the common good of the United States is not materially affected that the charge of taking sides can be maintained.

While it is characteristic of current thinking to assert that the influence of the United States should at all times be on the side of what we consider good morals, this is far different from the attitude that we should by force be or become international police in affairs that are strictly none of our business examined in the light of our own self-interest. For example, while we might publicly and officially deprecate Japan's assault of China, this is really a local matter unless we can clearly see that we are really involved. The same is true of Italy's capture of Abyssinia.

In summary, I suggest as a matter of considered judgment that the Monroe Doctrine is clearly involved in the war in Europe, because if Germany defeats England and France it is more probable than not that the United States will be called upon to declare a hands-off policy in the Western Hemisphere. If our position is challenged, it must be defended.

Therefore, if this conflict can be averted, it is to our advantage to do so. One act which will tend to avert it is the repeal of the embargo law, which for the moment will aid England and France. This is tantamount to an act of self-defense. If this leads to war, better a war under present conditions than later on when we alone shall face a possibly embattled world.

The situation is none of our making, but, nevertheless, it is as it is and we are in and of it. However we might with all our hearts desire to live and let live, we cannot under all possible conditions attain to this. Therefore, if we would be free, we must be brave.

Reciprocal-Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT GORE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, recently so many statements, unsupported in fact, have been made regarding the operation of the reciprocal-trade agreements by partisan critics, who seemingly close their eyes to the fact that a nation must buy as well as sell, and to the fact that the basis of any real and lasting international peace and friendship is mutually beneficial two-way trade, that I have here prepared answers to certain current questions on trade agreements and their relationship to farmers.

First. Are American farmers better off or worse off under the trade-agreements program than they were under the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930?

Answer. Compare the following figures for 1932, under the 1930 tariff, and for 1938 and later periods, under the trade-agreements program, and give your own answer:

	1932	1938	1939
Cash farm income (billions of dollars)[1]	4.6	7.5	[2]7.6
Average farm price index (1909–14=100)	65	95	-------

[1] Excluding Government payments.
[2] Estimated by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Oct. 24, 1939.

	Year		First 9 months, 1939	Sept. 15, 1939
	1932	1938
United States monthly average farm prices of:
Wheat (cents per bushel)	38.8	66.1	59.7	72.7
Corn (cents per bushel)	28.1	49.0	47.4	56.2
Hogs (dollars per 100 pounds)	3.34	7.74	6.55	7.06
Beef cattle (dollars per 100 pounds)	4.25	6.53	6.86	7.07
Butterfat (cents per pound)	17.9	26.3	23.0	24.7
Wool (cents per pound)	8.6	19.1	21.2	24.3

Second. Just how competitive are our agricultural imports?

Answer. Take 1938 for example. In 1938 imports of agricultural products of all kinds were valued at slightly less than $956,000,000. Of this total, one-half were of types such as rubber, coffee, silk, and so forth, not produced in the United States; nearly 30 percent were of types imported over the tariff because the United States did not produce enough of them to meet domestic requirements; 14 percent were accounted for by sugar, imports of which were controlled throughout 1938 by the quotas; and the remaining 7 percent were accounted for by minor miscellaneous items falling in one or another of these groups.

Third. In the trade agreements thus far negotiated, has the United States obtained more concessions for industrial exports than for agricultural exports?

Answer. No. Just the reverse. Including all concessions obtained to date, but using 1937 import figures of the trade-agreement countries as the latest available for such analysis, it appears that the United States has obtained concessions—including bindings of duty-free entry—for 47 percent of its total agricultural exports and for 24 percent of its total nonagricultural exports. Such are the actual facts, in spite of allegations to the contrary. But, in any case, the concessions obtained for nonagricultural exports benefit farmers by creating more employment and more purchasing power in our cities for farm products; just as, in the same way, the concessions obtained for agricultural exports benefit industry by creating more purchasing power on our farms for industrial products.

Fourth. Has the United States made duty reductions on a greater proportion of agricultural than of nonagricultural products?

Answer. No. The United States has granted duty reductions, under trade agreements, on agricultural commodities which, in 1937, made up 14.1 percent of total agricultural imports into the United States in that year. Duty reductions on nonagricultural products granted by the United States cover items which in 1937 made up 21.6 percent of total United States nonagricultural imports in that year. The 14.1 percent referred to above includes Cuban sugar which, in 1937, accounted for 6.6 percent of the total agricultural imports. Imports of sugar, up to September 12, 1939, have been controlled by legislative quotas. Cancelation of these quotas on September 12 automatically restored the duty on Cuban sugar to its preagreement level.

The duty reductions on agricultural products are carefully safeguarded where necessary; and by assisting in a general program of foreign-trade expansion they are helpful, rather than injurious, to American agriculture as a whole.

Fifth. Have the trends in our agricultutral exports and imports since 1932 been favorable or unfavorable for the American farmer?

Answer. On the whole, they have been distinctly favorable. Exports have increased, and that is obviously to the good. Imports have also increased, but this increase has not prevented a marked rise in both farm income and national income; in fact, it was itself partly the result of improved economic conditions which were reflected in rising farm and national income.

The key figures are as follows:

Agricultural foreign trade

[In millions of dollars]

	1932	1937	1938	First 6 months
				1938	1939
Exports (things actually produced on American farms)	662	797	828	413	268
Imports (one-half of types not produced in United States; remainder competitive in limited degree if at all)	668	1,579	956	477	520

As to exports, it will be observed that the figures in 1937 and 1938 were far above those for 1932. In the first 6 months of 1939 as compared with the same period in 1938, exports declined because of unsettled conditions abroad and, in the important case of cotton, because of the pegging of the American price above the world price.

As to imports, while, as already stated, they have in recent years been well above the 1932 level, so also has farm income (see I above). It will also be noted that imports have receded from the high level attained in 1937, at which time they reached a high peak owing in part to the effects of the severe droughts of 1934 and 1936, and in part to the fact that 1937 was a relatively prosperous year which led to large increases in imports of agricultural raw materials, mostly of types not produced in this country.

Sixth. How have trade agreements affected exports of farm products?

Answer. Maintaining and reopening foreign markets through trade agreements is definitely assisting farm exports. Exports of farm products to trade-agreement countries have fared much better than have exports to other countries. Comparing 1938 with 1935 (when few trade agreements were in effect), the figures are:

	1935	1938	Percent change
Total agricultural exports	$747,000,000	$827,000,000	+11
To trade-agreement countries	174,000,000	260,000,000	+49
To other countries	573,000,000	567,000,000	−1

While United States exports of all types declined in the first 6 months of 1939 as compared with the same period in 1938, total exports to trade-agreement countries fell only half as much as did exports to other countries.

	First 6 months		Percent decrease
	1938	1939
Total exports, all commodities	$1,591,000,000	$1,415,000,000	11
To trade-agreement countries	887,000,000	824,000,000	7
To other countries	704,000,000	591,000,000	16

Regulation of Oil Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. LEON C. PHILLIPS, GOVERNOR OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Leon C. Phillips, Governor of Oklahoma, at the 10th annual meeting of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, Fort Worth, Tex., October 19, 1939:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, members of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, ladies and gentlemen, I am happy to be here. I always enjoy the hospitality of this great State. Its traditions inspire me. I have great respect and admiration for its citizenship as well as its glorious history. Since this is the greatest oil-producing State in the Nation it is fortunate that this historic meeting should be held here. Here in Texas is the spirit of independence and self-reliance which characterizes the spirit of the great Southwest that I love.

I am happy to meet with the independent oil men of America. Their willingness to risk has discovered for the Nation vast hidden treasures for the benefit of mankind. The independent operator has been and always will be the pioneer of the industry. It was the realization of the wildcatter's dream that made these United States the greatest oil-producing Nation. Some 15 years ago there was great concern that the petroleum reserves would soon be exhausted but his ingenuity, courage, and determination have discovered and made available vast reserves so that now instead of a scarcity of oil we have an abundance. Since 1925 the Nation has produced and consumed twice as much oil as we then thought we had and still we have three times as much reserves as was then calculated to be recoverable. So the problem at this time is not how to find more oil but how to properly produce and use that oil which has been discovered.

It was the discovery of the great oil fields and the rush to produce them that brought about the conservation laws in the various oil-producing States. The sovereign States in the exercise of their police power enacted laws to prevent avoidable waste of this great resource. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Champlin case held that this was a constitutional exercise of power. These laws have been amended from time to time and brought down to date. Experience and sound engineering principles have been incorporated into those laws until now every major oil-producing State in the Nation with one exception has such law. In that State a special session of the legislature will soon be called and at this moment they are working out a law based on these sound principles. I feel sure that they will enact a good law in the near future and that it may then be said that each major oil-producing State has a fine conservation law.

In order to coordinate this police power exercised by each of the sovereign States, the Interstate Oil Compact Commission was established. You are familiar with its organization and its functions. Its meetings furnish a forum for the discussion of the problems of the various States. A study is made of the problems of conservation, and the representatives return to their States with sound recommendations. Of course, each sovereign State may and does exercise its own judgment in solving its problems and in enforcing its laws, but I am happy to say there is a fine spirit of cooperation between the States in this difficult and important undertaking. In addition to the representatives from the compacting States, other oil-producing States from time to time send their representatives to the meetings of the Compact Commission. The interest generated by these meetings has stimulated the conservation program throughout the Nation. In 1939 Arkansas, California, and Michigan enacted conservation statutes. The oil industry subscribes to this conservation movement and gives fine cooperation.

As a result the oil States are getting the job done. The reserves of available oil in sight have constantly increased; oil is being produced under sound engineering practices to insure the largest recovery for the use of civilization. Oil is plentiful. By advanced methods of discovery, production, refining, and transportation the industry is furnishing this valuable product at constantly decreasing prices to the consumer. Gasoline is cheaper in the United States than in any other nation of the world. The Nation need have no fear; the oil industry is ready to answer the roll call in any emergency. There is plenty of oil for the Nation's needs. All this without Government aid or subsidy. There has been no Government edict requiring the prospecting for oil, nor has there been a bonus or subsidy by the Government; yet the oil industry has met the challenge of civilization and is carrying on. I think you might well be proud of this accomplishment, and I congratulate you.

The oil industry has had its trials and tribulations, but now appears to be reasonably prosperous. No doubt there are some, however, who, following the trend of the times, would run to the Government with their problems in the hope and expectation that magic can be performed. They doubtless hope that some legislative legerdemain can be accomplished and they can have the benefits of governmental sleight of hand, overlooking entirely the sad fact that, for benefits promised, intolerable burdens are imposed. Be not deceived; look the situation squarely and fairly in the face. Do not let the Pied Piper of Hamelin lead you astray, for regimentation and bureaucracy must follow as night follows day.

At this meeting you will discuss the many complex problems confronting your industry. One of those problems now confronting you is the question of the position you will take in regard to the regulation of your business by a Federal bureau. There has been introduced in Congress a bill, commonly called the Cole bill, to regulate the production of oil by a national agency. This bill is being studied by Congress. It is being considered by you at this meeting. This organization will be expected at this meeting to approve or disapprove this pending legislation, and you should study the question with utmost care and consideration. I understand that Representative COLE of Maryland, who introduced the measure in Congress, has been invited to address this meeting and will speak to you tomorrow on the subject.

No doubt Representative COLE will tell you that the Secretary of the Interior favors the enactment of the law. Apparently, the Secretary of the Interior is willing to assume the added responsibility imposed upon his office by this law. It will, of course, greatly enlarge the functions, authority, and power of his office. I do not believe there is any necessity for the Federal Government to undertake to do that which the States are doing and have demonstrated they are able to do; namely, prevent avoidable waste in the production of oil. As I have stated, the States do this under their fundamental police power. The National Government is without police power, but the Cole bill asserts as a declaration of policy that to maintain an adequate national defense and regulate interstate commerce it is necessary for Congress to prevent avoidable waste of petroleum products. This bill is purely a conservation bill. The question of market demand or demand and supply is in no way considered. By its terms the bill is an unqualified endorsement of the methods and practices invoked by the oil-producing States in their conservation laws and recommended by the Interstate Oil Compact Commission. The sound engineering principles for the production of oil to prevent waste which are already embodied in the laws of the oil-producing States and in the recommendations of the Interstate Oil Compact Commission are incorporated in the bill. There is one exception and that is in the provision whereby it is provided in effect that an operator must secure the consent of the Commissioner to abandon and plug a well.

Generally I find no objection to the purposes expressed in the bill. Surely, the prevention of waste of this valuable irreplaceable resource is a worthy purpose. It is generally approved by the industry and the oil-producing States. It is already incorporated in the laws of practically all the oil States. The question which now confronts us is whether or not there is need for Federal legislation on the subject. I subscribe to the view that there is no need for the duplication of effort and expense in the matter. Unless we admit that the States are not preventing avoidable waste surely there is no need to set up a long-range expensive Federal bureau empowered to control the production of oil from every well in every field in the United States. Most of the State laws are superior to the proposed Federal legislation in that they take into consideration the fact that the production of oil in excess of market demand is waste, while the proposed Federal legislation omits entirely consideration of that form of waste. Not only do the States prevent the waste of oil by sound engineering principles, but they consider the reasonable market demand as reflected by the Bureau of Mines' estimate. The States through the Compact Commission have found the Bureau of Mines' estimate helpful in this regard and generally follow these estimates.

Then, too, the State laws are fairer and more equitable than the proposed Federal legislation because they provide for ratable taking, commonly called proration. The States in their laws take cognizance of correlative rights of operators and of the different fields, and in administering the law are bound by equitable principles. In the proposed Federal act the Commissioner is empowered to make rules and regulations to define wasteful methods and practices, which have the force and effect of law. It does not appear that the Commissioner is obliged to consider the correlative rights of the owners of the property or to require ratable taking.

Of course, the enactment of the Cole bill will not destroy the fundamental rights of the States to exercise their police power in the enactment of and enforcing their conservation laws. If enacted into law, this bill would simply furnish an additional policeman to the oil industry. The State government, under its police power, would regulate the production of oil and the Federal Government, under the interstate commerce theory, would likewise regulate. Surely the oil industry would be well regulated. It is conceivable that the State, in the exercise of its sovereign rights, would prescribe certain regulations while the commissioner, the Federal authority, employing a different set of engineers and experts, would prescribe different rules. In such case it will be seen at a glance that the producer would be confronted with quite a trying situation. If he ignored the Federal rule and observed the State rule, he would be subject to heavy penalty. If he ignored the State rule and obeyed the Federal rule, he would be subjected to the penalties provided by the State. Thus, it is possible that he might experience difficulty in faithfully serving two masters. The provisions in the law whereby the Federal commissioner may cooperate with the State authorities is optional with the commissioner. He is only authorized, and not directed, to do so. A real conflict of authority is not only possible but probable.

As I view it, there are many objectionable features in the Cole bill. Like many modern laws, it sets up an appointive official with despotic powers. The appointive official is granted the right to enact legislation by prescribing rules and regulations. These rules and regulations have the force and effect of law and a violation of same or failure to obey any order of this commissioner is punishable by heavy fine or imprisonment or both for each day's violation. By the terms of the bill the pumper, the gager, the superintendent, and the president of the company can each be indicted by the Federal court in any State in the Union and found equally guilty of the same violation. To determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of the act or any rule of the commissioner, the commissioner is constituted a court of inquiry and may require the accused to give evidence against himself under oath by requiring him to file a statement in writing concerning the matter to be investigated.

The Commissioner is empowered to file a written complaint against a person before himself and after 5 days' notice to try him, and may make findings against him and issue a desist order. The accused has the privilege to appear in person or by counsel and present evidence under such regulations as the Commissioner may prescribe. The rules of evidence prevailing in the courts are not controlling in such hearing. The judgment of the Commissioner is conclusive in all courts if supported by substantial evidence. The Commissioner is permitted to fix the time and place of this hearing as he may elect. It is obvious that it would be most convenient to the Commissioner to have such hearing in Washington, D. C. The only appeal allowed the accused from the rule or order is to the circuit court of appeals. It is provided, however, that this court is bound by the findings of the Commissioner if supported by substantial evidence. The Commissioner may enforce his rules and regulations by injunctions or mandamus in any Federal district court without bond. The bill conveniently provides that the District Court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of such suits and any persons. Civil or criminal proceeding may be instigated by the Commissioner in any State of the Nation.

By the terms of the bill the Commissioner is vested not only with legislative, judicial, and executive power but he is granted broad discretionary powers. Repeatedly, the bill uses the words, "The Commissioner is authorized and empowered." Nowhere is he directed. It may truly be said that the powers granted to the proposed Commissioner are dictatorial. I do not believe in vesting such unusual powers in any appointive Federal official. Such power if exercised should be kept nearer home. Elected State officials are more responsive to the will of the people.

In my judgment this is a historic meeting. What you do here is of vital importance not only to the oil industry but to the entire Nation. There are many who view with alarm the tendency of the States to surrender their sovereignty. Federal control of the oil industry, of course, is of vital importance to you from a business standpoint. If ever the blight of Federal control is imposed on the oil industry of the Nation, the day of the independent operator has passed and I will never again have the opportunity to see an independent oil operator put down a test well near my home town of Okemah, Okla., to add to the wealth of my State and the Nation. It will likewise result in further centralization of power in the Federal Government and a corresponding surrender of individual liberties. Any Federal oil-control bill would necessarily be a further surrender of rights heretofore reserved to the States. It should be considered from that standpoint as well as from the standpoint of the businessman engaged in the industry. You have in your organization clear-thinking, patriotic minds. I have no doubt that you will approach the subject in a patriotic manner. The eyes of the Nation are upon you.

I thank you.

Cost of the World War, 1914–19

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the following data were gathered with a view toward getting some estimate of the cost of the World War.

Statisticians differ in the amounts they specify as World War costs. That the amount of money spent to carry on the last war was tremendous nobody can deny. Many of the disastrous results of the war cannot be measured in dollars and cents, such as the suffering, misery, and heartaches of millions. Other costs can be measured only roughly. Under those circumstances, we must view the following estimates in a tolerant light, realizing full well there cannot be laboratory accuracy and exactness.

THE DIRECT AND INDIRECT COST OF THE WORLD WAR

The net direct cost of the World War has been estimated at $186,233,637,097. According to figures compiled by the Swiss Bank of Geneva, the average daily expenditure for the first 3 years of the war was $123,000,000; during the fourth year this rose to $244,000,000—an hourly cost of $10,000,000. This appalling figure does not include indirect costs of the war such as destruction of property, loss of life, disease, or depreciation of capital which amount to almost that of the direct cost. Nor does it account for the more far-reaching and disastrous effects of race deterioration—both physical and moral—economic disorder and social unrest which cannot be measured in terms of money. The measurable indirect costs of the last war can be outlined briefly as follows:

Capitalized value of human life, including soldiers and civilians	$67,102,552,560
Property losses on land and sea	36,760,000,000
Loss of production	45,000,000,000
War relief	1,000,000,000
Loss to neutrals	1,750,000,000
Total	151,612,552,560

By adding this indirect cost of $151,612,552,560 to the direct cost of $186,233,637,097, we have a total expenditure of $337,846,189,657 as the price exacted by the last World War.

The above information was obtained from Preliminary Economic Studies of the War, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Oxford University Press, 1920.

DIRECT AND INDIRECT COSTS OF THE WORLD WAR TO THE UNITED STATES

The gross cost of the World War to the United States has been estimated at $32,080,266,968, including advances to the Allies of $9,455,014,125.

The following table gives the estimated indirect costs of the war:

Capitalized value of lives lost	$517,972,800
Expenditures of relief agencies	625,015,028
Loss of property (vessels and cargo)	371,437,650

In addition to the costs listed, there was also a loss of production for each man transferred from civil to military duties. This loss has been estimated at approximately $500 a year per soldier:

Casualties during the period 1914–18 are shown below:

Known dead	107,284
Seriously wounded	43,000
Otherwise wounded	148,000
Prisoners or missing	4,912

This information was obtained from Preliminary Economic Studies of the War, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Oxford University Press, 1920.

UNITED STATES WORLD WAR COSTS

The following summary of the World War costs to the United States was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (vol. 61, pt. 4, p. 3355) of the Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, at the request of the late Senator S. P. Spencer, of Missouri. This table gives the expenses with reference to the authority from which the information was obtained:

Military cost, as per report of Secretary Houston	$24,010,000,000.00
Extra cost of Government functions under war conditions, as per report of Secretary Houston	4,500,000,000.00
Red Cross contributions	978,512,225.00
Other relief contributions to organizations—Salvation Army, Knights of Columbus, Young Men's Christian Association, etc.—estimated at one-half Red Cross	490,000,000.00
Governmental contributions to relief from war supplies, etc. (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 24, 1921, p. 3181)	648,000,000.00
American citizen claims against Germany, as per report of Secretary of State (see S. Doc. No. 419, 66th Cong., 3d sess.)	221,133,231.21
Confiscated American-owned property in Germany, as per same document	191,147,346.76
Confiscated property of American prisoners in Germany, as per same document	12,560.08
Pension costs, estimated by comparison with Civil War pensions; wounded in Civil War were 246,712 and in World War, 224,089; Civil War pensions up to June 30, 1919, were $5,299,859,509.39 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 20, 1921, p. 2908)	5,000,000,000.00
Obligations of foreign governments absorbed in the United States by private interests since Aug. 1, 1914 (see report of Secretary Glass in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 24, 1921, p. 3181)	4,129,820,344.11
Governmental loans to Allies, with interest	10,000,000,000.00
Total	50,168,625,707.16

Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, America's ace of the air during the World War, has stated that, figuring the cost to the world of the last war as $250,000,000,000, we could have taken that staggering sum, built homes at $2,500 each equipped with $1,000 worth of furniture, built on $500 lots, and given such a home to every family in the United States, England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy, Germany, Russia, and Australia.

To every 40,000 people in those countries could have been given a $2,000,000 library, a $3,000,000 hospital, and a $10,000,000 university. The balance, invested at 5 percent, could have paid annual salaries at $1,000 each to 125,000 teachers and 125,000 nurses.

Such a vast sum of money could have been used to make over the entire world and rid it of so much misery and suffering. It is hoped that the day will come when mankind will turn away from destructive devices and utilize its energy in constructive endeavors.

An Example of Sanity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, during these critical days the United States is fortunate indeed in having in the Honorable Harry H. Woodring, of Kansas, as Secretary of War, an official whose influence is characterized as beneficent "on the side of caution and coolness," and under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ernest K. Lindley, which appeared in the Washington Post of October 27, 1939:

[From the Washington Post of October 27, 1939]

AN EXAMPLE OF SANITY

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

OUR ARMY AND NAVY

One of the more reassuring aspects of the debate over American foreign policy is the sanity which prevails in the War and Navy Departments. This assertion stands in spite of the recent furore over the War Resources Board.

At almost any given moment during the last few years there has been less evidence of war hysteria in the War and Navy Departments than among top-ranking New Dealers in other branches of the Government.

Secretary of War Woodring has turned out to be a persistent opponent of foreign adventures. In the early days of the Roosevelt administration, while he was Assistant Secretary, he was suspected of being a professional patriot, perhaps even a kind of firebrand. He put his name to one or two ill-considered magazine articles. And, of course, he made as strong a case as he could for improving the Army, which was in a bad state.

WOODRING DISPLAYS CAUTION, COOLNESS

He was also eager to please his boss, Franklin D. Roosevelt, to whom he is utterly loyal. But as the European crisis has edged into war, Woodring's influence has been exerted more and more on the side of caution. Frequently his advice has not been taken. For example, he advised against the French airplane deal almost a year ago, and when he saw that the President was determined to go ahead, he urged that it be done publicly. The President chose secrecy instead, and was greatly embarrassed when the arrangement was brought to light by the crash of the bomber which the French were considering buying. The whole affair received 10 times the attention which it would have received if Woodring's advice had been followed.

Although he has worked for a larger, better-equipped, and better-trained Army, Woodring looks upon the Army as a defensive instrument. And he seems to be wholly committed to the idea that our lines of defense should be in the Western Hemisphere, not on the Rhine or the Yangtze. In recent months nobody in the Cabinet has a more beneficent influence on the side of caution and coolness.

Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War, has been more militant, more war-minded. He is by nature a more aggressive man than Woodring, and he is quick, energetic, and ambitious. Yet in the speeches for which he has been criticized by the isolationists he only followed the main line of policy laid down by the White House—where every one of his important utterances was O. K.'d before it was delivered. Johnson's eagerness to cooperate in every way was one of the qualities which made him a favorite with the White House group until a few weeks ago, when he riled the New Deal crowd by the men he picked for the War Resources Board. These selections were approved by the President, however. And it was the President who decided that it was time to play up the industrial mobilization side of national defense—and then changed his mind when he found out that the War Resources Board was being regarded as a sign that he was getting ready to put us in the European war.

JOHNSON TAKES RAP FOR MISCALCULATION

Johnson, like many another lieutenant, has had to take the rap for a miscalculation higher up.

The long-standing feud between Woodring and Johnson is not pleasant to behold and is not conducive to the best administration of the War Department. But the two men complement each other and if Johnson had not been led to believe he would get Woodring's job, they could have made a strong team.

President Roosevelt, who knows more about naval strategy and tactics than probably all of our other Presidents combined, has been his own Secretary of the Navy. The concern of Acting Secretary Charles Edison has been with the business and organizational sides of the Department. He has stood apart from the whole controversy over foreign policy.

The professional heads of the armed services have been faithful to the tradition that their job is to support our foreign policy, not to make it. In both branches, however, there is a wholesome scarcity of jingoism, and the under-cover influence has been, on the whole, on the side of caution.

Since a precedent for mobilizing a huge Army for overseas service was set in the World War, the Army has to bear in mind the possibility of fighting again on a foreign continent. Its industrial-mobilization plans were originally drawn with a repetition of the World War experience in mind. The recent trend, however, has been toward more flexible industrial mobilization plans, on the theory that, if we get into another war, the main brunt of the fighting will be borne by the Navy and air forces, and that we will need only a small, highly trained Army for protecting our outlying naval bases and as a reserve line of defense.

Continental defense, not adventuring beyond the seas, seems to be the dominant idea in the Army.

The Navy is less isolationist. It must think always with reference to the other great navies. It has roots in maritime trade and imperialistic ambitions. For years it has been educating officers in far eastern affairs, through service in the Asiatic Squadron and the Yangtze patrol. The Navy is accustomed to looking to East and West instead of North and South. Consequently, it hasn't done or thought much about the defense of the Western Hemisphere below the Equator.

Arms Embargo Should Not Be Repealed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

LETTER OPPOSING THE REPEAL OF THE ARMS EMBARGO

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from a Polish Catholic priest, a friend of mine. The father wrote me this letter which represented my own views so well and demonstrates that Americans of Polish descent are not hyphenated Americans but real Americans whose Americanism comes first, I asked his permission to insert this letter in the RECORD. He gave me that permission, but because he had no desire for publicity he asked me to withhold his name. This I have done. The letter follows:

OCTOBER 10, 1939.

The Honorable ALBERT J. ENGEL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ENGEL: Maybe you have wondered that I didn't express my opinion, or rather conviction, on the present neutrality bill, with embargo clause. The reason is that I desired to acquaint better. I have studied the matter, and my opinion is now a conviction that the Honorable Senators VANDENBERG, BORAH, NYE, JOHNSON, etc., are more interested in peace and America, than in the suspicions, hatreds, and battles of Europe.

We know from history that Europe never has been living in peace. The people there don't know the meaning of that word. That's why Washington, Von Steuben, Lafayette, Kosciuszko, and others came here, because Europe looked hopeless to them. That's why many of our immigrants, our fathers and forefathers came here; because they do not want to hate and fight, but to live and let live in peace.

Naturally my sympathies are with Poland, the land of my parents and forefathers, but my patriotism and loyalty belong to the United States. Why should the United States help Poland, Germany, England, or any other nation? I hope we have not, so soon, forgotten the lesson of the last World War. The world fought in vain, as every fight is futile; it settles nothing. War only stirs people to a frenzy; and how, for God's sake, can one in a frenzy think clearly or sanely? That's what the warmongers are again trying to do. They are merely working upon the sentiments, sensibilities, and weaknesses of the people. But, thank God, we still have honest, clear-thinking leaders of men, who will not be swept off their feet or knocked silly, either by the rattle of guns nor the outbursts of the agents of warmongers or propagandists. I sometimes wonder if the finger of God is not again visiting mankind. Christ came to bring "Peace to men of good will"; chaos is the devil's child. There is no good will. There is too much hatred, jealousy, and bitterness in the world. How then will our selling ammunition, implements of war, foodstuff, etc., to warring nations (or their Allies) bring about peace, as the proponents of the embargo repeal contend? It's so silly to me. But maybe we American people are supposed to be dupes, suckers for half-truths, propaganda, and sophistry. No; let's get at the bottom of things and take care of our own troubles here, before we act as a big brother or policeman towards Europe.

The above is my honest conviction, Mr. ENGEL, and is not intended at all to influence your honest conviction. I know it is only one of the many letters you have received.

With sincerest personal regards,

———.

The State of the Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. HANCOCK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES A. EATON, OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. CHARLES A. EATON, of New Jersey, before the Good Government Club, Somerville, N. J., on Thursday evening, October 26, 1939:

The Good Government Club of Somerset County, through its leader, Mr. Grover Kipsey, has asked me to speak tonight upon The State of the Nation as viewed from Washington.

Within the limits of a brief address it is impossible to do more than sketch in barest outlines one or two of the more fundamental problems now confronting our people, and to present what seems to be the most reasonable among a host of contradictory proposals offered for the solution of these problems.

The first of these urgent problems has to do with our inescapable relations as a great and powerful Nation with the rest of the world. The second concerns our domestic well-being.

We find ourselves today in what, for want of a better term, we may call a World Age. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the revolutionary achievements of science as applied to the forces and resources of nature for the service of man, not only have profoundly changed the economic and social conditions of the individual citizen, but have created a new and complicated framework for civilization itself. For the first time in history all nations and communities are now in complete and continuous contact. Time and distance are practically annihilated. No movement, incident, or idea of interest or importance but becomes almost instantly the common property of mankind. The world is shrunken to a neighborhood. No region is left unexplored. It is now impossible for human beings anywhere to isolate themselves from contact with the rest of the world. Commerce flows from country to country, and continent to continent in ever-increasing value and volume. Airplanes shuttle back and forth across all international boundaries. Vast migrations of peoples have brought varying moral standards and mental levels with new contacts and conflicts. Under these conditions no nation can live or die unto itself.

This progressive creation of a New World civilization unified upon principles of peace, justice, good will, and friendly cooperation among classes, communities, and nations was shattered to its foundations by the World War of 1914, which was without doubt the greatest single calamity that has ever befallen mankind. The whole world, including America, is still wallowing in the backwash of that suicidal struggle, and a hundred years will not suffice to heal its material wounds or rebuild its spiritual ruins.

The moral collapse, the mental confusion, the economic and political chaos resulting from the World War made possible the rise to power of a hydra-headed plan of life which now threatens to destroy what is left of civilization in Europe and which challenges every principle of liberty, right, and justice believed in and practiced by the free peoples of the world. Communism, which produced a Stalin, and nazi-ism, which produced a Hitler, are simply two sides of the same thing. Both are mortal enemies of every form of freedom, of democratic self-government, and of the Christian religion. Both rest upon fear and force. Stalinism breeds class hatreds. Nazi-ism breeds racial hatreds. The announced objective of both is world domination, to be achieved by propaganda, by diplomatic deceit, and bluffing where possible; by armed force and ruthless warfare when necessary, as in the destruction of Poland and the present war with England and France.

Our attitude, as a nation, toward this world-wide confusion and conflict constitutes our foreign policy. On our fundamental principles our people of all breeds, creeds, classes, interests, parties, and sections are united as never before, for the soundest of reasons—moral, economic, and political. We are opposed to war as an instrument for the settlement of international disputes, and we are resolutely determined to take no armed part in the present war.

This attitude of our Government and people is nothing new. After the World War we held disarmament conferences and even went so far in the cause of peace as to scuttle a substantial portion of our own Navy.

We entered into solemn covenants with many of the nations of the world, in which they and we agreed to renounce war forever as a means for the settlement of international disputes. We loaned vast sums of money to help other nations build up an economy of peaceful trade and commerce. During his entire term of office our Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, has with indifferent success sought to pave the way for world peace by setting up trade agreements between our country and other nations.

In 1935, Congress passed the so-called neutrality law, which with subsequent amendments in following years placed an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war and drastically curtailed the rights and liberties of our citizens, which they had hitherto always enjoyed under recognized international law. It was an act without parallel in history for the strongest nation in the world to thus deliberately abandon its neutral rights recognized for hundreds of years under international law, and virtually turn over the seven seas to the absolute control of foreign nations who happened to be at war. Whatever may be said as to the methods employed, the motives behind this law were beyond reproach.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I sat through the hearings, helped in the preparation of this law, and voted for it on the floor of the House. I did this because of my sympathy with the wholesome moral revulsion of the American people against the idea of profiting by the sale of weapons for the destruction of human beings. But I did not believe then, and I do not believe now that a mere statute law will put us into war or keep us out of war. In my judgment nothing could be more unjust or contrary to the truth than to say that a vote for or against the legislation now pending in Congress is a vote for or against the involvement of our country in the present European war. Countries ruled by dictators go to war when their masters decide they must. Free nations like America go to war when the people are convinced that their rights and liberties are endangered. If the Senate bill when it reaches its final form in the House carries dangerous delegations of discretion and power to the President, and shuts our shipping off the seven seas, I shall vote against it. If these provisions are substantially modified, I shall vote for the bill.

Regardless of the present or any other statute neutrality law, there are certain grim realities which as a Nation we must be prepared to face with courage, wisdom, and unflinching resolution.

World expenditures for armament have risen from 3.8 billions in 1932 to 17.5 billions in 1938. Most of this vast treasure was spent by Russia, Germany, and Italy, although England and France were forced to spend on armaments three and a half times as much in 1938 as they did in 1934, and they have only got started on this ruinous waste of treasure.

Here in America we, too, are now forced to incur enormous armament expenditures. No matter what the cost for the protection of this Western Hemisphere, we must create a navy equal or superior to any in the world. We must create an equally effective air force, and our land defenses must be enormously increased. This is the burden that Mr. Stalin and Mr. Hitler have placed upon the American taxpayers.

Our most urgent problems lie in the Pacific. If Russia rescues China from Japan, communism will sweep Asia. If Japan becomes the oriental overlord, as is her purpose, we shall face an equally dangerous challenge to our economic and national safety.

When the present European war ends, and we pray that the end may come soon, it will be our duty as the strongest free nation left in the world to lead in finding a basis for peace among the distracted European peoples which shall give them a reasonable opportunity for economic prosperity and political stability.

With these and countless other dangerous and difficult questions before our country, I am convinced that Congress ought to remain in session so that the judgment and will of the people may register directly through their representatives in all the momentous decisions which the President, as our Chief Executive, will have to make.

In the brief time allotted me, I can only make a passing reference to our most urgent and important domestic problems. This war scare has served for the time at least, as a complete blackout of conditions here at home. The fog may hide the abyss from our view for the moment, but the danger is still there. We need to take a good long look at ourselves, free from the glamour of experimental politics and wishful thinking. After all, the best insurance against involvement in war abroad is good government, prosperity, and peace at home.

We must admit that since the World War we have failed to work successfully the institutions of our country. We have wrapped the individual citizen in the grave clothes of Government support and control, entirely totalitarian in method and purpose, and by so doing we have softened his moral fiber, confused his thinking, and undermined his native courage, initiative, and self-reliance. The Army of the unemployed is the only arm that we have to face. The most gigantic public debt in all peacetime history, mounting taxes, continuing deficits, lowered standards of living, industrial strife, agricultural distress, class hatreds, unequal and inequitable distribution of wealth, increasing unbelief in and disloyalty toward the fundamental principles of our American system—these are the enemies already within our gates which must be faced and mastered if we are to keep our place in the forefront of civilization.

I cannot, if I would, deceive myself as to the reality of these conditions. Nor am I willing to deceive my people with soft words about these hard facts.

Rather I would sound tonight the battle cry for a new courage; a new fighting spirit among our people. Let us quit jousting windmills, chasing shadows, squabbling over unessentials and secondaries. Let us renew our faith in ourselves, our country, and our God. Let us rededicate ourselves afresh to those great ideals which have made America the hope of the world; God's best gift of opportunity to the common man. Our heroic fathers, barehanded, with invincible courage wrested this wilderness continent from savage men and savage beasts and cemented with their blood the foundations of our great Republic. That is our heritage. We have the manpower, the brains and character and material resources to solve every national problem, to meet and master every natural foe and thus assure for ourselves and our children free and full enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Affiliation of Government Employees With Communist Party Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence which was printed in the Washington Star of yesterday:

[From the Washington Evening Star]

CONGRESS CAN END "FRONT" IN GOVERNMENT—HOLDS PURSE STRINGS OF MEMBERS IN EMPLOY OF UNITED STATES

(By David Lawrence)

Officials of the Government who have just been disclosed to be members of what the Dies committee unanimously terms a "Communist-front" organization may soon face a choice between continued membership or loss of their respective jobs.

It is a simple thing to introduce and probably as easy to have Congress vote at its January session an amendment to any current appropriation bill which shall provide explicitly that none of the funds may be used to pay salaries of Government employees affiliated directly or indirectly with Communist Party activities.

Such a proposal would be in line with the restrictions already placed upon Government employees under the Hatch law. The latter statute plainly deprived Government employees of privileges enjoyed as to party politics by private citizens generally, but the constitutional authority for such a step is the well-established principle that Uncle Sam, as an employer, may impose any restrictions or qualifications he pleases upon those in Government posts.

OFFERED A CHOICE

Anyone who dislikes the restrictions is at liberty, of course, to resign and get another job thereafter and keep his membership in the Communist Party or any other organization of a radical type.

The Dies committee, of course, has been none too popular from the outset of its hearings with the so-called liberals in government, who have felt that the committee was using the Communist argument as a smoke screen against them for their left-wing beliefs and doctrines. But the Dies committee has assailed Fascist and right-wing organizations with vigor, too, so that it has become a matter now of a battle against "isms" as such.

The committee may or may not be going too far in its implications that members of a Communist-influenced organization or those on a mailing list are to be held up to criticism, but the committee's point is that members of the American League for Peace and Democracy—the organization in question—have had since last January to detach themselves from a league whose connection with the Communists was unanimously held by committee members to be proved.

HOSTILE CONGRESS SEEN

Some advocates of freedom of opinion will insist that individual liberty is to a certain extent circumscribed by what the committee has done, but whether they are right or wrong as to abstract or concrete acceptance of communistic philosophy by individuals outside the Government, there can be no doubt about the probable mood of Congress so far as persons employed by the Government itself.

The appointment to a Government position carries with it a necessary separation from private interests of all kinds, and it would seem to be inevitable that some legislation barring from the Government any one connected with the communistic organizations or their affiliates will very soon be adopted by Congress.

Influence of Minority Groups on Legislative Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 27, 1939

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith attach a letter from Bushrod Washington to his distinguished brother George Washington, and George Washington's reply. The subject under discussion was the advisability or propriety of organizing minority groups or committees for the purpose of influencing legislative action.

LETTER FROM BUSHROD WASHINGTON TO GEORGE WASHINGTON

We have lately instituted a society in these lower counties called the Patriotic Society. As it is something new, and there are a few men both good and sensible who disapprove of it, it will be a high gratification to me to know your sentiments of it, if you will be so kind as to communicate them. The object of the institution is to inquire into the state of public affairs; to consider in what the true happiness of the people consists, and what are the evils which have pursued, and still continue to molest us; the means of attaining the former and escaping the latter; to inquire into the conduct of those who represent us and to give them our sentiments upon those laws which ought to be or are already made.

It will also be a considerable object to instill principles of frugality into the minds of the people, both by precept and example. If any real good should result from such a society, we hope similar ones will be generally instituted through the State; and if so, they may establish a very formidable check upon evil-disposed men who, clothed with power, make interested motives and not public good the rule of their conduct. These are the general outlines of the institution; and, whether in the event it may be beneficial or not, I think that it has taken its rise in virtuous motives. We have had a considerable meeting of the most sensible and respectable gentlemen in this part of the country, and another is to be held on Tuesday next, previous to the meeting of the assembly. Our design is to hold another as soon as the assembly has risen, the first to instruct our delegates what they ought to do, the next to inquire what they have done.

BUSHFIELD, September 27.

The following is George Washington's reply:

TO BUSHROD WASHINGTON

MOUNT VERNON, 30 September, 1786.

DEAR BUSHROD: I was from home when your servant arrived, and found him in a hurry to be gone when I returned. I have company in the house, and am on the eve of a journey up the river to meet the directors of the Potomac Company. These things combining will not allow me time to give any explicit answer to the question you have propounded.

Generally speaking, I have seen as much evil as good result from such societies as you describe the constitution of yours to be. They are a kind of imperium in imperio, and as often clog as facilitate public measures. I am no friend to institutions, except in local matters, which are wholly or in a great measure confined to the county of the delegates. To me it appears much wiser and more politic to choose able and honest representatives, and leave them, in all national questions to determine from the evidence of reason, and the facts which shall be adduced, when internal and external information is given to them in a collective state. What certainty is there that societies in a corner or remote part of a State can possess that knowledge, which is necessary for them to decide on many important questions that may come before an assembly? What reason is there to expect that the society itself may be accordant in opinion on such subjects? May not a few members of this society, more sagacious and designing than the rest, direct the measures of it to private views of their own? May not this embarrass an honest, able delegate, who hears the voice of his country from all quarters, and thwart public measures?

These are first thoughts, but I give no decided opinion. Societies, nearly similar to such as you speak of, have lately been formed in Massachusetts, but what has been the consequence? Why, they have declared the Senate useless, many other parts of the Constitution unnecessary, salaries of public officers burthensome, etc. To point out the defects of the Constitution, if any existed, in a decent way was proper enough; but they have done more. They first vote the courts of justice in the present circumstances of the State oppressive; and next by violence stop them; which has occasioned a very solemn proclamation and appeal from the Governor to the people. You may say no such matters are in contemplation by your society. Granted. A snowball gathers by rolling. Possibly a line may be drawn between occasional meetings for special purposes, and a standing society to direct with local views and partial information the affairs of the Nation, which cannot be well understood but by a large and comparative view of circumstances. Where is this so likely to enter as in the General Assembly of the people? What figure then must a delegate make, who comes there with his hands tied, and his judgment forestalled? His very instructors, perhaps, if they had nothing sinister in view, were they present at all the information and arguments, which would come forward, might be the first to change their sentiments.

Hurried as this letter is, I am sensible that I am writing to you upon a very important subject. I have no time to copy, correct, or even peruse it; for which reason I could wish to have it or a copy returned to me. I am, &c.

G. WASHINGTON.

"Red" Milkmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 27, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS OF OCTOBER 5, 1939

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily News of October 5, 1939. It should be of interest to all at this particular time.

[From the Chicago Daily News of October 5, 1939]

"RED" MILKMEN

"Last night I saw upon the stair
A little man who wasn't there.
He wasn't there again today.
Oh, how I wish he'd go away!"

The full extent of the "red" peril which menaces Chicago is revealed by the Dies committee seizure of records of the Communist Party, indicating that the Communists have a Chicago sucker list numbering some 2,000. This is not an alarming total, considering that Chicago is a community of more than 3,000,000 inhabitants; but a break-down of the list is full of horrendous implications. By far the biggest occupation representation is among the milkmen.

Consider, then, if you are a Chicago householder, the probabilities that a Communist may be sneaking up your back stairs in the dark of every dawn, invading the sanctity of your home, familiarizing himself with the lay of the land, and jotting down memoranda concerning such military objectives as garbage cans, ash heaps, and clothesline posts.

Does the Dies revelation mean that we must change our concept of the milkman? We hope not. We have always regarded him as one of the minor blessings of the capitalist system, a sort of miracle man, a good fairy who slipped up back stairs while folk were asleep and left a precious gift. To millions of city children who have never seen a cow, the milkman must be the personification of that gentle and beneficent animal. The love that country children have for bossie was admirably expressed by Robert Louis Stevenson:

"The friendly cow, all red and white,
I love with all my heart;
She gives me cream with all her might
To eat with apple tart."

City moppets didn't know much about cows. They do know about milkmen. Had Stevenson been writing a generation later for urban youngsters—a Child's Urbs-in-Horto of Verses, so to speak—we feel sure that he would have glorified the milkman, not the cow. He would have written:

"The milk-y man, all red and white * * *"

Or, perhaps, in view of the Dies committee's revelations, he might have said:

"The milk-y man, all red * * *"

Somehow we just can't bring ourselves to view the milkman as a "red" menace or an agent provocateur. We will continue, despite Mr. DIES, to think of him as a good fairy, the ambassador of bovine good will. We will think of him as the envoy extraordinary of the moo-cow, not of Moscow.

Regulation of the Bituminous Coal Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. CHESTER THOMPSON

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on October 17 a distinguished former Member of this body, Hon. Chester Thompson, of Illinois, delivered an address to the annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Association in St. Louis, Mo. I ask unanimous consent, under leave to extend my remarks, that Mr. Thompson's fine address be printed in the RECORD.

The address is as follows:

Without a constant and unfailing supply of energy no commerce or industry can exist in this or any other nation of the world. Without it civilization, our very living, would be impossible; so it is natural that we should be vitally interested in any and all matters affecting an important—in fact, the most important—source of energy. That is why, in the wise judgment of the leaders of this fine organization, a discussion of bituminous coal is having what might be properly termed, in the language of the theater and circus folks, "top billing" at this convention or annual meeting.

Those of us who are interested in the success of river transportation cannot overlook the importance of soft coal in the channels of such transportation and its effect upon those communities and those industries which have a right to look to water transportation of their energy sources, as well as their other raw materials and finished products, in their efforts to compete in the markets—all of the markets—of this country and of the world.

Many new and fine industrial plants have been built in recent years in locations where water transportation is available, for the same reasons that our forefathers built the great cities of the United States where such form of transportation was accessible. Community life has benefited by such placement of new plants and businesses, as well as by the expansion of existing facilities—new homes, new schools, new retail businesses have been substantially added to existing cities and towns along the navigable streams of the Nation. The threat to wipe out any advantages that low-cost water transportation affords such communities, be they large or small, will be, and is so regarded by all thinking businessmen as being, a real danger demanding the entire attention of all who are in a position to do something about it. The very economic existence of some industrial centers located on the rivers of the Middle West is seriously threatened by the proposal of the Federal Government to establish minimum prices on soft coal under the so-called Guffey Coal Act of 1937, now being administered by the Bituminous Coal Division of the United States Department of the Interior.

To say that it is alarming that such a small number—comparatively speaking, at least—of businessmen and industrial leaders seem to realize the far-reaching effects of the Coal Act is understatement. In an effort to bring the importance of this question to the attention of those in attendance here and through them to the "folks back home," I will devote the balance of the time allotted me to a discussion of the history of coal legislation, to the efforts—yes, the futile efforts—that have been made to put it into effect, and to the result, if such efforts be successful. upon business and industry of the great Mississippi Valley.

During the World War days of 1917 and 1918 we had a Federal Fuel Administrator (as a war measure, of course), whose duty it was to conserve the coal resources of the Nation, to see that those industries working on war necessities had ample supplies of coal, and to regulate the top or maximum price of coal for both industrial and domestic uses. Unquestionably this was necessary, and I do not know of anyone in the coal industry or elsewhere who complained much about such governmental control of a basic industry as strictly a war measure.

If war again comes to us, undoubtedly some similar arrangement will have to be made in order to conserve the coal resources of the Nation and guarantee, as far as is possible, the proper supply of this all-important fuel to those most needing it for the successful defense of the United States, and at the same time see that the domestic needs of our people are taken care of at a reasonable price. War naturally changes everything; in fact, constitutional government is practically set aside, and all are expected to devote their every energy to the success of it. And in this we Americans have never failed and never will.

The first peacetime effort to fix prices and control the coal industry by governmental mandate came under the ill-fated N. R. A. of 1933. Of course, under that law the coal-code authorities were set up to determine costs and selling expenses, and thus fix prices. The soft-coal industry had been losing money during the late twenties and early thirties, so the fixed prices under the N. R. A. codes, with the increased business that came in the late 1933 and in 1934, looked good to many coal operators—in other words, they had "tasted of the apple." It should be pointed out, however, that under the coal codes of the N. R. A. there was no frozen-price condition, and operators entered into term contracts with consumers, distributors, and jobbers. When the coal codes "blew up" and the act itself was thrown out by the Supreme Court in the Schechter case, there was a complete collapse of price fixing, and no more contracts were consummated at prices and under conditions that satisfied either the producers or the consumers. To say that chaos prevailed in the basic industry of soft coal is putting it mildly. But the seed was planted, and so it was little wonder that the Congress was asked to enact the first Guffey Coal Act, better known as the Snyder-Guffey Act of 1935. This measure contained provisions relating to labor used in the mining of coal, and in a short time it was also declared unconstitutional on the grounds that the mining of coal itself did not constitute interstate commerce, and therefore was beyond the power of Congress to regulate. This happened in 1936, and an effort was made in the closing days of Congress of that year to pass another coal law without the labor provisions, but it failed in the Senate of the United States, and the Seventy-fourth Congress adjourned sine die without any valid coal-control legislation on the statute books of the Nation.

After the elections of 1936 and the convening of the Seventy-fifth Congress in January of 1937, a new bill similar in practically every respect to the one that failed in the previous Congress was introduced, and, with little or no active opposition, passed, and became law on April 26, 1937, upon the signature of the President. That is the present law, and since that date efforts have been made to carry out the purposes thereof, with no success as yet, but with millions of dollars of expense to the consumers and the operators, as well as to the Government itself. In other words, the whole affair has been a headache to all having anything to do with it, and it will be worse than a headache to consumers if it ever does become effective and minimum prices are established and sustained.

Since July 1, the Coal Act of 1937 has been administered by the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior. I am generous in employing the word "administered." The Coal Division is successor to the lately dissolved National Bituminous Coal Commission. The transferral of authority was a part of the President's program of administrative readjustments under the Reorganization Act of 1939. The Guffey Act sets up an elaborate machinery of 23 expensive district boards, and remaps the country into "marketing areas."

These district boards are elected in the 23 districts by producers upon a tonnage basis, and by representatives of labor. Their expenses, including attorney's fees, are borne by assessment against the tonnage produced by companies and individuals in such districts. Generally speaking, the assessments have amounted to more than 1 cent per ton. This is in addition to the 1-cent-per-ton Federal excise tax levied by the Coal Act itself and collected upon every ton of coal produced for domestic or industrial purposes in the United States. It should be noted that the soft coal industry is the only business in the United States that is subjected to a special tax for its own regulation and policing by a Government agency.

Beginning in April of 1937, the now defunct and abandoned National Bituminous Coal Commission worked on a set of coal prices and attempted to put them into effect on December 16 of that year. There was a furious storm of protest. Many consumers, communities, and railroads, as well as producers, went to court, and the Commission got "cold feet" and withdrew such prices in February of 1938. They had been in effect only 72 days.

The Commission then continued its processes of attempting to have the district boards promulgate prices and coordinate prices among various districts from which coal flowed into common consuming markets. The law contemplates that the district boards themselves should do the coordinating of prices, but in this they utterly failed. The result has been that the Coal Commission was obliged to take over such work before setting prices for final hearings, as provided in the law. Even before the Commission did publish such prices, the order for its abolition was issued by the President and approved by Congress, and since July 1 the Coal Division in the Interior Department has been working on the problem.

The Coal Division began hearings before a board of examiners on July 24 of this year, and at that time intimated that the hearings would not last more than 3 or 4 weeks. They are still going strong, and attorneys and others familiar with the processes and procedure do not hesitate to say that such hearings are slightly more than one-third complete, certainly not more than one-half, even today. Now this means that minimum prices cannot be proclaimed under the act until at least after January 1. Doesn't this seem to prove conclusively the impossibility of fixing minimum prices by Government mandate? Especially is this belief strengthened when it is recalled that one or another agency of Government has been working—rather, playing—with price fixing since the early part of 1937, with no tangible results other than prolonging a distressed, chaotic condition inflicted upon an industry all-important and wholly vital to our national economy by the uncertainty and inflexibility of the operation of this ridiculous law.

The crux of the statutory abomination is without a doubt the provision that minimum prices shall reflect the relative market values of all sizes and qualities of coal, taking into account transportation methods and charges and their effects upon a reasonable opportunity to compete on a fair basis, and at the same time preserve as nearly as possible existing fair competitive opportunities with due regard to the interest of the consuming public. It is fair to point out that practically all other attempts at governmental price fixing were in the direction of fixing maximum or ceiling prices, but that under the present Coal Act the effort is confined entirely to the fixing of minimum prices or the fixing of a floor below which coal prices cannot fall. There is a provision in the statute about maximum prices, but maximum prices cannot be established or fixed under this law until after minimum prices are determined and published, for such maximum prices must bear a definite relationship to the minimum prices. It is mentioned in the statute that prices must, in addition to reflecting relative market values, be just and equitable among producers in a single district and between producers in districts whose commodity meets in a common consuming marketing area.

The law further provides that the Coal Division shall fix the tipple price of bituminous coal, commonly called f. o. b. mine price; and in order to meet the other provisions of the law that coal must flow into common marketing areas upon a relative-value basis, the transportation of coal therefore becomes a most vital factor in determining the f. o. b. mine price. In other words, if a mine is located, say, 300 miles from a certain market, it would probably carry a freight charge of maybe $2.50 a ton; whereas a mine less than a hundred miles from the same market would only have to add a freight charge of $1 a ton. Assuming that these coals are the same in analyses—have the same burning qualities, the same amount of ash, and practically the same number of B. t. u.'s—the coal at the nearby mine would, under the interpretation placed upon the law by those charged with administering it, have to be increased $1.50 per ton f. o. b. mine in order to meet the requirements of the law.

It will be immediately seen that this is the application, pure and simple, of the now discredited Pittsburgh-plus system, about which so much complaint was made many years ago in the steel industry. It will also be observed that this practice, if it becomes effective, totally destroys the benefits accruing to any business or industry, as well as to any mine owner or employee thereof, because of proximity to market. Many large industries have been built close to good coal fields because of the advantage of obtaining fuel at low costs, principally because of the small amount of transportation involved, and if this Coal Act is permitted to stand as it is all of those advantages will be completely destroyed, and naturally the investments made therein practically dissipated.

The transportation of soft coal has reached major importance in the waterways system of the Nation, as it has long been important in the matter of intercoastal shipping. Hence it is obvious that this grcup must be vitally interested in the administration of any law that seeks to destroy the advantages of cheap water transportation to communities and industries situated so as to reap the advantages of low-cost water-borne transportation.

I do not have the exact amount of coal, in tons, that has moved on the inland-waterways system of the Nation during the last year, but I do know that it is substantially increasing each and every year, and that thousands and thousands of barges of coal have moved out of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Ohio into the Ohio River, destined to practically all sections of the United States. Likewise, hundreds of thousands of tons of coal have come from the fields of Illinois, Indiana, and other States adjacent to the waterways system of the country. Many large expenditures of funds have been made not only by the water carriers themselves but also by communities, industries, and coal dealers along the rivers in building and maintaining special facilities for the economical handling of coal by barge. To destroy these is practically to wipe out the investments and otherwise seriously to handicap those cities and towns which have seen fit to spend their money in order to obtain soft coal, their principal source of energy, at a reasonable price, in turn permitting them to compete in the markets of America and of the whole world with their commodities, because of low-cost energy.

I mentioned the fact that the crux of the Coal Act is that question of relative market value. Unfortunately, Congress did not clearly define it in the organic Coal Act, and many variant interpretations have thus been placed upon the language. It is contended by some that there is no difference in coal, whether it move to market by rail, by truck, or by water carrier—in other words, "coal is coal." A careful analysis of this situation definitely reveals that this is not a fact; that there is a distinct difference in the relative value of coal because of the means employed to carry it to market. For instance, coal that is transported by water gets extra handling because it must be moved, usually by rail, from the tipple to the coal dock, which results in breaking, consequently changing the sizes and classifications of such coal. In order to handle coal economically by water it must be done by barge, which means larger storage facilities and, as I have pointed out, generally expensive unloading equipment. The fact is that water transportation while cheaper is much slower, and therefore exposes the fuel to the elements for a greater length of time; for when coal is piled in a barge perhaps for several weeks, it thereby causes heating to take place, which results in some deterioration of fuel energy. For this reason, those who desire to ship coal by water transportation are entitled to lower rates and thus to cheaper coal in any market into which that coal can be economically placed by reason of water facilities.

Fortunately, there are substantial numbers of producers in every coal-bearing State of the Union who earnestly oppose the principles of the Coal Act; who believe that the industry should be permitted to work out its own problems without interference by government. The fact that bituminous coal has lost a large tonnage to competing fuels, such as oil, natural gas, and hydroelectric power, has apparently been overlooked or disregarded by those individuals who sponsored, and are now supporting, the so-called Guffey Coal Act. If the coal industry is to survive and meet the inroads made on it by these competing forms of energy, it must be given a free hand to meet competitive conditions as they exist in different sections of the country and in different markets. Nor can the industry be tied down to a horizontal price, fixed by a bureau in Washington, without any apparent regard for many of the real problems of mining, transporting, and consuming coal. Those opponents of the existing act to whom I refer have formed an organization, with headquarters in Washington, the Committee for Amendment of the Coal Act, for whom I speak. They are actively engaged in promoting amendments to the Coal Act which will do away with all price fixing and the costly machinery therefor, including the extravagant district boards, the tax on coal, and, more important, the expense of being obliged to defend themselves against unsound, unfair, and inequitable orders, proclamations, and ukases of an agency of their Government charged with the dictatorial control of their business.

The program of this group is embodied in a bill (H. R. 6325) introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative ROBERT G. ALLEN, of Pennsylvania, which is now pending before the House Committee on Ways and Means. They believe that this bill, if enacted into law, will save the bituminous-coal industry from almost total destruction, or at least from complete socialization and regimentation, and will preserve the markets for soft coal against the inroads being made by other fuels.

The Allen bill will completely remove any semblance of the Pittsburgh-plus system of pricing coal which, without a doubt, is most detrimental to water transportation of the Nation.

It will give a minimum of governmental control over the industry through the approval of prices proposed by marketing agencies authorized to be set up as the need may present itself. The bituminous coal industry will be given a free opportunity further to develop its own business, to continue its vast employment of a minimum of half a million American citizens, and further to serve the consuming public of the Nation by research work looking for additional uses of soft coal.

The Committee for Amendment of the Coal Act is thankful for the interest that the Mississippi Valley Association has taken in the current coal hearings now going on in the Nation's Capital, and is exceptionally pleased that the officers of your organization saw fit to intervene in these proceedings. This action on your part naturally costs time and money; but if the present coal act is permitted to stand such expenditure will be more or less continuous, because consumers and producers alike will be obliged to maintain a constant guard in Washington to preserve and protect their rights in the matter of coal prices.

Wouldn't it be much better to eliminate by congressional action all reference to price-fixing and let a great industry, which through the years has proved its ability to supply the demands of American industry and the American people with fuel at a reasonable price, conduct its own business?

Let us hope, therefore, that the active support of your powerful organization will be continued in an effort to accomplish the enactment of the Allen bill, and to do away with all the many objectionable features of experimentation with the price-fixing of a basic fuel upon a national basis.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. JONES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 26, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE LIMA (OHIO) NEWS

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include this article published in the Lima News on October 22 on the subject of neutrality. This city editor indicates that the New Deal changes its shades with more aplomb than a chameleon.

The article is as follows:

NEUTRALITY

(By Jim Blissell, city editor, the Lima News)

That old "Off agin, on agin, gone agin.—Finnigin," catch line seems to fit this situation quite aptly. But it is no more inconsistent than previous pronouncements of administration leaders on neutrality, including President Roosevelt himself.

The record is clear; the words are the President's; a little research will turn them up. In the light of these utterances, Senator

BORAH'S inquiries as to "Why are we asked to repeal this law?" is vitally pertinent.

But first let us turn back briefly the pages and see what Mr. Roosevelt thought of neutrality just a few years and months back.

President Roosevelt, on signing the first Neutrality Act in August 1935, said: "I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The purpose is wholly excellent, and this joint resolution will to a considerable degree serve that end."

The Chief Executive's commentary in his public papers regarding his signature to the first Neutrality Act had this to say: "This Government has for several years observed a definite policy of refusing to promote and encourage the export trade in arms, and of forbidding its representatives abroad from taking any action which might be construed as an effort to increase the sales in foreign countries of implements of war manufactured here."

Just 3 years ago, in his annual message to Congress in January 1936, President Roosevelt again had this to say: "As a consistent part of a clear policy, the United States is following a twofold neutrality toward any and all nations which engage in wars that are not of immediate concern to the Americas. First, we decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States."

Extension of the arms embargo, February 26, 1936, brought this from the President: "By the resolution approved August 31, 1935, a definite step was taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations. By the resolution I have just signed (the extension of the arms embargo) the operation of the August resolution is extended and strengthened."

Just think of it; after lauding the embargo, and emphatically setting forth that our neutrality resolution was "extended and strengthened," the Chief Executive has the temerity to call Congress into special session and, in his message, tell its Members: "I now ask (again) that such action (repeal) be taken in respect to that part of the act which is wholly inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations—the embargo provisions. I ask it because they are, in my opinion, vitally dangerous to American neutrality, American security, and American peace."

There may be some words it would be possible to say in defense of such an absolute "about face," but, if there are, we have failed to hear them.

All of this brings us back to the question posed by Senator BORAH, "Why?" Did the cry for repeal originate, or does it come from the people of this country? Did the voice of labor initiate the agitation for repeal? Did the call for a rejection of this policy come from the farm, from the pulpit, or the pew, from the homes of America, from the families of America? Did it come from the young men who are just now hoping to enter a business or a profession? Where did the call come from? Could it be the wining and dining of English royalty recently in the sacred temples in Washington had anything to do with it?

Lord Beaverbrook, British publishing tycoon, in the August 1939 issue of the American Mercury, had this to say: "It is remarkable how slow a nation is to learn by bitter experience, how readily it forgets painful lessons.

"The Crimean War, so painful in its memories for the British people, sprang out of a situation similar to that with which we recently have had to deal in the war between Italy and Ethiopia.

"In that case the British Government egged on the Turks to defy the power of Russia. Left to their own devices, the Turks would have submitted to the Russians in the trifling dispute which arose over the possession of the holy places in Palestine. In the end there came a war, not only upon Turks but upon Britain also—a long, weary, bloody war on which the Nation looked with gloomy horror."

Lord Beaverbrook's passages might well have been written over the Czechoslovakian or Polish situations. Don't be misled for a moment that a corner or righteousness belongs to any nation. Britain and France certainly "egged on" Poland, but time alone will reveal their motives, hidden so far by false claims of rushing to the defense of a weak, struggling nation.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES F. BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has deservedly enjoyed for many years, in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives, a reputation for clear thinking, clear statement, and persuasive logic. These qualities he exemplified last night in a radio address in the New York Herald Tribune forum on current events. The Senator from South Carolina delivered an address on neutrality legislation of such simplicity and convincing logic that I feel that this debate would not be complete unless it were made available in the RECORD. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Every Member of the Congress is sincerely desirous that this Nation stay out of the war. The pending issue arises out of the difference in views as to whether we can best accomplish this declared purpose by retaining the present law or by adopting the policy of the bill now before the Congress.

The existing law places an embargo upon the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. But it permits the sale on credit to belligerent governments, of iron, steel, copper, cotton, and all other raw materials that enter into the manufacture of weapons of war. It permits the delivery of these war materials by American ships at the ports of belligerents.

The bill pending in Congress repeals the embargo and permits the sale of the products of our farms and factories, provided they are purchased in the United States for cash and the purchaser not only takes title to the property in this country but transports it in foreign ships. It provides for cash payments, because it makes it unlawful to "extend any credit to any such government, political subdivision, or person." It makes this prohibition apply to a sale of implements of war by a person in the United States to a person in a belligerent state. And it makes a violation of the cash provision punishable by a fine or imprisonment. It permits such sales in the United States, but it places an embargo upon American vessels, American citizens, and American property going into the zone of war.

To illustrate: The steamship, the City of Flint, captured by the Germans this week, could, under the existing law, transport contraband materials to a belligerent government. Under the administration proposal, the City of Flint could not legally enter the zone of war. Every thoughtful person knows that we entered the World War not at the behest of the bankers and munition makers, not even to save the world for democracy, but because when we exercised our right under international law to have our ships sail the Seven Seas, Germany sank those ships, killed our citizens, and destroyed our property.

Under the administration proposal, we sacrifice our right to sail the seas. By the cash requirement we sacrifice the right even to send American property on the ships of other nations into the zone of war. By this sacrifice we remove the cause of our entering the World War, and the cause most likely to result in our entering another war.

The argument that we cannot now change this law is unsound. Whether or not a government will establish an embargo is a question of domestic policy. Because it is a domestic policy, it can be modified or repealed whenever a neutral deems it necessary to protect its rights or its interests. To hold otherwise is to surrender to warring nations the right to legislate for neutral nations. Germany cannot contend that in declaring war she relied upon the existence of our statute and had reason to believe it would not be repealed. Germany knew that since last January the President of the United States insisted upon the repeal of the embargo. Germany knew that when action upon the bill in the Senate was deferred last August, the President announced he would insist upon action at the next session.

I urge that the embargo be repealed now not only because the adoption of the present bill will most likely keep us out of war, but because the existing embargo is unfair to the weaker and peace-loving nations, and because it is an unwise policy from the standpoint of our national defense. It is unfair because by this policy we aid those governments that seek to destroy peace-loving nations. Aggressor nations can accumulate weapons of war; they can purchase from us air bombers and poison gas, and when they have declared war they can smugly rest assured that we will refuse to sell even defensive weapons to the nations they attack.

It is unfair, for while it prohibits the sale of an antiaircraft gun or an airplane to our peace-loving neighbors in Canada, it permits the sale today of implements of war to Russia and Italy, from which countries they can be shipped to Germany without fear of detection. It is unfair because even if the munitions were not reshipped to Germany, Mussolini and Stalin could retain our American supplies for their own purposes and sell to Germany the products of their own factories.

Applying the same doctrine to your own community, it would mean that if the man across the street should decide to destroy your home and your family, he could visit a hardware store, purchase ammunition, and start shooting with the knowledge that you would be unable to purchase from that hardware store a single weapon with which to protect yourself and your loved ones. It is a policy that benefits the highwayman and the aggressor, while it penalizes the peaceful citizen who does not want to carry a pistol or convert his home into an arsenal.

It is unfair because it takes sides between belligerents. Germany is a land power. To supplement its military supplies it can look to Russia, to Italy, and to the Balkans. Great Britain is a sea power. It has not maintained great stores of military supplies. It has relied upon its navy to enable it to purchase supplies should the nation become engaged in war. By this embargo law we change our policy and say that because Germany cannot come here and purchase our supplies we will refuse to sell implements of war to any other government willing and able to purchase them upon our soil. That is taking sides. It is taking sides with Hitler. I do not want my Government to do that.

I urge repeal because our embargo policy is a menace to the safety of the United States itself. It is a menace because we cannot adhere to this policy without causing other nations to adopt the same policy toward us under similar circumstances. Should that happen, we would be isolated and our safety endangered by a Frankenstein of our own manufacture.

Unable to rely upon purchasing abroad in case of attack, it will be necessary for us to appropriate enormous sums in order to store munitions of war required by a two-ocean navy and an army of millions of men. If every other nation pursues the same policy, we will contribute to converting every land into an arsenal. When every man in a community carries a pistol in his pocket, it is only a matter of time until the shooting will begin. What is true of individuals is true of nations.

We have argued that if we ever should be attacked from the west we could bring in needed supplies from nations beyond the Atlantic; that if an attack should come from our eastern seaboard the Pacific Ocean would be the adequate avenue through which essential supplies could reach us. Should other nations follow our example and adopt our embargo policy, it will nullify the protection our geographical position and sea power should afford us.

During the World War we learned that it required 12 months to revamp factories so they could produce the essential military supplies. The armies of France and Great Britain, during this period, were holding the enemy at bay, while the British Fleet controlled the seas. During our year of readjustment we were able to equip our soldiers only because our Allies provided the guns, ammunition, airplanes, and other supplies. We cannot rely upon the armies and navies of other nations to preserve our freedom.

If we assume that this Nation can under no circumstances become involved in war, then we may as well save our expenditures for the Army and the Navy. But if we admit that "it can happen here," then let us consider whether or not we are prepared for war. For the sake of argument, let us assume that Germany conquered the Allies, controlled the English Fleet, and, unable to look to the Balkans for additional territory, looked to South America. Let us further assume that we undertook to defend one of the South American republics against such attack. What is the status of our army and land defenses?

Today we have approximately 430,000 men in the Regular Army and the National Guard. We have not the arms, ammunition, and implements of war for this Army. Notwithstanding the large appropriations made for this fiscal year, the objective of the War Department today is to have 20 months hence, on June 30, 1941, an Army of only 500,000 men, with the necessary military supplies.

We read of plans to draft an army in case of war. For what purpose? If today we increased the Army to 4,000,000 men, as in the World War, we would have only 10 percent of the military supplies for that Army. If, as a result of the embargo, we could not purchase implements of war elsewhere, it would take us 3 years to supply that Army. While it takes 1 year to train a soldier, it takes 2 years to produce the essential military supplies for that soldier.

If we were attacked from the air today, how do we stand as to antiaircraft guns? The objective of the War Department is to have on June 30, 1941, for the defense of the entire Nation, a number of antiaircraft guns, which number is just one-half of the antiaircraft guns provided for the protection of the city of London today.

Some of our industrial plants can be converted to military use, but considerable time would be required for the production of the necessary machine tools. For the production of some guns and some munitions, inasmuch as they are produced only in Government arsenals, we would have to build new plants.

Of course, should our enemy agree to withhold her attack for 3 years in order to give us time to equip an army and manufacture antiaircraft guns, we would have no fear of the result; but if she were disposed to be rude about the matter and insist upon a lightning war and, because of the embargo, we could not purchase implements of war abroad, Uncle Sam, with his great wealth and great manpower, would stand with his hands tied, unable to defend the United States, much less the Western Hemisphere.

If it be argued that, under such circumstances, we should increase the manufacture of munitions and store them instead of selling them abroad, I answer that while it will be necessary to increase our store of supplies, such supplies may be obsolete within 5 years because of the inventive genius of men. The fighting plane of the World War no more resembled the modern pursuit plane or bomber than did the model T Ford of a bygone era resemble the luxurious automobiles of today. What we need is the capacity to produce and reproduce, so that should we ever call upon our boys to fight we can equip them with the most modern weapons. By repealing the embargo and selling to foreign purchasers, we can develop plant production, and keep abreast of developments in the modernization of weapons.

For our comfort, we can look to the Navy. Daily increasing in power and efficiency, it gives to us assurance that even if it could not prevent the landing of an enemy on the Western Hemisphere, certainly it would delay it a sufficient time to enable us to acquire the necessary military supplies for an army, provided we can purchase munitions abroad. Those who advocate the continuance of the embargo may be motivated by the best intentions, but when we realize that this policy may be adopted by other governments with the result that in our hour of need it would be impossible for us to equip an army, common sense dictates that we should repeal the embargo and make certain our ability to preserve the freedom of the American people.

Hands Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me last night, October 26, over the network of the Columbia broadcasting stations from their Washington, D. C., station upon the subject of neutrality, entitled "Hands Off."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am indeed happy to have this opportunity to talk with you on one of the most important subjects of our times—neutrality legislation. For more than 30 days the Members of the United States Senate have been discussing the pros and cons of this program to keep America out of war. It concerns each and every one of the 130,000,000 of people residing within the confines of the United States. It is of particular concern to the mothers of America. I say this because if the Congress of the United States should make a false step and enact legislation that might lead us into the struggle abroad, the mothers of America would be called upon to give their sons to the gods of war. Every youth 18 years of age and over would be eligible for conscription. Should we be drawn into war everyone would pay dearly. Our sons would pay with their lives. Our mothers with their grief and tears. Our already heavily burdened taxpayers would pay with their dollars.

We must stay out of this European conflict. This is the thought of the President and of every Member of Congress. It is also the thought of every citizen. We in the Senate of the United States have no differences in our aim to keep this country at peace. Some of my colleagues (most all of them I believe) who do favor repeal, do so for one reason. They think that by providing dynamite in our country to blow off the heads of people in Europe they can thus solve its problems. I yield to no one in my love of liberty, freedom of speech, freedom of action, and freedom of worship. I loathe as they do any form of government that destroys or curtails these blessings. But I want to be sure that they are first preserved intact for our own people. I point to the convincing proof of history that we here in America can neither solve the problems of Europe, nor correct the existing abuses. If Europe were at peace today I contend there is not a statesman in America who would even approach this difficult task. Why then sacrifice our principles as a friendly and peace-loving nation by making the bullets that are destined to end the lives of others in such vain attempt.

The sole objective of pending legislation is to keep us out of war. The war over there is but one of the hundreds that have been fought upon the soil of Europe within the past several centuries.

Let us not, therefore, form any entangling alliances or make any commitments, or pass any laws that might lead us into another World War. I hope that our experience of 1917 and 1918 is fresh in our memories. We participated in the great struggle from April 8, 1917, when we declared war, until Armistice Day, November 11, 1918, and we solved nothing. At the close of the war the United States had in uniform and under arms approximately 4,000,000 men. Our casualties were small in comparison with those of the other nations of the world. Yet, none of them was justified in the light of present events. During that struggle about 9,000,000 of all lands were killed. More than 22,000,000 were injured. The losses sustained by the United States on the battlefields of Europe brought indescribable sorrow to 60,000 American mothers—mothers whose sons were killed in action. That war has already cost the American people $68,000,000,000. Before we will have finished paying, it probably will cost us $100,000,000,000. This tragic loss of lives and this vast mortgage on our future brought no lasting benefit to anyone.

It has been a quarter of a century since the end of the last World War. Yet today our veterans' hospitals have not facilities sufficient to provide hospitalization for those who are entitled to Government care. Today the Allies whom we aided are indebted to us in principal and interest to the extent of more than $14,000,000,000.

I am in favor of neutrality. I favor that sort of neutrality which will best assure the greatest safeguards to the United States. Let the chips fall where they may. I seek neutrality legislation to keep America out of Europe's eternal conflict. In other words, this country wants legislation solely in the interest of our people. I favor very strongly that phase of current legislation which would prohibit Americans from traveling upon the ships of any nation engaged in war.

I advocate keeping any and all of our ships out of actual war zones. Let's sell our cotton, our tobacco, our potatoes, our textiles, our lumber, and manufactured goods. Let's sell them on a real cash-and-carry basis—title to be transferred at the dock, paid for in cash, and carried from our shores in the ships of the nations at war. But I do not favor—in fact, I strongly disapprove—selling arms, ammunition, and instruments of war to any nation or nations in any amount or under any circumstances whatsoever.

If we sell instruments of death, we are placing deadly weapons in the hands of human beings across the sea for the purpose of destroying other human beings. If we do that, most certainly we would be at least an indirect party to wholesale destruction. I will not become a party to any such international criminal action. I shall follow the dictates of my conscience. I shall and do oppose that part of the proposed legislation which would lead to our participation in any such unthinkable slaughter. I shall and do now oppose the lifting of the arms embargo. It would permit us to sell to the belligerents, nations at war, lethal instruments of death.

We should not encourage the continuation of war in Europe or elsewhere by providing one side or both sides with deadly weapons. We should not become a party to another world massacre in the hope and delusion of saving democracy, sparing civilization, and stopping all wars for all time. I cannot subscribe to any theory based upon the assumption that we are going to save civilization by blowing people and nations to pieces.

Back in 1935, 1936, and 1937, when the world was at peace, we enacted neutrality legislation. We enacted this legislation not for the purpose of stopping war in Europe. That was and is beyond our control. It was for the sole purpose of keeping us out of war, if war should come. When the present neutrality law was passed in 1937 and approved by the President, I was convinced, as he was, that it was sound and served the best interest of this country. Today I am still convinced he was right then, and regret that I cannot follow his recommendation for its repeal.

I want to be fair about this whole thing. I want to see our cotton farmers, our tobacco farmers, our corn farmers, and our wheat farmers prosper. But I do not want war. If we can sell the products of farm and factory on a cash-and-carry basis without danger, I say let's give our farmers and our industry the benefits. We do not want innocent victims of war to go hungry and without clothes. But I strongly oppose the sale of arms. We are told that if we lift the arms embargo and sell instruments of war we will be better prepared and our factories will be ready if war comes. This is predicated on the age-old saying that in time of peace prepare for war. I say let's confine our efforts to guaranteeing our own defenses. I am sure we can always do that.

How can the sale of arms abroad serve to bring the peace we all seek? Would you give your son a pistol to teach him love for his neighbor? I have the utmost respect for my colleagues whose opinions differ from mine. I know they conscientiously seek the same objective that I do—safeguards against war. But we are no longer amateurs in international affairs. We have learned a lot since 1917. We started out then selling arms, and we had to follow with our sons. We must not repeat that mistake. We must learn, once and for all, that the United States cannot control all the international intrigues of Europe.

In conclusion let me say that, if we must go to war, then let's mobilize now against unemployment, poverty, and crime in this country. Before we send any troops to Europe for the purpose of crushing nazi-ism in Germany or communism in Russia, we should destroy those foreign "isms" here before they destroy us. Let's clean house here before we attempt to clean up over there. Our place is here on American soil. Our first duty is to our homeland—our country, our citizens—first, last, and always.

I thank you.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] last night at the New York Herald Tribune forum, dealing with questions involved in the pending legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am grateful as a Senator for the opportunity to address such an influential audience; I am especially gratified, however, as a former Herald Tribune man to be once again working under its auspices. Some of the happiest and most valuable years of my life were spent as a member of the Herald Tribune staff. I am glad to make my small contribution tonight to its work of public enlightenment.

The great issue before us transcends our personal sympathies just as it transcends any political considerations. We can imagine nothing more despicable than for a public official to consider political consequences on a matter involving the life and death of his fellow citizens. It would be equally wrong for a public official to allow his personal sympathies to influence his judgment. I frankly state that I like the Allies and that I detest Hitlerism. Like so many other Americans, my own flesh and blood is in Europe within sound of the guns on the west wall. The fact that I have these personal ties is no reason, however, why America should be made to suffer. Above all, we love America.

We are confronted in Congress by a twofold proposal. The first proposition is: Shall we or shall we not repeal the existing embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war? While of the highest importance as a symbol of our attitude, this question is limited in its material effects. It would not be surprising to find, for example, that the arms embargo does not apply to more than 10 percent of our total trade. It by no means covers all arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

What is the argument for repeal of the embargo? As it is made to me I gather that there are a few persons who sincerely believe that repeal of the embargo will enhance and increase American neutrality. I cannot follow their argument. It is not denied, for instance, that the principal reason for repealing the embargo is to change the balance of power in the present European war. Surely if we drastically change the balance of power while this war is in progress, we are committing an act which is neither neutral nor noncombatant. Obviously, if we repeal the embargo we at least make a gesture in support of the Allies, who knew this law was on the books when war began. Whatever the merits of such a gesture maybe it cannot be contended that this is neutrality.

Most of those who urge me to repeal the embargo, however, do so because they frankly want to help England and France by safely selling them supplies. These people are perfectly willing to abandon neutrality because of their belief that by helping England and France they will promote the peace of the United States. What are their reasons?

They say that to repeal the arms embargo will increase employment and bring some prosperity. In my view, this is dangerously short-sighted. Repeal might bring a quick, temporary recovery "jag," but it would be followed finally by a deathly economic collapse.

They contend that repeal would build up the munitions industry in this country and thereby create an asset to our own national defense. Is it not better to build up our munitions industry and keep the produce of it for ourselves instead of letting it go abroad?

They further contend that repeal of the embargo will promote peace for America on the ground that if England and France "crack" we will surely enter the war; we should therefore help them to win in order to keep ourselves out. I submit that the chances of England and France being defeated are slim indeed. The choice seems to be between a defeat of Germany on the one hand and a stalemate on the other. I further contend, however, that even if Germany were victorious and desired to conquer the United States she never could do so. No European power can occupy or vanquish the United States, and it is fanciful to suggest that it could. Fortunately, our national safety is not at stake.

Those who would repeal the embargo say that it is an incomplete affair, that it covers only a few munitions. That is true. It is only a small step toward preventing the growth of a large war-supported foreign trade, but it is a step; and, as I shall show later, a step in the right direction.

Finally, the advocates of embargo repeal base their contention on the moral ground that it is our duty to civilization to do this unneutral and nonpeaceful thing. As one who could serve a moral cause with enthusiasm, and who recognizes that American history is built in large part on wars for ideals, I deny that this war has yet developed an ideal for which we should give the lives of our sons. Clearly England and France are fighting in self-defense for their homelands and for their families. These are splendid ideals. Let us hope that we, too, would fight as well if our homeland and our families were equally threatened. There is enough glory in fighting for one's country without wanting to strain all the facts in order to call it a war for civilization. They are fighting gloriously for themselves. That would be enough for me were I in their place. I cannot believe that it is not an all-sufficient and soul-satisfying pretext for them. They are not fighting our battles, and I do not believe that they wish to be told that they are.

To sum up. The proposal to repeal the embargo—the first administration proposal which I am discussing—would certainly tend to augment our war-supported trade, and to that extent to increase the risk of our getting into war. Because it would admittedly change the balance of power while the war is on, repeal would destroy our neutrality. When we deliberately take an unneutral position we may expect retaliation, and as a self-respecting people we would bitterly resent retaliation. America, hating aggressors, should not herself be an aggressor.

So much for the question of repealing the arms embrago.

What does the rest of the administration proposal embody? How far does it reduce or eliminate our risk of involvement in war due to credit, shipping, or commerce—that 90 percent of our foreign trade which is now not limited at all?

The administration proposal does not contain a true, watertight cash-and-carry system. Insofar as cash is concerned, the bill contains no cash requirement; merely a provision that the title to goods which are shipped to belligerents shall be transferred before shipment is made. Insofar as shipping is concerned, the bill contains no provision requiring American shipping to go at its own risk, which would be the soundest way to mitigate the dangers of embroilment in war inherent in our shipping. Insofar as preventing the transshipment of goods from neutrals to belligerents is concerned, the bill does not prevent Hitler from getting American supplies from neutral nations. Insofar as preventing the growth of a large war-supported foreign trade is concerned, the bill does absolutely nothing.

Yet who can deny that the sudden growth of a large war-supported trade is a threat to our peace and lends itself to propaganda for war and to profiteering? Let us not forget that the growth of such a trade in the World War was one of the factors which resulted in a public sentiment which eventually impelled us into the conflict.

Of course, a complete embargo on all our foreign trade would work tremendous hardship and would not be feasible. A provision which limited all our foreign trade to the averages of peacetime years, however, would not cause hardship and yet would avoid the dangers of a rapid trade growth. I therefore propose that American foreign trade for the duration of the current war be held to the average of peacetime years, and, in order to prevent transshipment to belligerents, I propose that this limitation apply to neutrals and belligerents alike. Such a limitation would not only represent the most that Government can be expected to do to preserve peace; it would also tend to increase and enhance our neutrality by preserving the balance of power in the current war insofar as such balance is affected by the United States.

I further propose that we should extend the present arms embargo to all neutrals and thereby prevent the shipment of arms to Japan in the east and to Italy and to communistic Russia for transshipment to Germany. Such a step would be truly neutral because it would tend to preserve the balance insofar as this depends on the United States. The only Americans who would be adversely affected would be the arms manufacturers. Above all, such a step would help America stay out of the conflict and, in the tragic event that we become engaged, would at least ward off the shocking possibility of American boys being killed by American-made bullets fired from American-made guns.

We should wait to repeal the embargo until the first overt act has been committed against us. Let us then use repeal of the embargo as a weapon of military strategy and as an act of self-defense. When we have done so, let us follow it up with still more direct and effective measures. If a great and damaging overt act is committed against America, we should not only give our Allies groceries on a cash-and-carry basis; we should jump in with both feet and fight for our country and our God shoulder to shoulder with them. Not for us will be a vacillating and ignoble policy called "short of war"; not for us will there exist a counsel of being half in and half out, of bringing in by the back door what we are ashamed of at the main gate; not for us a policy of "scuttle and run," of eating one's cake and having it, too; of getting all the advantages while striving to avoid all the risks. No. Once the war becomes our war, whether for economic, military, or moral grounds, let us get into it, and get really in. But until we have cause to get in, let us stay out.

Like strong men, let us not be the first to provoke. Let someone else do that. Let us not stick out our chin truculently to invite a blow. Someone will strike it, and we probably would not—and should not—stand for it.

It is for these reasons that I feel so strongly that this is the time, the place, and the opportunity to debate the question of peace or war for America. There may not be another. I greatly fear that if we take this step the succeeding ones will follow with the inevitability of Greek tragedy. We shall then have done what no nation in Europe has done—engaged ourselves in a war which was not our war, embarked on a crusade which was not our crusade, and plunged our people into a tragedy which was easily avoidable. In such wanton negligence I want no part. From such suicidal disregard for our heaven-sent mission in this world may God deliver us.

Let us, as George Washington said, "establish a national character." If in times of foreign dispute every American sides with the country where his ancestors came from, we shall have no country at all. We ask as much patriotism here as we find on foreign shores.

We want nothing that is smug or selfish or cautious. We are willing to risk everything in a crusade, but let it be an American crusade. America, in its 150 years as a nation, has taken great strides toward creating a way of life which is different and better than any the world has ever seen. No foreign state, no foreign people, no foreign civilization, has the potentiality that we have here in America. Before we embrace a foreign ideal, therefore, let us achieve our own. It is the world's best and only hope. In our faithfulness to it we best do our duty to ourselves; we best do our duty to humanity.

Colonel House Letter Admitted and Proven To Be a Fraud

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 27, 1939

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, on October 11, on page 598 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under the caption "Good Neighbor Policy," there appeared an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON], which was in the nature of a letter under date of June 10, 1919, addressed to the Right Honorable David Lloyd George and signed by Col. E. M. House. Since this has been inserted in the RECORD the gentleman from Montana has publicly admitted, as I shall show by quotations from the RECORD, that this letter is not at all what it purports to be; however, it has gone throughout the Nation to many parts of the world, bearing the stamp of authenticity, given by being made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Its deceptive character has created doubts in the minds of many good people. It is not my purpose to necessarily condemn a Member of this body who has, from my point of view, shamefully abused the privileges accorded a Member, but with the hope that some of the same people who read this shameless libel on the good names of some of America's great men, will likewise read this statement and then have a fuller understanding of the whole situation and be able to free themselves from doubts that might have been provoked by this fraudulent letter.

To show how far-reaching has been the effect of the publication of this spurious document, I quote a letter that I received from an outstanding citizen of my district, and one of the leading educators in the State of Washington:

WENATCHEE, WASH., October 23, 1939.

Hon. CHARLES H. LEAVY,
Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE LEAVY: In checking through the [daily] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 11, current session, I found on page 598 the beginning of a document that was startling, to say the least. It is the extension of remarks by Mr. THORKELSON, of Montana, and purports to be a letter from Colonel House to Lloyd George.

Of course, I was aware there has been a superb propaganda campaign by the British Government, but nowhere have I seen anything as complete as this report.

I am writing to you at this time for information as to whether or not this document is authentic. It colors every headline I read and every speech I hear. I do not wish to quote from it or use it in our history classes unless I can be sure that it is not in itself primarily a piece of fiction. There may have been a time when Americans believed all they read, but now the danger is that we may not be willing to believe anything in print. My hope is to be able to help some of these high-school youngsters establish values and develop ways of checking sources.

Cordially yours,

JOHN SHAW.

Now, for proof that the letter published by the gentleman from Montana is spurious and viciously false, I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 13, pages 391 and 392:

Mr. THOMASON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman in the course of the remarks to which he expects to address himself today. I rise at this time to make an inquiry, more than anything else. I observe from the daily RECORD that on Wednesday, October 11, beginning at page 598, there appears six small-typed pages of an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Montana, purporting to be a letter signed by Col. E. M. House, and addressed to the Right Honorable David Lloyd George, from the British consulate in New York City on June 10, 1919, in which Colonel House, in effect, proposed, as the gentleman from Montana suggests, an "invisible government" for world domination. May I ask the gentleman if this is the late Col. Edward M. House, of Texas, and one time an intimate of President Wilson?

Mr. THORKELSON. That is who it is supposed to be; yes.

Mr. THOMASON. Supposed to be? Does the gentleman have positive information that it is the same Colonel House?

Mr. THORKELSON. What does the gentleman mean by "positive information"?

Mr. THOMASON. I do not mean to question the good faith of the gentleman; but, having known Colonel House more or less casually and quite well by reputation, I am anxious to know the authenticity of this letter.

Mr. THORKELSON. I think if the gentleman will read the letter, if he will review the things that happened since the letter was written and what happened before the war; if he will take into consideration that the Prince of Wales was over here dancing around after the war, as stated in that letter; and if he will take other things into consideration, I think he will find that the letter is authentic in the manner it is written.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman state, for the benefit of the Members of the House, many of whom have serious doubts about the authenticity of the letter, from what source he obtained the letter and what evidence he has of its authenticity?

Mr. THORKELSON. The gentleman may read the letter and draw his own conclusions.

Mr. THOMASON. I have read the letter with amazing and unusual interest. Knowing Colonel House and his life work in a way, I, along with many of my colleagues from Texas and, I believe, many of my colleagues in the House, have serious doubt about the authenticity of the letter, and I therefore would welcome the gentleman placing in the RECORD some evidence of its authenticity.

Mr. THORKELSON. The letter has been published. The letter, of course, does not itself refer particularly to England. It refers to the power that rules England. Let me give the gentleman a little history.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman have the original of this letter?

Mr. THORKELSON. No; I have not.

Mr. THOMASON. Can the gentleman tell me if the original did bear the date line "British Consulate at New York City" and if it was signed "Col." E. M. House?

Mr. THORKELSON. I presume it does.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman have any evidence of that fact?

Mr. THORKELSON. No.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman furnish to the House some evidence of the authenticity of this letter?

Mr. THORKELSON. May I refer you to the American Publishing Society, Bremerton, Wash.?

Mr. THOMASON. I do not mean to trespass upon the gentleman's time, but may I say in that connection that Colonel House is not here to defend himself, and I think a rank injustice may have been done a very distinguished citizen.

Mr. THORKELSON. It is not a rank injustice. I do not care if the man who wrote that letter came from Texas or anywhere else.

Mr. THOMASON. But he was a great American citizen, and it is the rankest kind of an injustice if this is not a genuine letter signed by him. I want to know if Col. E. M. House signed this letter, and if the gentleman will be kind enough to furnish to the House evidence of that fact. I do not know whether it is his genuine signature or not, but I do not hesitate for 1 minute in saying that I have very serious doubt about it. I think, in view of that doubt, the gentleman ought to furnish evidence of its genuineness and its authenticity to the House, and I will ask him if he will not do so.

Mr. THORKELSON. The fact remains that the history in that letter speaks for itself.

Mr. THOMASON. I am not speaking of the contents of the letter. I want to know if Col. E. M. House signed this letter.

Mr. THORKELSON. I did not see Colonel House sign the letter, but the letter contains factual history which proves itself, and the publishers who published this letter employ the following title:

"British Secret Service Report, 1919. The answer to all questions about how, when, and who caused America, 'the richest nation on earth,' to have a depression."

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman say that he has evidence that Colonel House did sign the letter or that there ever existed a genuine, bona fide letter of that kind that was signed by the late Colonel House?

Mr. THORKELSON. I do not know that positively; no.

Mr. THOMASON. The gentleman will not say that it is genuine, then?

Mr. THORKELSON. No; except as far as history speaks within the letter itself.

Then on October 17, pages 522 and 523, when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] addressed the House, he touched upon this matter, as follows:

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the remarks I have prepared on the subject of neutrality, I wish to refer briefly to three subjects that have already been discussed here in the House.

I followed with a great deal of interest the questions asked by our colleague from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] regarding a letter inserted in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON]. Twenty-one years ago Colonel House befriended me when I was 3,000 miles from home. I have always had a very warm spot in my heart for Col. E. M. House. For that reason, if for no other, let me state that I have read what purports to be a letter written by Colonel House inserted in the daily RECORD by the gentleman from Montana, and I want to state for the RECORD that I sincerely doubt its authenticity and feel very sure that the letter could not have been written and was not written by Colonel House. At this time when we are starting debate on a bill that is going to have a great effect on the future peace of this country, it seems to me to be ill-advised to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD anything that would stir up racial or religious hatred. I express the hope that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON], in view of all the circumstances and in view of the fact that he has stated on the floor that he does not know positively that the letter is authentic, that of his own volition he will withdraw that letter and keep it out of the permanent RECORD of the House.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I hope he and every Member of the House will read certain letters I will insert in the RECORD today under permission granted me a few minutes ago, one of them being from the secretary to the late E. M. House, who served him, I believe, some 40 years, and the other from his son-in-law, stating in very positive terms that that letter is a spurious document. So I join with the gentleman in the request that he makes and the hope he expresses, because it does seem to me that of all documents in this day and time that should reflect the absolute truth it is the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am sure every Member of the House at all times, when he knows the facts, wants to preserve that as an honest, truthful record. I hope my friend will read these letters I am putting in the RECORD today which condemns that as a spurious document.

Mr. THORKELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. THORKELSON. When I put the letter in I did not say it was Colonel House. I made no claim to that effect. Another thing, I said to disregard the signer at the end of the letter, and in my remarks, if you will turn to the RECORD, I made that statement. I said to only read the substance matter of the letter and then compare that with conditions that have happened in the past 20 years. I have looked it up. It is stated in the letter that General Rodman was knighted by the British Government, and the record is over here in the Congressional Library.

Mr. MILLER. I cannot yield any further unless the gentleman wants to withdraw the letter.

Mr. THORKELSON. I just wanted to clear that up.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman stated on the floor of the House that the letter was signed by E. M. House, and in response to a question asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], he stated it was the Colonel House who was associated with President Wilson. His answer may be found on page 391 of the RECORD. I hope it will not be necessary to object to future unanimous-consent requests, which may be made by Mr. THORKELSON, which many of us feel constrained to do, unless the letter is withdrawn.

And again, on October 18, on page 581 of the RECORD, when the gentleman from Montana was addressing the House, the following colloquy took place:

Mr. THOMASON. I hold no brief for the late Colonel House, for I believe his name and fame will live long after many of us are forgotten. My principal interest right now is in the preservation of an honest, truthful CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now that the House letter has been, I think, proven to be a spurious document by the letters I placed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 334, in extension of my remarks, does not the gentleman feel that in justice to himself and his colleagues in this House and to a truthful RECORD that the entire letter ought to be expunged? Because, if the gentleman will recall, he said when he referred to that letter and the signer of it that it was the Col. E. M. House who was the intimate friend and associate of the late President Wilson. So, in the interest of fairness and justice, not only to a dead man but to an honest RECORD, does not the gentleman think that letter should be expunged from the RECORD?

Mr. THORKELSON. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that I believe the letter was signed "Col. E. M. House." Edward M. House, the friend of President Wilson, never signed his name "Col. E. M. House." This is supposed to be a report that came from the British secret files, and I do not believe that the House who was adviser to President Wilson ever was engaged by Great Britain and sitting in the British consulate. It must therefore have been someone else.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman now admit that it is not the Col. Edward M. House whom the gentleman from Connecticut spoke of in such high admiration yesterday? Does the gentleman now admit that he is not the man who wrote that letter? If so, I say that in all fairness the letter should be expunged from this RECORD.

Mr. THORKELSON. I never said that this Colonel House was the Edward M. House, President Wilson's adviser. As a matter of fact, I said, "Disregard both the writer and the recipient of the letter."

* * * * * * *

Mr. MILLER. I understood the gentleman to say that the letter he put in the RECORD signed "Col. E. M. House" did not purport to be the Colonel House of the Wilson administration.

Mr. THORKELSON. I said, "Do not take the writer into consideration. Do not consider the origin of the letter, but read the substance of it." I said that in my remarks. There was no reason to assume that it was the Edward M. House who was connected with the Wilson administration. I do not know who it was. My letter was inserted in the RECORD for one purpose alone, and that was to give information to the American people. I think they are entitled to it.

And finally, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 19, on page 611, the gentleman from Montana admitted that he was convinced the letter he had caused to be inserted in the RECORD should be stricken from the RECORD, and secured unanimous consent to do so in the following language:

THE HOUSE LETTER

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in respect to the letter inserted in the daily RECORD on October 11, I find it has already been considered in the Geneva Conference held in 1929 and 1930. The matter was brought up at that time because Lord Northcliffe, proprietor of the London Times, the Daily Mail, and other English newspapers, was over here in charge of British propaganda in America.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the authorship of the British Secret Service communication of 1919, which I placed in the daily RECORD on October 11, has been identified by the wire which I received during the debate yesterday and in this book, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the whole article, in justice to Mr. E. M. House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as I stated at the outset, it is not my intent or purpose to do other than make clear to the thousands of people who might have read the letter, so unjustly and unfairly given publicity through the columns of the RECORD, shamelessly slandering the good name of a great American who has long since gone to his reward, that I have taken the time and effort to prepare these remarks. Another Member of this House, the Honorable JOHN MARTIN, of Colorado, who is one of the most respected, trusted, admired, and able Members of this body, and has been for many years, on October 20, on page 662 and through to page 666 has analyzed the letter and has characterized it in so appropriate and fitting a style and manner that I here desire to repeat certain extracts of it and place my stamp of approval on what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] says of it:

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have read with the utmost amazement the curious document inserted in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 11 by the Member from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON]. It must be the most scurrilous, the most reprehensible, the most un-American document ever printed within the two covers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It could only have been conceived by a mind poisoned against America and all its leaders and all its activities, and it could be credited by no man with sufficient knowledge and intelligence to occupy a seat in the American Congress, no matter by what fortuitous chance of politics elected.

I have read but one document in my lifetime which could compare with it in the impress of falsity, of spuriousness on every page, in every paragraph, in every sentence, in every line—the most damnable tissue of falsehood the human mind could conceive.

* * * * * * *

Withdrawing such a defamatory and injurious document from the permanent RECORD does not suffice. What is written is written. It has been scattered to the ends of the earth in the daily RECORD. Its sponsor should be dealt with in such a manner as to visit the official condemnation of the House of Representatives upon him and it, not simply withdrawing it at his request, while still standing on his avowal of its truth.

* * * * * * *

If any Member is not satisfied with my performance, he may analyze this astounding document for himself, with my assurance that he will find therein not only all I have quoted but innumerable other lies, inventions, and distortions. When he finishes he will not need my assurance that he has read the greatest number and variety of transparent lies and calumnies ever uttered in the same number of words. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that anyone who might even remotely have been influenced by the reading of the spurious letter inserted in the proceedings of this great legislative body will completely disabuse his mind of any influence whatever it might have had by the citations I have here given from the RECORD. If there still be any doubt as to the authenticity of anything contained in this letter, an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] will be found in the Appendix of the RECORD, on page 334, which establishes beyond every doubt the fact that the so-called Colonel House letter is a fake and a forgery.

Guarding Religious Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by me and published recently in Liberty, a magazine of religious freedom:

[From Liberty]

GUARDING RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

(By the Honorable JENNINGS RANDOLPH, Member of Congress from West Virginia)

When the story of American culture is finally written, foremost among the basic factors influencing the development of American life and customs will be that unique contribution of the American people to the civilization of mankind—the principle of religious freedom. Nowhere else in the Christian world prior to the adoption of the American Constitution, except for the Edict of Milan, in 313 A. D.—really an edict of toleration and not of liberty—during the reign of the Roman emperor, Constantine,[1] had the principle of religious freedom been accepted by any nation, America stands alone as the world's most famous example of a nation the government of which, from the start, has been predicated upon the separation of church and state.

Curiously enough, the Encyclopedia Americana devotes several columns to the subject of "Religious Liberty," while the Encyclopedia Britannica omits this topic. In many parts of the world today the value of religious freedom has not been fully recognized, and in some parts it is not even a matter of polite conversation.

THE AMERICAN PRINCIPLE OF LIBERTY

The American doctrine of separation of church and state did not come about suddenly, nor was it an accepted principle in early colonial days. Circumstances peculiar to the American scene at the time of the founding of the United States account largely for its incorporation in the Constitution. The profound remark of Bancroft, in his History of the United States, illustrates this point. "American law," he said, "was the growth of necessity, not the wisdom of individuals. It was not an acquisition from abroad; it was begotten from the American mind, of which it was a natural and inevitable, but also a slow and gradual, development." In fact, the Colonies started with the Old World principle that the church and the state were inseparable. Most of the colonial governments, however, were tolerant of religious groups other than the one associated with the government. This tolerance represented a departure from Old World ideas largely in the degree of its toleration. In many cases, restrictions attended the toleration extended by the Colonies, and often consisted of the denial of specific civil rights, such as the right to vote or otherwise to participate in the affairs of government, unless one belonged to the politically accepted church.

This toleration as practiced in the American Colonies, which was far more liberal than most of the Old World views and practices with respect to the relationship of church and state, laid the foundation for the fully developed religious freedom that was ultimately to become one of the greatest principles of American life. One of the last colonial States to be formed was the first to proclaim the principle of religious freedom the equal treatment of all faiths and creeds with respect to the government of the State. Rhode Island thus became the cradle of American religious freedom.

Idealism "begotten from the American mind" undoubtedly played a large part in the final acceptance of the principle of religious freedom by the Constitutional Convention; yet a very practical consideration is probably overlooked or undervalued, for the important part it played in permanently establishing the principle of religious freedom in the American system. That practical consideration was the fact that among the many religious groups then flourishing in the New World, no one of them could reasonably hope to gain enough strength to force a church-state union in its own favor to the exclusion of the others. Under such circumstances, more certain was the gain if all creeds and beliefs agreed to a permanent separation of church and state wherein not only all men but also all religious groups would be equal before the law of the land. Had there been one established church and only one or two dissenting groups, as was characteristic of the situation in the Old World in many instances, it is doubtful whether the principle of religious freedom could have been established in this country, even with the support of the high idealism that motivated the founding fathers.

It is just another case of American law resulting from necessity, for, if the state was kept separate from any church domination, such a separation was the best possible insurance for the unmolested existence and growth of each and every creed and belief which had gained a foothold on the shores of the American continent. It is reasonable to suppose that so long as the practical considerations

[1] Constantine had no conception of the modern meaning of the separation of church and state. As a ruler he granted toleration to both pagans and Christians by the Edict of Milan. But as emperor, and hence really the state, he mixed in religious affairs continually. The Edict of Milan further did not grant the same rights to the members of the Jewish community that were enjoyed by pagans and Christians. Three short quotations from the Catholic Encyclopedia, volume 4, page 299, set forth conditions of the Edict of Milan very clearly.

"As pontifex maximus he watched over the heathen worship." "Without realizing the full import of his actions, Constantine granted the church one privilege after another," and among other things, "placed Sunday under the protection of the state. * * * It should not be forgotten that the Jewish communities had also their own jurisdiction, exemption, and immunities, even if in a more limited degree."

upon which American religious freedom is founded remain relatively unchanged, there is little danger of the loss of this freedom.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM CHALLENGED

Forces are at work today, however, which tend to change the conditions and to alter the practical considerations to such an extent that the ideal of religious liberty is in danger of being undermined. One of these forces may be found in the dictatorial form of government now popular in some parts of the world.

Dr. John Alexander MacKay, president of Princeton Theological Seminary, has explained in the New York Times how the principles of dictatorial government affect religious freedom. He says: "The totalitarian state, whether in its Communist or its Fascist form, embodies three revolutionary principles. First, it equates a single group in a national society with the whole of that society. This principle has launched Russia upon an era of class conflict, and Germany upon an era of race conflict. Second, it equates society with the state. This principle has destroyed the structure of democracy, or at least the democratic trend, in some important countries, by abolishing free institutions and organized minorities. Third, it equates the state with God. The state is divinized and makes demands upon human personality which only God has a right to make."

Contrast the basic American principles of government with these totalitarian concepts. First, all men are created equal before the law. The American state recognizes no individual or group of individuals as superior to any other individual or group. This has a dampening effect on class hatreds, religious jealousies, and race conflicts.

Second, government of the people, by the people, and for the people, as carried out in a representative form, and by the rule of the majority, encourages the growth and development of free institutions and permits organized minorities to exist under the same conditions as organized majorities.

Third, the complete separation of church and state makes it possible for every man to follow Christ's teaching, "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." There is no confusion of allegiance, no tyrannical concentration of control over men who were born to be free. The American state derives its authority from the people. It makes no claim to divinity through a religious association. Consequently, there is no attempt on the part of one to achieve its ends through the power or influence of the other.

WHAT WE SHOULD GUARD AGAINST

These contrasting principles make clear the points at which we must constantly be on guard to protect our heritage of religious freedom. First, we must guard against the domination of any one political party by a single religious group. In the event that such a combination develops, and the political party in question ultimately gets into power, the danger to the freedom of religious worship will become acute. Much will then be said about tolerance. But tolerance is not a substitute for true religious freedom that will be long accepted by the American people. The combination of one religious group with the state through a political party will threaten the equality of other religious groups before the law. No effort should be spared to avoid such an unhappy situation.

Second, we must guard against the promulgation of the totalitarian principles of the union of church and state. These principles hold more than one danger to religious freedom. Either by divinizing the state itself or by utilizing the organization of one religious group to strengthen the power of the state the adoption of these principles will jeopardize the right to worship according to the dictates of conscience through the imposition of penalties and restrictions of mere tolerance or by the brutal cruelty of intolerance.

Practical considerations of modern times may dictate many changes in our social structure. To be able to make these needed changes as occasion demands is essential to the health of the Nation. But every American must be on guard to see that these changes do not violate the very principles which make such changes possible. One of the most important of these principles is the cherished American heritage of freedom of religious worship.

We Must Keep Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

ARTICLE BY HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am glad to comply with several requests and offer for inclusion therein an article entitled "We Must Keep Out," written by former President Hoover, and which appears in the October 28 issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

The article follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 28, 1939]

WE MUST KEEP OUT

(By Herbert Hoover)

The American people will be confronted with the issue of war or peace as long as this war in Europe lasts. That is the most fateful issue that can come to a people. Each generation faces new issues, new problems, and seeks new solutions. But the invisible forces which make war, peace, and revolution are old, and they repeat. And to make sound progress nations, like individuals, must test their solutions with the stern and often inhibiting measure of human experience. And like individuals, the memories of nations are sometimes short.

I spent nearly a score of years from the outbreak of the Great War in 1914, dealing with these forces, and I may sum my conclusions at once: America must keep out of these wars. It can keep out of these wars. It has nothing to fear for our own independence from the result of these wars. This is no case of "hope" that we may stay out of war; it is the time for will and inflexible resolution to stay out. Our greatest service is a strong America to aid the rebuilding of a European world which will be tottering no matter who the victors in this war may be. Our greatest service to civilization is to put our own house in order and maintain true liberty upon this continent. For it may be that otherwise liberty will sink for centuries in the night of despair.

War and peace are not cold mathematical problems. Our decisions will be determined by our emotions as well as our reason. Today we have two dominant attitudes. We are against joining in the European and Asiatic wars. That attitude is the dominance of reason. We are incensed at the dictatorships, their ideologies, and their aggressions. We sympathize with Great Britain, France, and Poland. Our danger is that our indignation will displace our reason.

WHAT MAKES WAR IN EUROPE

First, let us examine the invisible forces which drive the fates in Europe.

To many American eyes Europe consists of magnificent cities, historic cathedrals, art, music, literature, great universities, monuments of human heroism and progress. It possesses peoples of fine hospitality, of the widest cultivation and attainments. For four centuries since the Renaissance men in Europe have fought and died to build the structure of personal liberty, to lift the dignity of men, to bring security and peace. And from every country—England, Germany, France, Russia, and all the others—we have received magnificent inheritances of human thought upon which our civilization has built.

But Americans too often see little of the gigantic but invisible forces of disintegration that so often dominate these peoples. Here are 26 races of 400,000,000 people, outside of Russia, living cheek by jowl in an area two-thirds the size of the United States. Through them surge the forces of nationalism, of imperialism, of age-old hates, memories of deep wrongs, fierce distrusts, and impellant fears. There are the conflicts of religions and persecution. Long before the World War these forces were in added ferment because of new ideas from the industrial revolution. There is here a hell's brew of malign spirits.

And these spirits find tangible expression in the rivalry of economic development, the setting up of barriers of trade, the struggles for political independence, the pressures of population, the grabs and quarrels over vast areas of the earth for colonization and for exploitation. These all add to the centrifugal forces.

The existence of great areas of mixed populations makes exact boundaries between nations almost hopeless. In every one of these zones some races are separated from their fatherland. On both sides the existing governments unceasingly seek to impose their national language and customs upon these minorities. The outcries of these oppressed to the sympathies of their racial brothers across the borders are unceasing stimulants to friction. And these boundaries shift from every war and the conflicts flame up in new areas.

To all this must be added the destruction of the last war and the loosening of moral restraints.

And periodically there boils up among these peoples some Pied Piper with silver tongue calling some new Utopia, or some man on horseback calls followers to wars of aggression. History, even since the foundation of our Republic, has been a succession of Napoleons, Kaiser Wilhelms, Lenins, Stalins, and Hitlers.

Resistant against all these furies there are the benign forces of human liberty, of religion, of education, and of morals which have fought these evils over centuries. And among these peoples are great leaders of thought and of men, whose aspirations and whose life services have been given to allay these evils and to build up hope and faith and peace.

Yet, with a vicious rhythm, these malign forces seem to concentrate at some spot and drive peoples, like the Gadarene swine, over the precipice of war.

During the whole of our relations with them, Europe has had only intervals of unstable peace. It has lived always on a war footing. Its periods of peace have been a groping for a balance of power through groups and alliances based upon fear and upon arms.

The job of European statesmen of good will is to engage incessantly in power politics, by which aggression is checked and the malign forces allayed, in order that tenuous peace can be extended a little longer. It is a delicate job in which loyalties to agreement by any of them constantly give way to expediences and self-preservation.

As the years have gone on, with the growth of economic interdependence, of communications between nations, of power in weapons, all the world has been affected more and more by these wars in Europe and their destructions. The interest and sympathies of nations 5,000 miles away are enlisted. Our own people suffer in unemployment and misery from this world dislocation. The effect of European wars upon early American life was but a faint echo of the thunderous blows we receive today.

We, therefore, are increasingly sensitive to every force that moves Europe, for good or evil. And we have our opinions about these forces. But being 3,000 miles away, unable to appraise their movements in half a billion people, with our own form of government based upon slow-moving public opinion, idealistic in its approach and impossible of continuity in foreign policy, with racially divided emotions, we are wholly unequipped to take part in the hourly shifting power politics.

The voice of experience calls out sternly that we cannot solve the problems of, or keep the peace in, Europe.

THE PERIOD BEFORE WE CAME INTO THE WORLD WAR

We have had over a century and a half of constant repercussions from these forces. But 22 years ago, for the first time, we joined in their wars. However, that was not the first cry from Europe that we should join to save civilization. Students of history will find much of interest in the propaganda that America should join to save the French Revolution and, later, that we should save the world from Napoleon—and it created bitter dissension in our country.

Be that as it may, our next really dangerous experience was 1914. During the 3 years of the Great War before we joined in it, two violent forces poured upon us. The first was the call and the propaganda that we must join to save civilization. The second was the economic impacts. And despite the dangers, we did little in military preparedness to secure respect from nations at war.

PROPAGANDA

In the World War the good opinion of neutrals for the first time loomed up as a vital factor in victory. If they were friendly, even though neutral, they could facilitate supplies and credit. If neutrals were unfriendly, they could be embarrassing, even if neutral. Of far more importance was to persuade neutral states to join in the war on one side or the other.

The old-fashioned processes of persuasion rapidly developed into a new science of propaganda. And it was of threefold purpose: To inflame hate for the enemy; to secure favor to one's self among neutrals; and to discourage the enemy people. And propaganda became a weapon no less potent than tanks, guns, and men.

All people in war are convinced that they are fighting for their firesides and their independence. Their boys are being sacrificed in hourly holocausts. Under these racks people unhesitatingly justify immoral use of words and lies. War sanctifies killing of men. It sanctifies the killing of truth. Truth, justice, tolerance are thrown to the winds when a mere lie promises to save a life or gain an advantage.

The major fact is that, in this period before we entered the Great War, propaganda was organized without moral restraint and was poured upon us with all the genius of war strategy. And do not let us be smug accusers. We did it ourselves the moment we entered the Great War.

For 3 years I saw the pernicious technique of propaganda develop. Almost every month, in directing the works of the Belgian Commission, I crossed the lines to the capitals of all the major nations at war to deal with their leading officials. On both sides I witnessed the incidents of war, while dealing with its backwash and its thousand tragedies and miseries.

Armies are not pink teas. Dreadful things were done to civilians. But daily I read of atrocities on both sides that, to my knowledge, were sheer inventions. They were invented by the thousand to create hate. I read of bloody revolutions in the streets of the enemy over which I had peacefully passed at the very time. I read all these things and a thousand others constantly reflected to the American press. I read false incidents and false news of cunning design to build up hate, malice, and dissension in America from all sides.

Every nation at war clamps down strict censorship. It is not alone censorship to prevent leaks of military information. One great object of censorship today is to control the news and create propaganda. There is not a dispatch out of Europe that is not tainted by half-truth or untruth. And it is not the fault of our correspondents; under the conditions imposed upon them they do the best they can.

In the World War we were called upon hourly by the democracies to witness the wickedness of despots. They would overwhelm the world with their savagery. We would be the next victim. Liberty could live only if we joined in the struggle. We were told by the Central Powers that it was a war to destroy their trade and competition, to rob them of colonies and foreign possessions.

That we joined in the Great War because of propaganda, no man will say. But we can say that the public mind was conditioned to high indignation at any incident, no matter how minor or how defensible. How quickly the public mind can shift is shown by the fact that 6 months before we went into the war we elected a President on the cry, "He kept us out of war."

One effect of propaganda and the events of war was to focus our whole emotions and our thoughts upon the incidents and the peoples at war. We lost sight of our own country. Fascinated by this fight in the ring, we forgot our family at home. Our sense of right and wrong in those quarrels became our dominant discussion. When we concluded as to who was wicked, it was but one step to the feeling that somehow, someway, we had a duty to see right triumph among our neighbors. And we went out "to lick the Kaiser."

The major purpose of propaganda is to build up hate. Hate is the most potent of war emotions. It is the most malign of all human emotions. With a little urging of hate we can be made to forget even the fine inheritances of our own civilization. We can be made to forget Goethe, Schiller, Beethoven, Luther, or Rodin, Voltaire, Pasteur or Tolstoy, or Dante, Michelangelo, Verdi, and Cavour, and a thousand others. Do these hates make an inheritance for our children?

ECONOMIC IMPACTS

And the voice of experience from the economic disruption of the last war has advice for today. Prior to our joining the war the demand for supplies and munitions created riot in our economic system. We expanded our farms and our factories; we speculated madly in goods and stocks; we advanced prices. We loaned money recklessly to warring nations, which would never have been repaid, even had we not gone into the war. We utterly disregarded the inevitable impoverishment of the world after war, and its certain demoralization, whether we joined or not. We had built for ourselves a castle of economic cards that would have collapsed had we stayed out.

Some of this cannot be prevented in the situation today, but the voice of experience says right here and now:

We should not expand our equipment beyond that which we can later on employ for peace purposes. We should not sell to belligerents on credit. Our industries should seek their workmen from the already unemployed and not draw men away from their steady jobs into war industries that will shrink and displace these men from their livelihood at the end of the war. Our business world should be content that increased volume will bring increased profits, and should, for the sake of its own soul and its future, not raise prices except insofar as abnormal increases in wages or raw material necessitate. We should remember that profits and stock prices will collapse in the general impoverishment of the world when it is all over.

Here is a case for voluntary action, for business statesmanship. These results cannot be secured by government without making us a Fascist state.

PREPAREDNESS

The period before we came into the Great War was marked by our unwillingness to build an adequate Army and Navy. Had we built much more strongly, we would have gained a respect that might have saved us from attack by Germany. The voice of experience says that governments at war get contemptuous of unarmed neutrals.

THE WAR

We finally joined in the last European war. We did it because some of our citizens were attacked on the high seas by the dictator of that time. But the dominant impulse was idealism to protect liberty in the world and bring the end of wars to mankind.

After a few weeks of muddling and resisting, we accepted the inexorable fact that no democracy can fight a modern war with the processes of democracy. They are made for peace. They are too slow in action; there is no time for debate and for meeting of minds. We became an effective dictatorship. We had to if we were to bring quick strength upon the front. We conscripted all our boys. By direct and indirect means, the Government took control of production, of prices, of labor. It rightly seized about 85 percent of all war profits. The Government took over the railways. It directed credit. And by direct and indirect means it partially suppressed free speech and free press. It told the people what to eat and to wear.

As I had been called back from Europe to head the Food Administration, and to sit as a member of the President's War Council, I speak of what I know. We were in the war but 18 months. Every month we tightened the clamps of fascism—we did not know the word then—tighter and tighter. Had we been required to go on another year with the war most of the voluntary regulation we installed would have gone by the board for full compulsion.

If that war had been a long war, its economic demobilization would have been even more difficult. But even as it was, had it not been for a great believer in free enterprise—Woodrow Wilson—it would not have been demobilized.

At the President's request, I personally drafted numerous cables from Paris, combating arguments that this or that war measure should be given extension or developed into what we now call compulsory economy. Many cried out that we must do this to prevent immediate collapse. In so short a period we had built up organizations of industries, of agriculture, labor, and finance which liked the noncompetitive system. They had privileges and subsidies. They had already grown vested habits and vested interests. They turned instantly into pressure groups, intent on saving all or part of these privileges. And they have never forgotten them, as witness the attempt to restore them in the N. R. A. and A. A. A.

And today we have so learned the need of dictatorship in war and have so accustomed ourselves to the idea that we have the legislation all worked out and prepared for introduction to the Congress. I recommend those who are skeptical to read the May bill and the War Department report on powers for the President. A further recommended course of reading is the war-tax bill introduced by 50 Senators. There is little in the Nazi system except the mysticism that is not included in all this legislation.

The voice of experience calls a double alarm. In 1917, when we joined in the war, the sense of private enterprise was unimpaired. We had no Fascist taint of planned economy. We had no Socialist taint of Government operation of enterprise. We had no centralization of credit. We had no deficit. We had a debt of only one and a quarter billions. We would start another war with a weakened sense of private enterprise. We would start with a four-and-one-half-billion-dollar deficit in peace expenditures. We would start with over $40,000,000,000 debt. We would have to rearrange the debt by some sort of repudiation or devaluation or capital levy to make room for another forty billion.

When we emerge from another world war, our industry and agriculture will be far more distorted and demoralized. Our taxes will be still more increased. Then we will face the inevitable depression, with all its unemployment and misery, which must follow every great war. The pressures for continued Government regimentation of economic life in peacetime will have been multiplied. Yet we cannot increase, control and direct the economic activities of a people without compulsion. We cannot compel men without undermining their intellectual and spiritual progress. That hideous lesson stands out not only in theory but by practical example. It has been just such forces that have destroyed 12 democracies in Europe. If we go into another world war, liberty will be lost to America.

Surely the voice of experience calls to us that we are little likely to emerge again without great impairment, if not total loss, of our American system of liberty. What shall it profit a nation that loses its own soul?

Our boys fought a magnificent fight in that war. They showed glorious sacrifice and courage. Our people at home showed a vast sense of self-sacrifice and discipline. We know there is no diminution of our national fiber or softening of valor. The world knows we are not afraid to fight.

THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

We then went to Europe to make the peace.

I have stated elsewhere that President Wilson went to Paris with the prayers of the common people of the whole world that these malign forces in Europe should be wiped away and that a new era should be brought to the world.

I was there, representing our Government in what amounted to a second great American intervention in Europe. Acting through an allied council, the job was to restore economic life and order in Europe, so that peace could be made and life could be restored. We reduced blockades, we opened harbors and canals. We restored telegraph and railway and water communication between new nations and their old enemies. We set up advisers to guide new nations in the unfamiliar paths of governmental organization of finance and public order. We distributed food, raw materials, credit, ships, and railway equipment. We laid the foundations of reconstruction. We were inspired with the hope that this second intervention of America would contribute to build a new world. In the course of that job I was brought again into intimate contact with the heads of all the 26 governments and forced to observe and study the invisible forces of destruction and of revolution again at work.

Again I may repeat what I have said many times elsewhere. There were good men at the peace conference and there were high aspirations. But the malign forces of age-old hates, revenge, of imperialism, of nationalism, and of greed raised an ugly domination of that conference. Moreover, as the conference went on, the unsolvable problems of European boundaries and Europe's economic life contributed more and more to the demoralization of the peace.

President Wilson worked valiantly to combat these evil forces. He laid American idealism on the peace table. He cried out and argued for reason and justice. He knew that Europe must turn its face to the future and its back on the past if there was to be hope of real peace.

He secured the freedom of races who had seen centuries of bondage. He obtained a formal agreement to replacement of the balance of power and power politics by cooperative security, with conciliation and arbitration as its moral forces. In the absence of the United States this very agency soon turned into an instrument of oppression and a cover for expropriation of vast territories.

Our President refused to accept for America an inch of land or a dollar of indemnities, in which we had a right to participate. We wanted nothing but peace.

After all, Britain and France are highly imperialistic democracies. They had great losses to recoup for their people. They secured a total area larger than the United States east of the Mississippi. Italy received a total area about the size of Vermont. Under their irresistible sense of wrongs they demanded punishment and reparations by which the German and Austrian people would have been condemned to abject poverty for two generations. There was a certain contradiction in war and peace. During that war we professed we were fighting only the dictator over the enemy people. Then we punished the enemy people for the war.

However, the only point I wish to make is that the ideals of America are not fitted to solve these problems of Europe. Self-determination by many peoples is impossible because of boundaries or economic life. America cannot, by words of a contract, substitute the processes of justice for hate and fear. We destroyed the expedients of balance of power, of power politics, by which alone Europe secures a periodic peace. Indeed, that peace sowed those dragon teeth of more dictatorships. Worse, it defeated the advances of centuries toward liberty and light in many parts of Europe.

The voice of experience says we can make war in Europe, but we cannot make enduring peace.

THE AFTERMATHS IN EUROPE

Even so, for a time after the peace it looked as if a new era had come. The splendid triumph of democracy gave hope to the peoples of Europe that liberty of men could produce cooperation, good will, and the progress of mankind. To the banners of representative government came Germany, Austria, Serbia, Bulgaria, Poland, Rumania, Greece, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Estonia, Lithuania, Latvia, and Finland.

Nor was it a difficult transition. These peoples already had the foundations of liberalism, with some degree of free speech, free press, the right of free assembly, freedom of worship, trial by jury, and recognition of the dignity of the individual man. These nations already had economic systems under which men could choose their own callings and had the rights of free enterprise.

Thus, after the war, they mostly rid themselves of the last forms of feudalism. And for a few years after the peace, they blossomed forth as self-governing peoples.

But in 15 years came the downfall of most of the new and some of the older democracies and the rise of dictatorships or totalitarian governments, a dozen of them. The immediate cause was economic. How much of the economic pressure was due to war destruction or the treaties or to the Carthaginian attitudes of the victors, or the older inherent malign forces, or the shift of ideas in the industrial revolution is simply speculation. One thing was universal. That was the starry-eyed and the ideologists and the demagogues seeking to cure unemployment by government interference with the proper play of free enterprise, of agriculture, and labor. They impaired or destroyed the initiative and enterprise of their systems. Unemployment became chronic, relief and governmental spending made deficits chronic, government credit weakened or failed. Pressure groups of industry, agriculture, labor, and social reform added to the chaos by their demands for subsidies, privileges, and new ideologies. Men were elected on compromises and promises. Parliamentary bodies became mere quarrels.

Finally, these peoples, despairing that democracy could solve their difficulties, willingly surrendered to dictatorship as the only way out. And over 250,000,000 people, once largely free, voluntarily voted all authority to dictatorship or totalitarian government and sacrificed not only the liberties they acquired after the war but most of those they had built for two centuries. In two more countries—Czechoslovakia and Spain—freedom was crushed by violence.

During all this time since the Great War the United States has tried to be helpful in rebuilding stability in Europe. As I have said, we asked for no reparations or possessions. We reduced the war debts to about 50 percent. We twice participated in revision of reparations to give Germany a chance. Making the largest sacrifice ourselves, we carried through a moratorium upon debts between all governments, including German reparations. We proposed the Kellogg Pact.

In the wider field of general economic regeneration, we have proposed time and again fundamental remedies for the growing difficulties of Europe. In the 12 years after the war we secured or proposed half a dozen conferences for promotion of greater economic stability. Nothing came of them. We asked for the limitation of naval armaments, which imposed great tax burdens upon every toiler in the world. We secured full cooperation in Europe from Great Britain alone. In 1932 we proposed a simple method of reduction of land arms to accord with their own peace treaties. If it had been adopted, this war would not be possible today.

The voice of experience says we cannot create liberty and self-government in Europe. We cannot reconstruct Europe. The social regeneration of nations must come from within. It cannot come from without.

A WORLD WHERE NATIONAL INTEREST COMES FIRST

What have been the attitudes of Europe toward us during this period since the Great War?

Has Europe ever indicated that she would be willing to sacrifice one single small item that might be helpful to us?

After the armistice, when we need not have parted with a dollar, our Government loaned huge amounts of our taxpayers' resources to aid Europe in reconstruction. The victors and the old enemy combined in power politics to bring pressure against us and finally to repudiate even the money we loaned for their own rebuilding. In the meantime, they have accumulated balances and assets in this country several times the amount of the payments.

When our agriculture wallowed in misery from its overexpansion in the war to furnish them food supplies, did they not, all of them, rush to other markets, impose quotas that favored nations which had given them no aid?

We have never complained. We do not now. We realize the nature of selfishness in all nations. We realize too well the age-old malign forces of Europe. We realize the poverty and despair under which these people live. But the voice of experience again calls to us never again to assume that nations do not put their own interests first.

THE WAY IN WHICH WARS END

There is another experience that Europe has demonstrated from the Great War and its aftermath which becomes important at this moment. We are again told that unless we join in, western civilization may be destroyed and we will be the next victim. Therefore, eventually, why not now? That is propaganda to condition the American mind for entry into this war.

Aside from the fact that Britain and France with their empires can defend themselves, if they stay on the defense, great wars do not end that way.

Great wars often enough end in peace before either side is the victor. When one side is the victor in modern wars it is because the other side has become exhausted. At that moment the victors are but one lap behind in the race of exhaustion.

Neither at the armistice in 1919 nor at the end of any other war were the victors or the vanquished ready for or desirous of starting another war. In other words, not even the victor is going to pounce upon a powerful armed neutral. Especially they do not attack 130,000,000 people 3,000 miles overseas, who have a capacity of 10,000,000 soldiers and 25,000 airplanes.

Moreover, there are other factors that enter at the end of any great war. The victors want indemnities and possessions. Indemnities can be paid only from the productivity of a people. Nations cannot be made to work by force. They have to be given hope. That means the national independence of the enemy must be preserved by the victor. World trade has to be restored. In other words, even victors have to return to the paths of peace if they wish to restore their own exhaustion.

Beyond all this, when all great wars end, all the peoples take out their sufferings upon their leaders, either by putting them out of office or by revolution. And therefore the whole setting changes.

The voice of experience says we should discard these forebodings about being the next victim.

THE AFTERMATHS TO THE UNITED STATES

What was the result, to us, of the Great War? We won a military victory. But what did it cost? The 350,000 killed and maimed brought lifelong loss and sorrow to hundreds of thousands of fathers and mothers. Youth made the supreme sacrifice who could have furnished genius and guidance to our people. War placed nearly half a million persons on the national pension list—and the day will come when the number will be many times that. It cost us a huge burden of taxation which will drain our standard of living for generations.

And there were other costs. To fight the war we inflated credit, prices, and ideas, which had to bump down to earth with immense losses to our farmers and unemployment to our workers. Out of the war expansion of industry we had years of maladjustment. Out of the war expansion of agriculture, we plowed up 60,000,000 acres of pasture, and the surplus from this cultivation has been demoralizing to agriculture down to this day. We could have made our own recovery long since, but the constant shocks from Europe have defeated us time and again. Ever since the war we have lived in a hectic economic world.

For 10 years after the war the inflations and reconstructions of the other parts of the world gave us a foreign market. The "new era" was born. Our country, mad with easy money, refused to listen to any words of caution. Finally the war aftermaths, eating at the vitals of world economy, threatened its collapse. And here again we committed a violent error.

Our Federal Reserve Board in 1927 yielded to the power politics of European banks. It tried to stave off this European collapse by inflation of credit. It was a most potent drink from the Mississippi bubble of inflation. We could have got over its headache by 1930, but then came the inexorable collapse of Europe's financial structure and a world-wide depression. The headlines since have been unemployment, bankruptcy, misery, national relief measures, and deficits. With misery came the birth of our Utopias—planned economy, and all the others.

For the first time in the recent history of America we shall show decreased national wealth in this decade of the thirties. We have had about one-third of the American people existing below a decent standard of living. If the wealth we spent and taxes we paid were not in the equation, these people would not be in this plight.

The voice of experience warns us that whether we participate in this war today or not, we face a further quarter of a century of difficulty. If we do participate, we can expect another quarter of a century of impoverishment.

A FEW OTHER CONSIDERATIONS FROM EXPERIENCE

What is the menace today that calls us again to join in European war? We are told we must join in a "holy war" against ideologies that threaten the world.

But our citizens who advocate an American Don Quixote role of tilting at the windmills of lawless and obnoxious ideologies have certain elements of inconsistency. Their emotions have been concentrated on the ideologies of nazi-ism and its softer manifestations of fascism. They studiously overlooked communism until the Hitler-Stalin pact.

During the whole of these twenty-odd years since communism has become ascendant in Russia, from that base communism has been subsidized to undermine democracies everywhere. Yet none of these abolitionists of ideologies had suggested that we go to war with Russia.

If we are going to clean up the noxious ideologies of the world, we will not have succeeded until we have also cleaned up Russia, as well as Germany and some 12 other totalitarian nations.

This experience with Russia proves still another thing. It is not true that we cannot somehow live at peace in the same world with an obnoxious ideology.

And here again must we listen to the voice of experience. You cannot defeat an idea or an ideology with military force. These can be educated out of people only by their own experience. Did the Great War extirpate the idea that might makes right? Did it really implant the noble ideals of peace, of cooperation, and of human liberty?

The voice of experience says America cannot correct the world every time it goes wrong. We should destroy our physical and moral strength in a decade if we set ourselves to police the conduct and ideas of the world. And our service to mankind would end.

SERVICE TO MANKIND

But today Europe is in agony. Our every instinct cries out to help in some way.

What is the greatest service that America can perform for Europe and mankind in this situation? I may repeat:

First. We can strengthen our Army and Navy to a point where no soldier dare land on the Western Hemisphere, irrespective of who wins the war in Europe. The building of that strength is the only warning that counts. It guarantees the peace of one-half the globe.

Second. We can put our own house in order. We can demonstrate that self-governing, free people can solve the problems imposed by the industrial revolution. We can restore employment and end its sufferings. We can build up humane measures of security, of increasing standards of living for all the people. We can wipe out of our midst the disintegrating forces of corruption and coercion of men.

Third. We can thus make a demonstration on this continent that true liberalism is not dead. We can hold alight to a crumbling world the lamp of liberty as the guide to regeneration. We can prove that the hope of humanity lies not in killing or regimenting men but in preserving them and in enlarging their lives.

Fourth. We can from our strength again heal many wounds of war. We can aid the starving, succor the distressed, and care for the innocent.

Fifth. We can aid those who sit at the peace table, not by entanglement but by counsel to mitigate malignance. We can, as President Wilson did in 1919, secure some justice, some freedom, some hope to the world.

We shall never be in position to contribute even this small portion to the salvation of mankind if we ever become a participant in this war.

America, too, has a duty wholly to her own people. From them is coming a stern demand that we must not again sacrifice our youth for a useless hope. I know whereof I speak. My daily mail is heavy with their concern. Our young men are ready to die on our own soil for our own country, but they are defiant against their sacrifice for others' quarrels. Their mothers and fathers, who have skimped and denied themselves that their sons might be even better equipped to serve their country than they have been able to, are filled with anxiety lest the hope of their life service be lost. Our sympathies for the democracies will be drawn upon heavily in the days to come. Our duty to our sons is to hold reason in power over emotion. It is to hold the long vision of America's future. It is to keep out of these wars.

Address by the President of the United States in New York Herald Tribune Forum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered last evening from the White House, in the New York Herald Tribune Forum, by the President of the United States, over the National Broadcasting chain.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad to say a word in this forum, because I heartily approve the forum idea. After all, two eighteenth century forums in Philadelphia gave us the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

It is the magic of radio that has so greatly increased the usefulness of the forum. Radio listeners have learned to discriminate over the air between the honest advocate who relies on truth and logic and the more dramatic speaker who is clever in appealing to the passions and prejudices of his listeners.

We have had an example of objective reporting during recent weeks in the presentation of international subjects, both in the press and the radio. Right here I should like to throw bouquets to the majority of the press and the radio. Through a period of grave anxiety both have tried to discriminate between fact and propaganda and unfounded rumor and to give their readers and listeners an unbiased and factual chronicle of developments. This has worked so well in international reporting that one may be pardoned for wishing for more of it in the field of domestic news. If it is a good rule in one, why is it not a good rule in the other?

From the end of the World War onward this country, like many others, went through a phase of having large groups of people carried away by some emotion—some alluring, attractive, even speciously inspiring, public presentation of a nostrum. Many Americans lost their heads because several plausible fellows lost theirs in expounding schemes to end barbarity, to give weekly hand-outs, to give everybody a better job, or more modestly to put a chicken or two in every pot, all by adoption of some new financial plan or some new social system. And they all burst like bubbles.

Some proponents of nostrums were honest and sincere—others, too many of them, were seekers of personal power; still others saw a chance to get rich on the dimes and quarters of the poor. All of them, perhaps unconsciously, were capitalizing the fact that the democratic form of government works slowly, that there always exists in a democratic society a large group which champs at the bit over the slowness of democracy. That is why it is right for us who believe in democracy to keep the democratic processes progressive—moving forward with the advances in civilization. That is why it is dangerous for democracy to stop moving forward, because any period of stagnation increases the numbers of those who demand action, and action now.

There are, therefore, two distinct dangers to democracy—the peril from those who seek the fulfillment of ideals at a pace too fast for the machinery of the modern body politic to function—people who by insistence on too great speed foster an oligarchic form of government such as communism, or nazi-ism, or fascism.

The other group, which presents an equal danger, is composed of that small minority which complains that the democratic processes are inefficient as well as being slow, people who would have the whole of government put into the hands of a little group of those who have proved their efficiency in lines of specialized science or specialized private business. They equally, and in most cases unconsciously too, are in effect advocating the oligarchic form of government—communism or nazi-ism or fascism.

Extreme rightists and extreme leftists should not be taken out by us and shot against the wall, for they sharpen the argument and make us realize the value of the democratic middle course—especially if that middle course, in order to keep up with the times, is just a little bit left of center.

I am reminded of four definitions:

A radical is a man with both feet firmly planted—in the air.

A conservative is a man with two perfectly good legs, who, however, has never learned to walk.

A reactionary is a somnambulist walking backward.

A liberal is a man who uses his legs and his hands at the behest of his head.

It has been a good thing that during the past 20 years we have seen the effect of organized propaganda even when it has been based on nostrums of prejudices.

It has been a good thing for the country that the Congress of the United States has been deluged from time to time by organized propaganda. Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate begin to discriminate nowadays between honest, spontaneous, unsolicited expressions of opinion on the part of voters and the propaganda type of mass appeals.

Because the country is so profoundly interested in the world situation today, I do want to leave with you one thought bearing on international relations. I make bold to do this because the topic of this evening's discussion, as I understand it, is The War's Challenge to the United States.

In and out of Congress we have heard orators and commentators and others beating their breasts and proclaiming against sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe. That I do not hesitate to label as one of the worst fakes in current history. It is a deliberate setting up of an imaginary bogey man. The simple truth is that no person in any responsible place in the national administration in Washington, or in any State government, or in any city government, or in any county government, has ever suggested in any shape, manner, or form the remotest possibility of sending the boys of American mothers to fight on the battlefields of Europe. That is why I label that argument a shameless and dishonest fake.

I have not the slightest objection to make against the amateurs who, to the reading and listening public, discourse on the inner meanings of the military and naval events of the war in Europe. They do no harm, because the average citizen is acquiring the gift of discrimination—and the more all of these subjects are talked about by amateur armchair strategists the more the public will make up its own mind in the long run. The public will acquire the ability to think things through for themselves.

The fact of the international situation—the simple fact, without any bogey in it, without any appeals to prejudice—is that the United States, as I have said before, is neutral and does not intend to get involved in war. That we can be neutral in thought as well as in act is, as I have said before, impossible of fulfillment, because, again, the people of this country, thinking things through calmly and without prejudice, have been and are making up their minds about relative merits of current events on other continents.

It is a fact increasingly manifest that presentation of real news has sharpened the minds and the judgment of men and women everywhere in these days of real public discussion—and we Americans begin to know the difference between the truth on the one side and the falsehood on the other, no matter how often the falsehood is iterated and reiterated. Repetition does not transform a lie into a truth.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] over the National Broadcasting chain on the evening of Tuesday, October 24, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

America wants no war. Above all the highly financed far-flung propaganda, all the League of Nations internationalists, all the speeded-up moving pictures, all the war babies of Wall Street, and all the controlled press portraying in lurid colors our supposed duty to democracy and civilization, above them all can be heard the clarion tones of Americans yet true to themselves and their country in the determined unshakable cry, "We want no war."

Indeed, if no other success has come from the 3-weeks' debate in the Senate, at least every Senator has gone on record shouting that he never again will send American soldiers to fight on foreign soil. Of course, this may be discounted. When the bands begin to play, the flags are unfurled, and the soldiers march amid the cheers and the tumult, this promise may be forgotten, but there are some of us who will insist then on its being kept, and will endeavor to hold those whose hands have been raised to Heaven to the literal fulfillment of the pledge. I have said I would rather have the pledge before we entered any war, or before we risk entering the war, and then we might be sure we never would become involved. But this little has been won in the 3 weeks of debate. It may be of consequence hereafter. Watch it, Americans.

A well-known writer, Mr. John T. Flynn, recently said in the Washington News:

"Civic groups in particular find they have utterly lost the ear and the interest of the community.

"Some of this is due to the inherent interest of the war itself. Some of it is due to the effort of propagandists to raise the fears of the American people into supposing that they are in some immediate danger.

"Everybody was geared to protect himself from propaganda from Europe. But the propaganda has been pouring upon us from America, from the Government itself.

"We have been told we are in an emergency. Then the President starts a spy scare and hunt. Then he announces that submarines are prowling off our coasts. Then he invokes the old Espionage Act. People are asked to adjourn politics. The result is that they adjourn almost everything. And thus an unhealthy and artificially stimulated war psychology is generated which operates to distract the American people from their own affairs and their own problems.

"This will be serious unless some power operates to calm the people. What power is there to compete against the Government's power to arouse and frighten them?"

And in this atmosphere and this psychology we come to our task.

We have fortunately the light of experience which may aid us in the solution of our problem. We were participants in one great World War, and the events leading up to it parallel what today the American people are undergoing. It may be necessary for us to go through the same welter with the same false propaganda, to go through the same emotional strain of 20 years ago. It may be necessary for us to learn anew the lesson of those days; but, however much the representatives of the people have forgotten, the people themselves need no second baptism to awaken their recollection. Again we are told by specious arguments and statements, without foundation, that no harm can befall us, and thus we permit ourselves by day-to-day events to be eased into a perilous position.

The great question before us is the repeal of what is known as the arms-embargo law. What is this law? It is simply an act prohibiting the sale of arms, munitions, or implements of warfare to countries at war. It cannot be too often emphasized that the embargo provision has been for some years upon the books, that it was a measure advocated by the President, and it was notice to all the world of the policy we intended to pursue. It was applicable to all nations. It fulfilled every requirement of such a law. It is prohibitory, impartial, and nondiscriminatory. The United States had determined, and in this it was supported not only by the people but by the present administration, to prohibit the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to warring nations. We decided our people would not go into the business of arms selling, and we determined there was but one way to stop it—prohibit it entirely. This has been the law for more than 4 years, enacted when we could quietly judge its merits or lack of them, during a time of quiet and peace. To repeal it now, at the instance of one belligerent is simply to do as that belligerent desires, and to commit an unneutral act. To continue the enforcement of this law is simply continuing in force a law of the land that for years has been acquiesced in by legislators and the President himself.

It is claimed by those whose sympathies are with Great Britain and France that Germany has long been preparing for this day. Let me dispose of the oft flung charge that we who oppose repeal do so because of friendliness for Hitler. I do not belong to that class. More than most men, I think, I detest and abhor cruelty in government, or government which may be directed against classes. I detest all dictators, whether actual or potential; and the difference between me and some of my fellows, who are most anxious to aid the British, is that I want to aid no nation at war. I am neither pro-British nor pro-French nor pro-German nor pro-Russian. I am simply a humble American, with my whole heart bound up in the United States, with no other love for any nation except my own, and I am deciding this question of the repeal of the embargo solely as an American. It is not very fashionable these days to be simply an American. But I have been through times like these before. With the English propaganda, with the innumerable distinguished Englishmen among us lecturing to our people and telling Americans what they ought to do, and how they ought to fight, with nearly every medium of publicity in the hands of Englishmen, there is little opportunity for an American's voice to be heard. I thank God for just common people. They know they have to bear the bloody effects of war, and with them rests the hope of America. To them I speak.

Maintaining the embargo provision of our law does not favor Germany save in a negative way. In a positive way it affects all alike. Germany gets nothing under the embargo. She will get nothing if the embargo shall be repealed, but for another reason. Germany, therefore, gets no actual benefit from the law. She gets no benefit from the embargo law at all, because the embargo law embargoes all equally.

In 1936 it was the President's clear policy that the United States should have a "twofold neutrality" and to "decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States." He then declared "through a well-ordered neutrality to do naught to encourage the contest." How different is the role he plays in 1939. He wants now by repeal to have our munitions factories working for England and France. Whence comes the mighty movement to repeal the arms embargo? Surely it cannot be to safeguard American neutrality for this was the national policy declared by the President, and yet it throws neutrality out of the window. It can have but one purpose which so often we have heard—taking sides in the war, and taking sides is not neutrality. If we are to take steps leading to war, there should be the best reasons for taking them. There should not be any acting on false assumptions and wrong premises. For a long time here the people who were insisting on the repeal of the embargo disguised their reasons, but of late many have thrown off the disguise and have made perfectly plain what stalks behind. We, poor Americans, have been subjected to a bombardment day in and day out of propaganda, and, perplexed and confused, have forgotten our past sad experience. We forget that the propaganda of 20 years ago on an emotional urge and for less worthy reasons caused us to take part in a war, and send our boys to fight upon foreign soil. They went full of enthusiasm and idealism to make the "world safe for democracy," and they won, though the world was not made safe for democracy, and we enslaved hundreds of thousands of human beings under dictatorships. Not alone this, but we found that we had to pour forth without stint of our wealth, even for the rehabilitation of countries, and then found that the recalcitrant debtors laughed at us and refused to pay their just debts. The billions that we loaned them are now upon the backs of the American taxpayers. The reasons for which we fought the war were utterly false, and we returned from it a disillusioned people. Are we about to be disillusioned again? Are our memories so short we don't recall what happened to us before? Can America afford to play that role?

The repeal of the embargo can serve but one purpose, and in Washington that is frankly and freely avowed, to have us take sides in a war to which we are not parties by "methods short of war" at first, but inevitably by methods that will make us wholly partisans.

Some Senators have said they would repeal the embargo because it would help the Allies, and that an Allied victory is in American interest. But this is a mere gamble. Such stakes are involved in the gamble that I decline to participate in it. It is a mere gamble that we can change our law so as to help one side defeat the other and yet escape the consequences of war. The gamble may be successful, but it is very speculative, and I will not gamble with American lives. Great Britain and France, because of their mastery of the sea, can obtain everything they desire save the few items in the embargo. Germany, by reason of her position, can obtain none of them. This ought to satisfy the craving for discrimination of Senators and press and internationalists.

The embargo when enacted was a people's law. It is still a people's law. The people of the United States demanded its passage, and the people of the United States should see that it is retained.

It is an American law, enacted by Americans for the protection of America and Americans.

The same old threadbare talk which lured us almost to ruin 20 years ago, was a few months ago the reason given for the repeal of the embargo. Now that we have stripped some of the pretense for this repeal, we're told the reason is to aid Great Britain and France and to destroy Hitler. But it is not our war. We had nothing to do with its making.

(1) We did not participate or acquiesce in the destruction of Austria.

(2) We were not parties to the taking of Memel.

(3) We did not sit in at Munich to destroy Czechoslovakia together with Great Britain and France.

(4) We were not parties to the terrible dismemberment of Poland.

All of these horrors were a part of the power politics played by Britain and France and Germany. We neither participated in them nor had anything to do with them. In no sense could we be said to be parties to them; and yet we are asked by one of the perpetrators who committed the wrongs—Great Britain—to come in and fight their war.

If we repeal our embargo law we're half in and half out of the war. We know from bitter experience in the past how easy it will be to shove us along until we're fully in. We'll be gently pushed about in relation to the present European war once we repeal the embargo until we're in a position from which we cannot extricate ourselves. We'll be pushed about by those wily men who play the game of power politics until they, and those who aid them in America, have succeeded in their design.

The League of Nations' partisans are very much in evidence in this controversy. No longer is it a badge of honor to belong to that moribund society, and the few who are left by artifice and subterfuge argue for repeal. Every one of them from the west coast to the east coast is taking his little part with the brilliant Englishmen who are now in this country telling us in beautiful language, soft and sweet, we must aid Great Britain, that it is our plain duty in this crisis.

The argument most frequently heard in support of the repeal is that if we do not help to stop Hitler now he will conquer Europe and we'll be the next. It is crippling to one's intellect to argue this. Yet the remark "We'll be next" echoes over the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If we were not afflicted with a war psychology we'd merely laugh at such a reason for repeal. Hitler will never conquer Europe. It has never been done by anyone yet. Countless efforts have been made to establish hegemony by force, and none have succeeded. The closest approach to it was by Napoleon; and to compare Hitler with Napoleon is absurd.

There is no danger whatever of our being next. How often were we told 20 years ago we had to fight to save democracy and had to fight for the sanctity of treaties. We were repeatedly told—do you not recall it?—that if we did not aid the Allies in stopping the Kaiser, the Kaiser would take us next. How absurd that fact seems now but it has been resurrected with Hitler's coming.

Who knows at this time what this war is about? One day we see the Prime Minister of England full of "appeasement." The next day we see him doing something else. The next day we see him courting Stalin and forgetting all the abhorrence of the Russian. Again, we find England and France "doing business" with Turkey; and contemporaneously with a very large loan to Turkey, we find them all entering into an alliance, and this was a great diplomatic victory for Chamberlain, so the English newspapers said. We do not know what they are doing with Stalin, or what he ultimately will do with them. Nobody knows. And the sinister figure of the "bear who walks like a man" may be seen lurking in the shadows.

The question resolves itself into just this: The absolute prohibition of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to all belligerents, or the sale of these in unlimited quantities to Great Britain and France. All of you know the advice of our first President, which we have preserved so well that each 22d of February his Farewell Address is read to both Houses of Congress.

Thomas Jefferson, when Secretary of State, said: "It was the solemn duty of any neutral nation to prohibit such action as would injure one of the warring powers." He added, "No succor or assistance should be given to either party of foreign wars. No men, arms, or anything else directly serving for war."

John Quincy Adams went further when he said, "Neutrality avoids the consideration of the merits of the contest."

Every one of our earlier Presidents spoke in like vein, and there was no dissent among them that we should hold ourselves aloof in a war that did not concern us, and maintain strict neutrality, and this, notwithstanding the merits of the dispute or the causes of the war. We're a strange people, impulsive and emotional. Our emotions have been aroused on behalf of one of the belligerents now, and with some it threatens to overcome their prudence and their judgment, and the strict rule our Nation has ever followed.

In the course of this debate I have received telegrams from the southern part of the State of California of like import. They read:

"LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

"Senator JOHNSON,

"Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

"You above all Senators should vote for the repeal of the arms embargo. You represent a State whose major industry is the manufacture of airplanes."

Here you find the issue boldly stated. It is demanded that I vote for the repeal of the embargo because of certain manufacturing interests that are to a large extent in the State I represent. We repeal the arms embargo that somebody may manufacture instruments of death and coin the tragic circumstances into money. As between the life of one American soldier and of the profits that could be made from the manufacture of death-dealing instruments, I choose to act for that one life. Here is the picture complete. Anyone with the slightest imagination can see it. I must vote to repeal the embargo because of the great industry in southern California, no matter what the consequences may be. Out with this sort of argument. I will have none of it.

Which course should this Nation pursue? The absolute prohibition of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to one belligerent, or the sale of these in unlimited quantity to Great Britain and France? Of course, if we think American, there is but one answer. What should decent, God-fearing people choose? Should they choose the course that would make us an arsenal for one of the belligerents or the course which makes us an arsenal for none? Should we as God-fearing, Christian people choose the profits of selling arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare, or should we choose the prohibition of the sale of weapons of death and destruction? There should be but one answer, and yet the President requires another.

In the press of Washington I have read that everything is ready for the fatal day. It is expected to reenact the days of 1917. The draft law is already prepared, and unquestionably the blanks for the casualty lists are ready. The Government, finance, industry, all are in a war state of mind, ready to accept the inevitable. Oh, my American brethren, don't wait for what Washington thinks is inevitable. Don't wait for long casualty lists to come to us. Don't be misled by expressions, "We're not going into the war"; "We'll take measures short of war." Measures "short of war" today may take us into war tomorrow.

There are other reasons why we should not take this mad step aside from the futility and folly of taking sides. I will not dilate upon its terrors and horrors of war, its maiming and crushing of human bodies, how it swallows in its maw the finest and best of those we have, and the inconsolable woe of the survivors. We need but a quickening of the memory to recall all this. Don't you realize what war will do to the United States? No longer would free America exist. There would be price-fixing, regimentation, men told at what they should work and for what; others told what they should sell, how much they could buy, and all things would follow that follow a dictatorship. Our finances would very soon reach the breaking point. No longer would democracy exist. The war would leave us after fighting to maintain democracy with none of our own. And, remember, preparations of all these things, according to the press, are being made. I cry out against it. It is not our war. We want none of it.

We have our part to play, a proud part. In our international relations, there's just one course to pursue, just one method to render real service—speak our voice, frankly and boldly, be true to our own institutions, hold to our own ideals, be fair and just to all peoples, but standing upon our own shores, remain the master of our destiny.

You may answer, I take too seriously the great risk, but wars have ever grown out of choosing the sides, and from the choice of sides has come the desire to help, and then helping as we do by selling arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare, and then full panoply, the military assistance will march to patriotic tunes. It will be at that time a mere step to sending a fleet abroad, and then soldiers. There is no occasion for us to take such a risk, and I insist that it shall not be done. Americans should help and demand of their public servants that it be not done.

And as I began I close—Americans awaken, do not risk our heritage. Take not the first false step. America keep out of war.

Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered today by the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] over the National Broadcasting system dealing with the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow citizens, the pending Pittman neutrality joint resolution was favorably reported to the Senate by its Foreign Relations Committee, of which I am a member. It has now been under discussion in the Senate and in the newspapers and in many an American home and meeting place for over a month. An hour and a half ago the Senate passed the joint resolution by a vote of 63 to 30. It now goes to the House of Representatives.

It has puzzled me greatly in following this discussion to find how often intelligent people, from the same facts, reach directly opposite conclusions. I think this is partly because there is confusion as to what the words and phrases mean which we are constantly using.

For example, we speak of the "present neutrality law" and the "proposed neutrality law," but neither of these laws has neutrality as its object. They are domestic legislation to prevent American citizens from exercising rights which they undoubtedly have under international law. The purpose of sacrificing these rights is to make it less probable that events will occur, like the killing of Americans on the high seas, which may excite the American people to go to war. The American people want peace, peace at home and peace in the world.

Again, for example, great numbers of people have been led to believe that neutrality legislation will keep us at peace. So-called neutrality legislation may help to that end, but it only helps. We Americans have the will to stay at peace, but does it follow that we will not be forced into war by some foreign power? Ethiopia and China and Albania did not want war. Do you think that the Czechs surrendered their sovereignty because they were tired of freedom? I know Poland and know that the Poles had done a marvelous piece of work since the Great War. They had resurrected a nation and united the parts into which it had been divided a century before by the great powers. They were developing this newly united country and wanted peace. I know Finland, too, and I do not believe that the Finns today are seeking war, and I hope that that gallant nation may enjoy the peace it needs and deserves.

There were other and more fundamental reasons than unneutrality which dragged those countries into war against their will, and if America is ever again at war, as I trust she may never be, I firmly believe that it will not be because she wants to attack another nation, it will be because some other nation wants something we have and decides to try and take it if she can and attacks us.

War is a terrible thing. I could not, if I would, too strongly emphasize its essential cruelty, its barbarity, its waste of life. War debases and brutalizes. It brings death and suffering, not only to the men in uniform, but to the women and children, the aged, and the infirm, who, somehow, must struggle on behind the front.

War destroys property and prized possessions. It dislocates industry and commerce. It enlists all human endeavor in the dreadful task of destruction.

And, necessarily, war curtails the liberties of the citizens. Even the best-intentioned governments, when face to face with war, must for their own defense and to insure the success of their own cause restrict or deny altogether those individual rights which, taken together, spell freedom for the common man.

Members of Congress have better sources of information and better opportunities to make use of them than private citizens, but it is well to bear in mind that the personal feelings of these chosen representatives of the people are just the same as those of the people themselves. Most of them have sons or other near relatives liable to military service in case of war, and all of them are earnestly trying not for personal reasons but for patriotic reasons to keep us at peace. They are trying to do what is best for America. And all of us must try to do the same. Let no interest in a foreign country, no matter how deep our affection for it may be, prevent any American citizen from placing our America first.

The question before us is not what course would have been best a generation ago, or what might have kept us out of the last war, or what might be of assistance if world conditions were otherwise than they are, or what might further some vague ideal. The question we must answer is: What course is now best for the security of the United States of America in a world where only force is respected?

The enactment of the present law was a sincere effort to answer that question, but later circumstances proved the answer to be mistaken, partial, and illogical. The arms-embargo provision turned out to be a help to an aggressor nation preparing to attack and a handicap to its victim when attacked. So it helps those nations overthrowing established international law and order in the world and hinders those nations which fight to sustain them. It proved to be unneutral in fact though neutral in purpose.

That law, although it forbids the shipment of arms and ammunition and implements of war to warring powers, does not prohibit the shipment to them of a great many articles which are included on every contraband list and so are subject to seizure or destruction by the countries at war. And it permits all this contraband to be shipped into war zones on American vessels and at the risk of American shippers. The law as it now stands does not require a transfer of title to the foreigner prior to shipment.

Let us suppose that a cargo, owned by American shippers, sails for a belligerent port. The ship may be sunk, American lives lost, the cargo seized, and American property taken. What would be the effect on American public opinion if this should happen? Yet current news reports telling of the seizure of the American ship City of Flint and of the sinking of neutral vessels show that this is a real and not an imaginary danger. This result is possible under our existing law—a law which, so its supporters would have you believe, is an infallible guaranty against war.

The distinction in that law between arms, ammunition, and implements of war, which are embargoes, and the raw materials and manufactured articles equally necessary for the conduct of present-day warfare, which are not embargoes, is neither substantial nor logical. There may be a sentimental difference, but certainly there is no substantial one, and whether a soldier dies because of lack of food or is killed for lack of ammunition makes little difference to the victim or to our responsibility.

I am reminded of the distinction which some well-meaning folk make between defensive weapons, which they approve as desirable, and offensive weapons, which they denounce as wicked. But is there any real difference? Take a bombing plane. If it attacks an open town it is an offensive weapon. If, on the other hand, it sinks a hostile fleet attacking our shores, surely it is a weapon of defense. And the distinction between implements of war and materials of war is certainly no more real.

The proposed Pittman law provides that no American vessel would be permitted to carry goods or passengers to warring nations. This would effectually prevent any risk to American lives or ships. Since the joint resolution was introduced it has been altered to limit the exercise by American vessels of their rights under international law only so far as is necessary to avoid obvious risks.

Next, title to all goods shipped to nations at war must pass to the buyer before shipment. That means that all transportation is at the buyer's risk.

And there would be no restriction at all on the kind of goods that could be shipped. Arms and ammunition are treated just like gasoline and cotton. But—and this is the important point—all war business would be open to all comers on the same terms, "cash and carry."

I am convinced that the pending proposals will help to keep us out of war because they avoid many of the risks and incidents which might bring on war.

To be sure, these proposals involve sacrifices, real sacrifices. We cut off all shipping to belligerents, and sharply restrict trade otherwise. We handicap our merchant marine. Temporarily we hold in abeyance our national policy of the freedom of the seas for which we have fought in past years. Yet we must make such sacrifices if we are to give to our citizens the larger degree of security which they demand, a security which we attain only by preventing the occasions which might incite public war feeling.

The proposed Pittman law is, therefore, in my opinion, clearly preferable to the law now in force. I do not question the sincerity or fair-mindedness of those who oppose these proposals. As the President said in his recent message, "The mantle of peace and of patriotism is wide enough to cover us all."

The question of permitting the export of arms under the rigid restrictions of the proposed amendments is simply a question of national security in an aggressors' world. Almost all are agreed, I take it, that our own defenses must be substantially strengthened beyond existing levels. We need not only to enlarge our Army and Navy, but also to equip them. We need not only to equip them in the first instance, but we must somehow provide that, in case we are called upon to defend this country, there may be a constant stream of arms and munitions for the use of our armed forces. This calls for munition plants not only equipped with special machinery, but also manned with specially trained workers. These munition plants must be prepared in advance. Private industry can provide them and foreign sales will make it possible for them to do so. Let us be realistic about this matter, for surely in a world where right is respected only insofar as it is supported by might, we cannot afford to neglect our defenses. When houses around us are being robbed, it is no time to let our own burglary insurance lapse.

But it is suggested, we should not change our law now that the war has started. This argument comes illogically from those who assured us, only a few months ago, that there was no occasion for amending the law then, because there would be no war. Furthermore, they themselves now wish to amend the existing law by adding new provisions of their own. And on the merits the objection is not substantial. To change from one to another form of nondiscriminatory legislation, which we conceive to be more in our own national interest, is surely no proper concern of any belligerent. I certainly cannot concede that Congress is under any legal or moral obligation to refrain from legislating for the duration of the war merely because some of the nations at war may not like our legislation.

Some over cautions people argue that we must do nothing even within our rights to offend any warring country. Let me ask you whether the victors in the present war will regard with more respect a cowardly United States than a courageous one? If we run away from our responsibilities, if through fear we fail to protect our own interests, we shall be fair game for any aggressor. This appeasement policy has its limits, as we have seen in Europe. Let us not forget that the United States is a first-class power, potentially one of the strongest if not the strongest in the world. Let us therefore act like one in protecting our interests.

And now, one final thought. The proposals which I am supporting tonight are still in process of being debated in the Congress. They are subject, as they should be, to full and free discussion. But after such discussion, especially in times as critical as the present, there comes a time when further talk is mere obstruction, impeding the democratic processes of representative government. Our democracy is built on the principle of majority rule: After discussion, we vote, and after a vote we abide by the result. Any delaying of that vote past the time when action is imperative is a blow at the very foundations of our Government. Let us not give color to the claim of totalitarian governments that democracies are inefficient. And surely in these troublous times, when the lights of free institutions have been either extinguished or dimmed elsewhere in the world, we will not countenance here in America anything to cast doubt on the ability of representative government to function in a crisis, and to enact into law the decision of its duly constituted majorities.

Washington Teachers' Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JERRY VOORHIS OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. JERRY VOORHIS, Representative from California, before the Washington Teachers' Union on the 17th of this month.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Throughout the length and breadth of America tonight there are millions of people who are afraid. They are afraid because they have no assurance that tomorrow or next month or next year they will be able to provide through constructive labor a decent living for themselves and their families. They are afraid because the American Congress has not yet had the wisdom, courage, or patriotism to solve the economic problem of poverty in the midst of plenty. Upon the solution of that problem—and it will not solve itself—depends the future of democracy in America.

Teachers must help solve it. They must be free to help solve it. And the children they teach must be free to think about it, too. For God has given to the American people very rich gifts, and unless we use them well and for the benefit of all our people, His judgment must certainly rest upon us.

The teacher's job is twofold: First, to prepare the youth of America to live in the world as it is. In this field fall all phases of vocational education, training in all the tool subjects such as mathematics, English, and the like, and the teaching of the basic facts regarding history and government of our country. Second comes the job of preparing youth to live in the world as it ought to be and of inspiring young people to build that better world. In this field come all the arts, most of the studies about the peoples of the world, their history and cultures, literature, and the social sciences.

In a dictatorship only the first kind of teaching can be done. The last word in human development has been spoken by the dictator. It is for teacher and pupil alike to follow that word obediently. Let us work to the end that this may never happen to the schools of America.

I know no better organization to do that job than unions of school teachers, banded together to see to it that they may be allowed to do their job better and better as time goes on. But in these teachers' unions there must, I am convinced, be no trace of control by any regimented group which is itself committed to an authoritarian philosophy. Even as we want to keep our schools free to work forward toward that better America in which we all believe, so we must see to it that the teachers' unions are always free to follow whatever policy is best for American teachers, American schools, and the American labor movement in its broadest sense. This they cannot be in any case where the influence of people whose primary allegiance is not to America or her schools or her teachers is strong.

In seeking to defend democracy we must be careful that we do not destroy its fundamental principles. All people in America have a right to differ from the majority opinion. They have a right to criticize the Government. They have a right to question the economic order. It must be so or we lose some of the most essential things in American democracy. In all that I have to say tonight I want it distinctly understood that I am pleading only for understanding, knowledge, and true freedom, and I am not talking about suppression or denial of constitutional rights to anyone. But we can I believe devise ways and means of putting an end to foreign domination of the actions and consciences of people in America and we can, I believe, require that all organizations seeking to influence American public opinion give full publicity to their memberships, aims and purposes, financial transactions, and methods of propaganda From that point on we must depend on the good sense of the American people.

There are some things I believe we must frankly face. I have an abiding faith in the strength of American democracy. I do not believe it is going to be destroyed either by conquest or by war or by boring from within. I think the size and extent of really subversive movements has been exaggerated and I know there has been a tremendous lot of irresponsible name calling. But having said all that, I hasten to add that we would be foolish indeed not to realize that the menace of continued financial feudalism in America is real, that the Nazi menace within the United States is real, and that the Communist menace within the United States is real. I speak not as an alarmist who sees Nazis or "reds" under every chair and table, but as a citizen of a democratic nation who does not wish to see our liberties impaired either by the conduct of groups fundamentally opposed to our national democratic tradition or as a result of a hysteria which the very presence of these groups may produce in this country.

We have at present in America certain forces which must be understood and fairly combatted. These are the Communists, under direct and full control of a foreign government, and the Nazis, under direct and full control of a foreign government. I object not to the economic views of these groups, though I differ with them; but I do object to their doing the bidding in America of foreign dictators. I think that is bad, serious, a real menace. To talk about a united front under these circumstances is, I believe, to counsel defeat for true democratic progress. Then there are those persons who call everyone a Communist who differs with them and who believes in a social program of any kind, and those, on the other side, who call everyone a Fascist who disapproves of the dictates of the Communist Party line.

From these incongruous, incompatible sources there is grown a concert of discord. They all will contribute alike, if we let them, to the unmaking of America, to the disruption of democratic government, to the destruction of the institutions through which democracy must be preserved, and our American life made better.

Each group needs some attention. We had hoped that when the alliance between Russia and Germany was concluded that the evident hypocrisy of both dictators would destroy their camp followers in America. To some extent this is happening, but we were wrong in thinking it would be complete. Now, to the loyal Communist, Germany is not the enemy nation; but wicked England and France are. And to the bund members has gone out the word to let up on calling Communists bad names and to center the attack on the American Government itself.

The Committe on un-American Activities has shown that the Communist Party is essentially a branch of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, that the German-American Bund is loyal to Hitler first and America afterward, that each of these organizations has cleverly spread its influence to other organizations most of whose membership doesn't realize that this has happened. The committee has also shown that on the basis of a psychology of fear and hatred, self-seeking individuals have made a very good thing financially out of fake organizations and movements purporting to combat communism and to be saving America from some menace or another.

Few people realize, however, how very much false and exaggerated lists of alleged Communists or "reds" help out the real Communists. When Mrs. Dilling compiled a so-called list of "reds" and included in it Senator BORAH; Harold Swift, of Chicago; Lorondo Taft; Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt; Mahatma Ghandi; Glenn Frank, of the National Republican Party special committee, Ramsay MacDonald, and hundreds and hundreds of others like them—all lumped together, living and dead—lumped them with a few real Communists, like Lenin and Trotsky, Browder, and Foster, and their followers, she actually laid the groundwork for the most serious threat that today exists to the effective work of anyone attempting to work against the real Communist movement.

She made an attack on real Communists appear ridiculous in the eyes of some of the best people of this country, for she made it possible for real Communists to say, "What, me a 'red'? Sure, I am listed with Swift and Glenn Frank and Senator BORAH."

In my opinion the real battle for America and all she stands for will have to be fought by the people in the ranks of labor, in the churches, in the various mass organizations of the country. We need more and truer religion divorced from any trace of either race or religious prejudice or fear of championship of the cause of the poor. We need a stronger labor movement not a weaker one. And we need more organizations of our people for good causes of every sort. So while we are combatting Communist or Nazi domination of any of our organizations we must realize one more group of enemies. The Tom Girdlers, the silent forces behind the Associated Farmers, and others who exploit workers and attempt to keep them divided for their own gain. Like the Mrs. Dillings they are the best friends the real Communists have. For they make recruits faster than any Communist organizer can possibly do.

To you as teachers I would especially speak, first, because your duties and responsibilities in this matter are great; and, second, because I, as a teacher, want to share those responsibilities with you. To you as members of the teachers' union I want especially to speak because I am a member of the teachers' union.

I believe in the teachers' union as one of the most effective means of preserving democracy in and for our schools. I believe in the teachers' union because it takes the teacher out of the limit of academic walls and places him in the community, where he must function if he is to be a successful teacher.

I am proud of the record of the teachers' union. From 1916 it has fought for the best ideals and traditions of our country; fought courageously, constructively, effectively. Tenure, pensions, salaries, abolition of child labor, care of the health of children, decent school buildings, a practical social curriculum are matters in which you have worked—worked well. I congratulate you—us—may I say.

Tonight I want to congratulate this local—Local 8—for its contribution in the three mighty big fights:

1. Local 8 was the only teacher organization in the United States which fought actively for the repeal of the Sumners amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill in 1926 and had that un-American provision repealed—the law which, in effect, could have prevented the teaching of the theory of evolution, of comparative history, and of American political history.

2. Local 8 of the American Federation of Teachers was the first teacher organization in the country to open fight against the "red" rider in 1935 and it fought until that un-American piece of legislation was repealed.

3. Local 8 was one of the first teacher groups in this country which opened a vigorous and intelligent fight against attempts at Communist domination of the American Federation of Teachers.

Since 1935 this local has made a splendid fight, often against great odds, to rid this country of the treacherous tactics of the Nazi bund and the Communist Party. I congratulate you on your vision and your courage. More power to you.

I hope I have made myself clear. In a word, what I want to leave with you is this warning. Don't be misled by those who tell you there is nothing threatening to the institutions of America in the regimental organizations dominated by foreign powers like the bund and the Communist Party. Both are real things, and don't be misled either by those who try for political or monetary gain to charge everyone who opposes them or tries to improve the lot of the American people with being Communists, Fascists, or Nazis.

The Church and the Underprivileged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4) 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered at the National Conference of Catholic Charities in Denver, Colo., on Sunday, August 6, 1939, entitled The Church and the Underprivileged.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A convention of the leaders and workers in the Catholic Charities of America assumes a special significance in these times of political and social distress among peoples in other parts of the world. Throughout all its history the church has been a courageous and steadfast custodian of the light of charity. Fierce struggles and bitter materialistic forces have not prevailed against it. In humanity's hour of deepest despondency the church has held up the light to illumine the hearts and minds of men, and to guide them once more toward peace and good will. That light and that guidance are needed in the world today. This convention is a signal to distressed peoples everywhere that the light still shines and that the church still holds it forth.

Equally significant is the fact this convention is held in the land of a free people. Just as the world looks more than ever to the church for spiritual guidance, it turns also to our own country as the protector of the sacred principles of democracy. There is a direct relation between political freedom and the charitable activities of an unoppressed church. The loss of a people's right to govern themselves most often follows a denial of the right to worship, and the loss of religion means a renunciation of charity. This is the most disastrous effect of totalitarianism. It not merely beclouds the minds of men—it also smothers their souls. Peace among nations is not only threatened—men and women themselves become cruel and selfish. Neighbor is set against neighbor—blind passions are aflame—persecution is rife—and charity dies.

In magnificent contrast to such catastrophes, we meet here to renew the work of our church in all the communities of our country. That we are permitted to assemble under the auspices of our own religion—that we are privileged to give expression to the principles of our own faith—is the great blessing of America. The broad program for Nation-wide charity to which, by this convention, we again dedicate the church, is our response to that blessing—one of our contributions to the enlightened land in which we live.

The close association of charitable activities with religion is characteristically American. Catholic charities flourish best in this country because it is recognized that the church is the proper agency for translating a spiritual virtue into effective action. The charities undertaken by other churches also flourish here. No one could live, as I have, in a typical city of New England without learning to appreciate the collective value of the charitable activities of all religions. In such a city the Jewish, Protestant, and Catholic charities function side by side, and out of that common effort arises a better community and a more harmonious spirit among the people.

That is as it should be. Charity can be the exclusive virtue of no single group, and I know of no religious group against whom one would charge a lack of charity. On the contrary, I know well of the innumerable good things that all churches have done in the name of charity. Religious persecution, even religious prejudice, cannot survive a common interest in charity. Even during periods of temporary conflict in this country no religious group has been denied the right and opportunity to foster and promote charity among its own members. The day will never come in America when the people of any faith will be denied the sacred prerogative of performing the corporeal works of mercy.

Out of this association of charity with religion comes a widespread popular support of charitable activities. This is especially true of Catholic charities. Not only are more men and women enlisted as actual workers than at any previous time in the history of the church, but also the entire body of Catholics in this country are unified in their charitable undertakings to an extent hitherto unattained. This unity of purpose suggests, I believe, a growing social consciousness among our people—a realization that in a complex modern world the function of charity is to provide broad and comprehensive adjustments rather than to give particular and isolated assistance.

We know too well that the obligation of charity no longer can be discharged by tossing coins to beggars in the streets. The job of charity today goes far beyond casual almsgiving. What is needed now is a broad program carefully planned and effectively coordinated to uplift the entire Nation, to root out the festering defects that lie beneath the surface of our communities, and to rebuild the structure of living on sounder values and better social foundations.

In this great work of reconstruction the church will play a decisive role, because the major task is to give spiritual significance to the American way of life. The mad rush for material riches which so characterized the wild and speculative era of the 1920's was bound to be disastrous. It ignored the eternal truth that wealth alone can make no person truly happy and no nation truly great.

During the past 10 years we have witnessed unprecedented changes in our whole social and economic structure. These changes were so rapid that it was difficult for us to keep pace with them in our thinking and planning. Even now as one travels the country he finds that large numbers of people are leaving the land and drifting into industrial centers to further burden the labor market. Plantation owners in the South and Southwest can no longer engage the same number of tenant farmers—not even one-half the number—they have employed in the past. Everywhere one hears of large surpluses of agricultural workers. In many States they are the most important element in the unemployment situation. We find that the development of certain types of large-scale farming in the United States has brought about a great increase in the number of migratory workers. The Farm Security Administration estimates that there are some 350,000 such workers, who with their families make up a tremendous army of people none too happy. These folks are constantly on the move. It is impossible for them to maintain normal standards of home life. They suffer severe wounds and constant worry.

We have in a number of communities in the United States great groups of stranded industrial and mining populations. This is in part due to the changing locations of industries and to a diminishing demand for certain types of products. While many of the people in these centers have, with characteristic American initiative and ingenuity, adjusted themselves to the situation by finding new outlets for their talents and labor, there are many for whom there is yet no outlet excepting employment on Government projects.

In every industrial center there is an increasing mechanization and acceleration of industrial processes. The factory, like the farm, no longer requires the same number of workers to turn out the same amount of work. Machinery has cast men into the vortex of strangling unemployment. We need God's help to find the solution to the problem, and His help is certain if we undertake and carry to a successful conclusion a much-needed program of spiritual rearmament. He has endowed us with an everlasting free will, but has taught us by way of His own suffering and sacrifice that earthly and eternal happiness are available through the practice of charity, mercy, and brotherly love.

As in other times in human history, we find that the changes of these recent years have brought some development of ideologies that are completely at variance with the American tradition and way of life. We find these ideologies a threat equally to government and religion. False prophets are taking advantage of the sufferings of the people, and because men feel neglected we sometimes find a faltering faith. Those who indulge in the pagan practice of preying upon the distress of the poor are a challenge to every person who believes in the sacredness of the home, in the inviolability of religious beliefs, and in the fundamental principles of democracy. They are a challenge to the church and its agencies of charity, and compel us, for social and economic reasons as well as to earn the favor of God, to maintain close contact and sympathy with the underprivileged. They are a challenge to the Christian spirit of charity and of service. They create the demand for spiritual rearmament. They show us the way to work out our eternal salvation and earn a place amid the everlasting beauties of eternity.

The industrial changes of the past decade have created welfare problems that are unprecedented in American history. First and foremost is the problem of unemployment. This has ever been a problem of an industrial civilization. Even during that period which seemed to be one of great prosperity, we had as many as two and one-half million of our people unemployed. The present problem of unemployment is not due merely to the ordinary ups and downs of the business cycle. It is due to fundamental changes in our whole structure of industry and agriculture.

Next in importance to the problem of unemployment is that one of the terrifying insecurity of old age. This problem has been aggravated by natural hazards to which working people are exposed during the years when they are contributing their physical and mental energy to the benefit of our national economy. It is accentuated by the economic losses due to ill health and by the failure of many workers who have passed their summertime of life to secure employment. When industrial conditions were fairly stable, the workers devoted their lives to one industry and lived in one community. The changes of recent years have dimmed the light and hope of many people just past 40. New industries, and old industries located in new areas, have preferred younger people. The whole process has led to the premature superannuation of large numbers of industrial workmen.

Ill health is a continuing threat to a great class of our wage-earning population and reduces many families to poverty.

In our struggle with the perplexing questions of unemployment and old age the American people must not overlook the particular problem of dependent childhood. For more than a hundred years the care of the underprivileged child has occupied the center of the stage in our welfare programs. The Catholic people have devoted more of their resources to the care of children than to any other form of charity. I am sure that this interest in the underprivileged child will continue to occupy the greatest space in the hearts of all of those engaged in Catholic charity work. The child is the hope of the future. Neglected children of this period would grow up to plague each other, and the Nation, in another generation. Radical movements concentrate on children and young people. Leaders of such movements know that the young are flexible and can be molded more easily. Thus the need of a continuing provision for the religious and material well-being of underprivileged children.

The changes of the past decade have brought the problems of security against the industrial hazards of life to our attention in a very dramatic way. Within a few years we have become social-security conscious. That is why there has been rapid progress in social-security legislation. Though it is as yet far from perfect, we have, through the Social Security Act of 1935, set up a Federal-State system of old-age assistance under which grants are now being provided for 1,838,359 aged persons in this country. We have not yet attained our ideal in our old-age pension system, but we have made progress. In the Social Security Act we have established a national system of old-age insurance which will soon begin paying benefits to nearly a million people. The plans further add to this old-age insurance program a system of survivor's insurance providing protection for the widows and children of forty-odd-million insured persons.

The Social Security Act has also provided a system of unemployment compensation which in the past 2 years has tided nearly 3,000,000 people over temporary unemployment.

In the social-security program our Government has made provision for mothers with dependent children, for crippled children, for the blind, and for the physically incapacitated. There has been a great expansion in the public-health facilities of the various States and local communities. This program presents a great challenge to leaders and workers in Catholic charities. You have had a better chance of acquainting yourselves with this program than any other group in the country. You are giving a great part of your lives to the welfare of the people whom this legislation is designed to serve. Those who are entitled to security benefits, as well as the people as a whole, look to you for guidance in the sound administration of the program.

While so much is at stake in the life of the Nation, you must not be satisfied with limited and isolated programs. You must consider it a part of your duty to maintain close contact with the entire public program. It is your responsibility.

The bitter lessons of the depression have been well learned. We know that to rely solely upon machine-made prosperity is to place the happiness and security of most of our people in jeopardy. We know that when the momentum of the machine is increased it runs roughshod over the lives of men and women. Ten years ago the efficiency and versatility of the productive forces in this country amazed the world. We were hailed as the harbingers of a new era—and we basked in the glory of our superiority. It was only when our marvelous machine had become stalled that we realized how superficial had been its accomplishments. We were the wealthiest nation in the world, yet millions of our own citizens were uneducated, undernourished, and poorly housed. We proudly proclaimed our billion-dollar enterprises, but we were blissfully ignorant of the fact that more than half our people faced advancing age with no assurance of security.

We confidently announced that poverty had forever been banished, when the very machine economy we hailed was taking away the jobs of our citizens. We know now the fallacy of our earlier ways, and we are resolved that the America of tomorrow will lead the world, not as the country with the most riches but as a nation of enlightened and happy people.

The first step in this remaking of America is already under way. It is to reconstruct the status of our fellow citizens who have not yet had the full advantages of the living that America should provide.

The program already espoused by our National Government is directed toward the elimination of the chief obstacles in the lives of these underprivileged Americans. But the more important work must be done by the church. The Government can improve living conditions—but it remains for the church to reconstruct the lives of these Americans. We want not merely better homes—we need better families. Security in old age from the anxieties of material want is a laudable goal for governmental action—but we need also the inspiration and example of elderly men and women whose lives have been good.

The most impressive governmental program to improve the conditions of the poor would be empty and ineffective, unless there were added to it the priceless ingredient of spirituality. That is why the church's program for social action, as represented by this convention, is important to America. The people themselves have already decreed that the program for aiding the underprivileged will be backed by all the resources of the Nation. It remains for the churches to give to that determination the spiritual guidance that will raise it to a holy crusade for justice.

How heartening it is to see in action at long last a government dedicated to the principle that it is the function of the state to rescue its citizens from the misfortune and insecurities of modern life. We Catholics should be proud that the traditions of our church, and the action of our own charities, have prepared us to join in this crusade. The encyclicals of our pontiffs have defined our obligations to our underprivileged brethren. These definitions are wholly compatible with the purposes of our Government. If the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow finds himself more definitely a part of the government of his country today, he has attained the dignity which the teachings of our religion have always proclaimed for him.

If the poor, the sick, and the afflicted, see new hope in the America of tomorrow, it is because at last in this country the principles of charity have become the platform of national policy.

Thus it is that humanitarian government in a free nation moves jointly with the flowering of religious teachings. Thus it is also that our own church, with other churches, finds new opportunities to fulfill its ageless mission of charity. To this work, we, as Americans, and as Catholics, rededicate our energies and our activities—and to the new and enlightened America, where none is persecuted because of race or religion, where none is oppressed by class or by dictator, and where all are exalted by renewed faith in the goodness of man, we pledge our allegiance and devotion.

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by Col. Theodore Roosevelt over the Mutual Broadcasting System on October 16, 1939. I wish particularly to call to the attention of the Senate these statements from Colonel Roosevelt's speech:

Make no mistake, if you take the first step you must take the last. Make no mistake, many of those who are urging the first step upon us mean us to take the last as well.

No one is threatening our peace under the embargo as it stands. In the name of peace, therefore, why should we change it? Our Ark of the Covenant is our American representative government. It will be destroyed if we engage in war. I believe we should retain the embargo.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A grim war is tearing Europe today. Our attitude toward it will determine the future of our Nation. It is, therefore, the duty of every American, particularly those in power, to use one yardstick to measure their decisions, and that yardstick must be the welfare of the United States and her citizens.

We can be sure that if we don't look after our country, nobody else will.

I have no patience with those who are always thinking of the interests of other people and neglecting the interests of our people. They urge us to fly to the defense of London and Paris. Who is there in Europe who would fly to the defense of Boston or Chicago?

Many in this country are covertly or openly urging us as a nation to take sides in this war. The majority of people urging us to war-like acts are well-meaning. The premises from which they reason, however, are entirely wrong.

One group is those who have not become at heart American and who have a divided loyalty. This type is well illustrated by a man who told me a few days ago that he was 75-percent English.

All belonging to this group are thinking crooked, because they are not thinking of America but of other countries.

Next there is the group that says that we must be prepared to go to war to defend other democracies.

This is wrong also. Our mission is to defend our American democracy.

Some 22 years ago, with 2,000,000 other young Americans, I went to a war in Europe. We were told it was a war to make the world safe for democracy; a war to end wars. I, for one, believed this. Theoretically we won the war. The condition of the world is a bitter commentary on the value of our victory. Not only did we gain nothing for the world, but we hurt ourselves and damaged our own democracy.

Our Ark of the Covenant in this country is our representative democracy. It was shaken by the last war. I do not believe it would survive another. The reasons are clear. During a war we should have to adopt a dictatorial form of government. The economic chaos following war would rivet that dictatorship upon us.

We would not make the world safe for democracy any more than we did in the last war. We would merely ruin ourselves.

Another argument used by the people who believe we should take sides in the war is that if England and France were defeated, Germany and Russia would be hammering at our shores immediately. This type of individual is apt to voice the old cliche that it is the British Fleet that is standing between us and Germany. Nothing of the sort is true. The British Fleet is standing between England and Germany. If it did not exist, we would still be perfectly capable of defending ourselves and South America. Our fleet, not England's, is standing between this hemisphere and Germany. Any military or naval man knows that the farther a unit operates from its base the infinitely weaker it becomes. It would be an impossibility for a navy less than two or three times our strength to attempt to engage our vessels near the shores of our Nation. Obviously, this being the case, such a thing as an expeditionary force to attack us is unthinkable.

We tend to fear that which we do not know. Therefore many of our people have been misled into believing that fleets of airplanes could assail us. They could not. If we control the seas no enemy can establish air bases on this side of the ocean. They would have to attempt to fly to our country from great distances. The farther from the base an airplane operates, the more ineffective it becomes. Airplanes could not take off from a great distance and arrive in this country carrying sufficient bombs to injure us and sufficient fuel to return to their bases.

Not only is this the case, but the power of airplanes has been greatly exaggerated. General Fuqua of our army inspected a large munitions factory near Valencia after the Spanish civil war. He checked the record which showed airplanes dropped 5,551 bombs on the plant that covered eight city blocks. Only 21 hit, only 6 did real damage, and none caused the plant to shut down.

Neither Franco in Spain nor the Japanese in China were able, with control of the air, to destroy railroads that were vital to their plans.

With the Atlantic and Pacific to bulwark us, we can defend ourselves from aggression either from Europe or Asia, and we can defend South America as well.

Then there are those Americans who say, "I don't want to get into war, but I am sure we will be dragged in eventually." This is trash. There is no reason whatsoever that America need be dragged into war, providing she makes up her mind that she will not be.

What is more, if we go in now we will be permanently entangled in Europe and will never be able to shake free of her bitter, ancient feuds. We will be caught like a fly on a flypaper.

I say our attitude must not be that "we hope we can keep the United States out of war." It must be that we intend to keep the United States out of war.

Personally, I am not afraid to fight, but I am afraid to have the American people fight.

We must not go to war. Nobody wins a war. The victor loses as well as the vanquished.

So much for those who wish us to engage in the conflict or who believe that we cannot help being engaged in the conflict. I believe them in the minority. I believe that the great majority of the American people feel as I do, and wish us to maintain peace. The problem, therefore, is how best can we maintain peace.

The law of the land today is the so-called Embargo Act, prohibiting the shipment of munitions to all belligerents. There is under consideration a measure abolishing this act and substituting for it the so-called cash and carry. The cash and carry in its essence means that we will accept orders from anyone who will pay us spot cash here in this country and transport the goods themselves.

I believe that some of the proponents of this plan are those who would like to see the United States profit through orders for munitions. I believe, however, that by far the largest number of its backers represent individuals who wish to help England and France. Some say so honestly, as Senator NORRIS did. Others say so by inference, as Henry L. Stimson did. Still others merely say they believe it to be the best way to maintain peace. I believe we should maintain the embargo.

I do not believe we should change to cash and carry because I believe by adopting the cash-and-carry plan we are moving one step toward being involved ourselves.

Lincoln said this country could not exist half free and half slave. It could be said with equal truth that we cannot as a nation be neutral and partisan at the same moment. We must be either one or the other.

What is more, if we start being partisan we have started down the road that leads to war. One step invariably leads to another. It is impossible to limit objectives. We theoretically will start by selling for spot cash, then the cash will run out and our customers will demand credit. All those who are making money will then demand that credit be extended. We can see this already in the 90-day-credit provision suggested.

We as a country will be geared up to furnish the munitions. Soon we will find that the nations buying munitions owe us a very large sum of money, and we will be told that the only way to make our debt good is to help them further. In that fashion we will gradually be edged over the precipice.

I call on history to prove my point. We disapproved of Germany's actions in 1914, as we disapprove of Germany's actions today. At the beginning of hostilities England and France endeavored to arrange credits in this country. The national administration hesitated to give approval, stating that we wished to maintain a strictly neutral attitude. Eventually the administration conceded the point. The credits were granted. Then came the question of the sale of bonds. Again we went through the same formula, and again eventually the administration conceded the point. As late as 1916 President Wilson won his election on the slogan "He kept us out of war." All through this procedure we were assured as each step was taken that we had as a nation no intention of going further, certainly not to the extent of declaring war. In spite of this, only 6 months after the election had been won on the slogan I have cited, we declared war.

At that time we were assured by President Wilson, who was undoubtedly sincere, that the war could not involve American troops; merely our Navy would be used. However, we soon found ourselves with more than 4,000,000 Americans under arms, and half of that number overseas. Make no mistake; if you take the first step you must take the last. Make no mistake; many of those who are urging the first step upon us mean us to take the last as well.

No one is threatening our peace under this Embargo Act as it stands. In the name of peace, therefore, why should we change it? If it needs modification, let us modify it, but let us stand by the principle. Our Ark of the Covenant is our American representative government. It will be destroyed if we engage in a war. If we preserve it, we will be a beacon toward which other nations may struggle from the mires of tyranny. If we lose it, the light will have gone out not only for this country but for the world.

Seizure of American Ships

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK EVENING POST OF OCTOBER 26, 1939

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the New York Evening Post on October 26, 1939, headed "As the Crow Flies," by Ernest L. Myer.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Evening Post of October 26, 1939]

AS THE CROW FLIES

(By Ernest L. Meyer)

This is no time for headline skimming. People who depend on headlines for a fair appraisal of the complex issues involved in the war abroad and our relation to that war will gain an estimate which is highly distorted.

The seizure by the Germans of the American merchantman City of Flint is a case in point. Headlines splashed the news. It seemed sensational. It seemed unprecedented. It seemed an act of near piracy committed by a government for which we have, and with all justification, no liking.

It was only by assiduous reading into the long body of the story, however, that another fact came to light. The Maritime Commission official at Washington, who confirmed Germany's seizure of the United States vessel, admitted—after questioning by reporters—that "the British Government was at present holding four or five American-flag merchant ships, three of them reportedly in the English Channel."

SUPPRESSION BY STRESS

And here is the amazing aspect of the case: The seizure by England of "four of five American-flag merchant ships" was not even announced by the Maritime Commission or any other agency in Washington. But when one American merchant ship was taken by the Germans the news made screaming headlines.

The headlines will be remembered. The casual "follow-up" story of Great Britain's holding of five American vessels will not.

This is not a case of actual news suppression. Yet it might be called a kind of suppression by stress. That is, by exploiting sensationally one angle of the story and subordinating the other, the act of Germany stood out as a heinous and unique offense.

This type of suppression is extremely dangerous. It operated to draw us into the last war. What stands out in memory is the Lusitania case and the German submarine "schrecklichkeit." What we forget is that Great Britain destroyed more neutral trade and confiscated more American property than did the Germans. What we forget is that up to our declaration of war Germany torpedoed only one American boat, the Gulflight, with the loss of American lives.

We forget these facts because the newspapers of the day did not stress them, and it takes impartial history a long time to catch up. And the newspapers of our day are falling into the same pattern. Thus headline skimming yields but a distorted picture of events, and you who are interested in remaining neutral must dig deep for neutral news.

"THIS IS MY WAR WORK"

This distorted picture is abetted by word of mouth as well as by the press. The Dies committee has made much of Communist and Nazi propaganda peddlers in America. Mr. Dies demands their registration, to which no one can object. Very well, then why not also register propaganda peddlers like Alfred Duff Cooper, former First Lord of the British Admiralty, who has arrived here for a lecture tour?

Mr. Duff Cooper is here as a recruiting sergeant for the Allies and to try and nudge us into war. He has not said so in so many words, but his wife, the former Lady Diana Manners, who came with him and will accompany him on his tour, was asked whether she was doing any war work. She laughed and said: "This is my war work."

It is charming that she can laugh it off. We can't.

EDITORIAL FROM EXTENSION MAGAZINE

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of an editorial written by Managing Editor S. A. Baldus and published in the November issue of the Extension Magazine, on the subject of neutrality, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the portion of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Extension Magazine of November 1939]

THE TIME HAS COME

On October 2 Senator Pittman submitted the House Joint Resolution 306, entitled "Neutrality Act of 1939," to Congress. It is known as the administration bill, and in it are incorporated the views and wishes of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull. The President has called Congess into extraordinary session for the specific purpose of enacting the bill into law.

It is possible that before what is written here appears in print, action, favorable or unfavorable, may have been taken by Congress. But even so, discussion of some of its essential features is opportune and important, for I do not recall any bill in the past 25 years that had so many fateful implications for the American people; nor a bill that contained so many confused points—so many angles, so many contradictions, so many obscurities and "twistifications." Needless to say, I cannot enter upon a discussion of the bill in its entirety; I can at most touch briefly on a few of the more vital points.

To begin with, the President and the Secretary of State have declared that if the Pittman bill becomes law it will keep the United States out of the present European war. That may be their honest belief, a belief from which it is my privilege to dissent. Nor am I alone in this dissent; for a formidable number of Senators and Congressmen are on record as being opposed to the bill, basing their opposition on an equally honest belief that the Neutrality Act of 1939 instead of keeping us out of the European war will inevitably help to put us into the war. For, if the truth must be told, the bill offered is not a neutrality bill; its apparent motive and undisguised purpose are to enable the United States to aid and abet the one side (Great Britain and France) as against the other (Germany and its potential allies). There can be no doubt on that score, for the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the author of the bill and its proponents have practically admitted this; and, had I the time, I could advance an overwhelming array of unneutral actions and utterances that would prove this conclusively.

WHAT IS NEUTRALITY?

In international law neutrality is defined as "the complete abstention of a state from giving material aid or encouragement to either belligerent in an existing war. Legally, a neutral state is a friend to both belligerents and endeavors to maintain peaceful relations with each * * *."

"Among the obligations of a negative character resting upon neutrals may be mentioned the duty of abstaining from furnishing money, ships, troops, or munitions to either belligerents * * *." (The New International Encyclopedia.)

How do the commentators on international law define neutrality?

Let it be understood that I am not posing as one deeply versed in the subject of international law. I have some volumes dealing with the subject in my library, and every now and then when a question arises which makes it necessary that I consult such books I give whatever time I can to their perusal and study. Thus I have gone over some of the volumes of John Bassett Moore, LL. D., who is rightly considered one of the ablest and most scholarly American commentators on international law. I have before me as I write volume VII of his monumental Digest on International Law. This one volume alone contains 1109 pages and is an exhaustive treatise on all questions involved in the present "neutrality" legislation: War, maritime war, contraband, blockade, neutrality, etc.

Another work that has intrigued me is the Treatise on International Law, by L. Oppenheim, M. A., LL. D., Whewell professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, a member of the Institute of International Law and honorary member of the Royal Academy of Jurisprudence at Madrid. The volume before me as I write is volume II (710 pages), entitled "War and Neutrality" (2d ed.), published in 1912. (I understand that a later edition (revised) has been published. But, even so, I prefer the earlier work, for the reason that it was written before the League of Nations tried to create a new world order and establish new principles of international law.)

Oppenheim's definition of neutrality makes a nice distinction between international law and international politics:

"Such states as do not take part in a war between other states are neutrals. The term 'neutrality' is derived from the Latin neuter. Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality adopted by third States toward belligerents and recognized by belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial States and the belligerents. Whether or not a third state will adopt and preserve an attitude of impartiality during war is not a matter for international law, but for international politics" (p. 361). (Italics Oppenheim's.)

"The question of remaining neutral or not is, in the absence of a treaty stipulating otherwise, one of policy and not of law." (P. 362.)

(Parenthetically, it may be stated here that much of the confusion that has arisen over the subject of neutrality could be cleared up if, instead of prating about international law, we would call the thing by its right name—"international politics." That is the crux of the whole question and should be insisted upon by all debaters.)

Generally speaking, in international law, the act of supplying arms and munitions of war to the parties to an armed conflict is considered an unneutral act. The following few passages from John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law not only stress the unneutrality of selling war materials of whatever kind to belligerents, but also set forth that individuals engaging in such traffic place themselves beyond the pale of the law and forfeit the protection of their governments.

"The supply of materials of war, such as arms and ammunition, to either party to an armed conflict, although neutral governments are not obliged to prevent it, constitutes on the part of the individuals who engage in it a participation in hostilities, and as such is confessedly an unneutral act. Should the government of the individual itself supply such articles, it would clearly depart from its position of neutrality. The private citizen undertakes the business at his own risk, and against this risk his government cannot assure him protection without making itself a party to his unneutral act. * * *

"Says Kent: 'The principal restriction which the law of nations imposes on the trade of neutrals is the prohibition to furnish the belligerent parties with warlike stores and other articles which are directly auxiliary to warlike purposes.'

" 'If the neutral (government),' says Woolsey, 'should send powder or balls, cannons or rifles, this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from a neutral position * * *." (vol. VII, p. 749).

THE ARMS EMBARGO

The pivotal point of the Administration's "neutrality" bill is the sale and shipment of materials to belligerents. Under the present neutrality law the President is required to place an embargo on the exportation of arms, munitions, and implements of war to nations at war with each other. He wants the embargo removed. Lifting the embargo and substituting what is popularly called a "cash and carry" plan (or, as the Pittman bill provides, credit and carry) would theoretically leave the United States free to sell war goods, not only arms, munitions, and implements of war, but all kinds of materials and accessories entering into the conduct or pursuit of a war, to both belligerents. Actually, and since we know for certain that only one of the belligerents could, or would under existing conditions, buy such goods from us and carry same home in its own ships in comparative safety—it requires no stretch of the imagination to see that the whole proposal is a rather one-sided arrangement.

But waving that aside, assuming for the moment that it were possible to sell successfully to both belligerents, where does that leave the President, who has repeatedly declared that he hates war, and that he wants to travel the road that leads to peace? May I remind the President that the road that leads to peace is not strewn with dragon's teeth? I find it hard to understand how one can proclaim himself an apostle of peace and in the same breath insist that he be free to send arms, munitions, and implements of war to both (or, more accurately speaking, to one) of the belligerents. It doesn't make sense.

* * * * * * *

CASH AND CARRY

One of the provisions of the present (Pittman) bill is to sell anything, including arms, munitions, implements of war, materials, and accessories to any belligerents on condition that the parties involved pay cash for the goods purchased (even giving them 90 days' credit) and carry the goods purchased away in their own ships. It is to be observed here that the legislation called for by the Pittman "neutrality" bill (to enact which the President convoked Congress into extra session as soon as the present European war had begun), specifically covers definite belligerents—namely, Great Britain and France on the one side, and Germany (and potentially Russia and Italy) on the other. We will sell to both these warring groups, says the bill, in effect; we will not discriminate; therefore we claim that we are neutral.

But actually, as it would work out, and as the President and Secretary of State well know—only one side (Great Britain and France) would be in a position to take advantage; and therefore we will be unneutral.

This seeming distinction could be argued at great length, for which, however, I have neither the time nor the space. Instead I choose to quote a few relevant paragraphs from Oppenheim's International Law:

"The duty of impartiality must prevent a neutral from supplying belligerents with arms, ammunition, vessels, and military provisions. And it matters not whether such supply takes place for money or gratuitously. A neutral who sold arms and ammunition to a belligerent at a profit would violate his duty of impartiality, as also would one who transferred such arms and ammunition to a belligerent as a present. This is a settled rule so far as direct transactions regarding such supply between belligerents and neutrals are concerned" (p. 426).

Again:

"If a state remains neutral, it violates its impartiality by furnishing a belligerent with troops or men-of-war. And it matters not whether a neutral renders such assistance to one of the belligerents or to both alike. Whereas Convention V does not mention the furnishing of troops to belligerents on the part of neutrals, article 6 of Convention XIII enacts that 'the supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever, is forbidden'" (p. 389).

Again:

"Since neutrality is an attitude of impartiality, it excludes such assistance and succor to one of the belligerents as is detrimental to the other, and, further, such injuries to the one as benefit the other. But it requires, on the other hand, active measures from neutral states. For neutrals must prevent belligerents from making use of their neutral territories and of their resources for military and naval purposes during the war. This concerns not only actual fighting on neutral territories, but also transport of troops, war materials, and provisions for the troops, the fitting out of men-of-war and privateers, the activity of prize courts, and the like." (P. 362.)

"Neutrals in their own country may sell to belligerents whatever belligerents choose to buy. The principal exceptions to this rule" (I shall state only the one exception which is ad rem) "that neutrals must not sell to one belligerent what they refuse to sell to the other * * *." (John Bassett Moore, vol. VII, p. 1108.)

Now under the proposed "neutrality" legislation we declare ourselves ready to sell to both belligerents; knowing, however, that only one belligerent can take home the goods bought from us.

* * * * * * *

WHY?

Why, then, if it doesn't make any difference one way or another; if, whether we pass or do not pass the Pittman so-called "neutrality" bill, Great Britain and France (keeping the present war in mind) will be able by hook or by crook to avail themselves of our resources and stores of goods, should anyone be opposed to the legislation demanded by the administration?

To that question there are several answers:

* * * * * * *

To my way of thinking, this is the most important point at this time: If we enact the Pittman bill into law it is equivalent to serving notice on one of the belligerents in Europe (Great Britain and France) that we are on their side. It will encourage them to continue the present war, confident that, at the crucial moment, we will come to their help by sending an army to help them crush the aggressors—which, by that time, may be not only Germany but also Russia.

Our best contribution to peace in Europe is to let Great Britain and France know that they need expect no help of any kind from us. And this we can do by keeping the embargo on the shipment of all war materials of whatever kind.

By insisting that the embargo be lifted and that we adopt a "cash (or credit) and carry plan" President Roosevelt is like a man who, holding a flaming torch in his hand, rushes into a powder magazine to look for a leak in a gas pipe. That sentence may sound screwy, for it is more than likely that there are no gas pipes in powder magazines. But I will let it stand, because it conveys the idea of an inevitable and terrific explosion—and that's the one thing I want to emphasize. An inevitable and terrific explosion!

Democracy

ARTICLE BY DAVID S. MUZZEY

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, so much has been said during the course of this debate about freedom of the press, democracy, and various other matters, that I desire to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Prof. David S. Muzzey, professor of American history at Columbia University, which was published in the New York Times Magazine of January 22, 1939. The article is entitled "All Is Not Lost in the Fight for Democracy."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times Magazine of January 22, 1939]

ALL IS NOT LOST IN THE FIGHT FOR DEMOCRACY—THE DAWN WILL COME, SAYS A HISTORIAN; AND THE MORE WE HAVE FAITH, THE SOONER IT WILL BREAK

(By David S. Muzzey, professor of American history, Columbia University)

The score of years which have passed since the armistice and the Treaty of Versailles, that vain attempt to found lasting peace on the basis of injustice, have been a dismal period in the history of mankind. Repeated honest efforts of men of good will to substitute cooperation for conflict, order for confusion, and a sense of security for persistent trepidation have been thwarted at every turn. Disarmament conferences have degenerated into "fencing matches" between the participating nations, each of which has been bent on gaining the maximum concession to strengthen its own position in the struggle which they all speak of as hypothetical while they really believe it to be inevitable. Engaged in an enterprise ostensibly to encourage peace, they have actually been concerned with their preparations to meet war. The result has been the constant enlargement of armies and navies, with a fivefold increment in military expenditures since the pre-war days.

Primarily to buttress their military strength, the nations have adopted "autarchic" devices as destructive of President Wilson's third point, the removal of economic barriers to international trade, as the feverish military programs are destructive of the fourth point of reducing national armaments to the lowest level consistent with domestic safety. High tariff walls, import restrictions, quotas, embargoes, currency manipulation, and similar short-sighted interferences with the free flow of goods and credit have wrought havoc with international trade and finance, in an era in which the autarchic nation is as anachronistic as the feudal manor. Science, technology, rapid communication, mass production, and the demand for ever-widening markets have made of the world a vast economic complex in which political isolation can only react as a boomerang against the nation which attempts to practice it.

Obviously, we are facing a crisis. But facing crises has been the lot of man ever since civilization began its long, painful, and oft-interrupted upward march from the Paleolithic age. If the present crisis seems "so particular" and fateful to us, it is because we are living in the first half of the twentieth century and not in the days of confusion and welter of impredicabilities which followed the break-up of Alexander the Great's empire, or in the darkness which descended upon the world with the eclipse of Roman power and civilization, or amid the devastation of the Thirty Years' War in Germany, or in the troubled years when liberal Europe lay prostrate and paralyzed under the iron heel of the Corsican tyrant.

Naturally, the evils with which we have to grapple loom more portentous than those which we read about in history, just as the girding for an impending conflict dims the memory of an accomplished victory. This is in no wise to minimize the seriousness of the present crisis. We must face without blinking or burking the dismal facts: the Treaty of Versailles sabotaged; the fourteen points erased; the League of Nations flouted and deserted by nation after nation; democracy derided by its foes and doubted by many of its friends; the ideal of collective security yielding to an intensified reliance upon national self-sufficiency; international trade and finance thrown into utter confusion; hate, greed, persecution and war erected into avowed and boasted national policies; instead of a world made safe for democracy, democracy desperately seeking to make itself safe in the world.

It is not the purpose of this article to enter into competition with the hordes of writers and speakers who are advocating specific political or economic policies for the remedy of the distressing situation in which we find ourselves, or to discuss the relative merits of the conflicting policies advocated: Cooperation or isolation; neutrality legislation or Presidential prerogative; reciprocal trade pacts or the most-favored-nation principle; nationalization of the munitions industry or immunity of the "merchants of death" from Government interference; the "quarantining" of pestiferous nations or the drawing of a "cordon sanitaire" around our own.

These are all problems of great moment, and we must all agree that they demand the deepest thinking of the most enlightened leaders that we can find and follow. But, leaving on one side these highly important questions, let us direct our thought to an aspect of the present situation which has received far too little attention in the excitement of voices crying lo! here and lo! there, but which nevertheless is of fundamental import for any concrete plan or policy advanced, namely, the moral effect of the present crisis on the American people.

Some years ago the eminent philosopher Alfred N. Whitehead used the phrase "the climate of opinion" to define the mental and moral atmosphere in which a given society lives. That atmosphere for the present generation has been a miasmic one, propagating the germs of pessimism and defeatism. One scarcely meets a man who is not a prey to gloom and fear.

The burden of our dinner conversation is the hopelessness of the present outlook. Impending disaster is accepted with a fatalism tempered with a reluctant sigh, and we "speak of the coming war as of the coming winter." Our courage dwindles, in the simile of Lord Morley, to a puny hope that things may be better, shivering beside the gigantic conviction that they are bound to be worse. The contagion of pessimism spreads like a scourge of influenza or cholera, or, in the words of an old Greek philosopher, "like contagion among sheep."

The multitude, unfortified by the prophylaxis of calm reason or historical perspective, falls into the fallacy that we are living in the worst possible of worlds. They talk freely of the "return to barbarism" and the "collapse of civilization." They do not read Spengler, but they are nevertheless unconscious disciples of the prophet of the "Decline of the West."

Yet no set-back, however serious, to any particular diplomatic démarche or project of political reform or economic recovery is so disastrous as the weakening of faith in the worth whileness of the effort. For faith, which is but another name for courage, is still "the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things unseen." If the infection of a conforming cowardice is allowed to spread to those whose talents mark them for leadership, instead of the courage of the latter communicating itself to the people at large, then we shall indeed take the downward path. Above even the sore need for wise counsel in the present crisis is the need for a courageous spirit. All great ages, said Emerson, have been ages of faith. For faith, or courage, is creative, while despair is always destructive.

Nor is this faith mere pollyanna-ism or wishful thinking, except it be divorced from a frank recognition of the realities of our situation and an honest effort to better that situation. "Faith without works is dead," because it is out of work that faith is born. When value is denied to human endeavor all other values turn to naught, desire fails, and the grasshopper becomes a burden.

History offers us many a sad example of such let-down in social morale. Take, for instance, the period following the death of Alexander the Great (already alluded to), to which Prof. Gilbert Murray applies the apt slogan of "the failure of nerve." The Greeks inaugurated the age of reason with the Ionian physicists and the Attic philosophers, dramatists, and historians, confident that the secrets of Nature, the duty of man, the model structure of the state, and even the attainment of the divine harmony of the good, the beautiful, and the true were to be found through the assiduous cultivation of the intellect.

Their creative work in the centuries from Thales to Aristotle is a priceless heritage and "an everlasting possession." But, when their creative faith bogged down into the Hellenistic Age, reason gave way to superstition, fickle Fortune was enthroned as a goddess, the standards of culture and the canons of art were debased, and there followed one of those dips in the curve of human progress which have always waited for upward rectification upon the recovery of social morale.

Here let us not allow our tendency to rationalization to tempt us to put the cart before the horse and confuse cause and effect. Our history textbooks speak of the barbarian invasions, for example, as a cause of the fall of Rome, whereas, in truth, the fall of Rome—its loss of civic virtue, its social corruption, its financial demoralization—was the cause of the barbarian invasions. So individuals and nations lay the flattering unction to their souls that their failure are due to the very circumstances which their own moral apathy has engendered.

Can any sane man doubt today that the depression under which we have been suffering for a decade is no visitation of inscrutable fate, but the predictable (and, indeed, sporadically predicted) result of an orgy of materialistic intoxication, ruthless exploitation, and reckless speculation that will forever brand the nineteen twenties, for all their bull markets and boasted conquest of poverty, as one of the most disgraceful decades in American history? The pendulum swings from the fatalism of inevitable progress to the fatalism of irremediable disaster; and both are equally unjustifiable by the experience of history and corrosive of the supreme human function of an intelligently directed will. Life is conditioned, to be sure, but it is not fated. Every moment, no matter how heavily weighted with the inheritance of past follies, is a new start. And it is not only a myopic but a craven attitude to let the follies of the past paralyze the courage and initiative of the present.

Let us face the worst. What has been done is irrevocable. Not a line of the past can be erased. Manchuria, Ethiopia, Spain, China, Austria, Czechoslovakia—the dismal record is there. But it is due to the ignorance, timidity, and faithlessness of men that we are afflicted with our present evils, and, by the same token, we shall be delivered from them by the wisdom and courage of men.

If the prospect for peace looks dark, there is all the more call for redoubling the efforts for peace. If our complicated economic and social structure puts a heavier strain on the girders of democracy, that is no reason for abandoning democracy, but the most cogent argument for strengthening the girders. We believe that, with all its faults, democracy is the best form of government that the world has known, and the only one that holds the promise of the free development of human personality and the realization of the great society of peaceable and progressive nations.

Certainly we are not going to abandon the noble experiment of democratic government at the bidding of bullies, who have no more understanding of what democracy really means than to call it, as Hitler does, "a ludicrous chicken farm where everybody cackles," or to shout with Mussolini that "the plain truth is that men are tired of liberty," and that the restless and hardy youth of today want to "pass over the decayed corpse of the Goddess of Liberty" to "order, hierarchy, war, and glory." That is not "the plain truth," but an outrageous lie, devised to throw dust in the eyes of the multitude, so that they may blindly follow the "pied pipers of hysteria" and servilely support the inordinate ambitions of tyrants.

Now just because life is conditioned (though not fated) a certain amount of adjustment to the conditions facing us is necessary. Ideals may, and should, move in the upper air of theory; but policies must be devised and executed to meet the complex situation of the moment. Hence we have to do many things, from a short-time point of view, which, from the long-time point of view of our ideals, we disapprove and deplore.

Compromise is a word of unpleasant connotation; but Lincoln was a wiser leader than Garrison in a former great crisis of our Nation. To take the most conspicuous example of this enforced compromise, we vote a war budget of a billion dollars, while we abhor war as a relic of barbarism. At a cost which would go far toward stamping out the white plague or furnishing comfortable houses for people who live in hovels, we build a battleship which is destined in a score of years for the junk heap. From the point of view of our ideals it is sheer folly; from the point of view of the conditions with which we are confronted it is a stern necessity.

Is the situation, after all, as bad as the prophets of gloom and doom would have us believe? Is the crisis worse than many a former one through which mankind has fought its way back to sanity and progress? Are there not assets in the present situation which we have overlooked or minimized in our preoccupation with the serious liabilities?

In the first place, the United States and those nations of western Europe which still strongly hold to the principles of democracy and freedom far outweigh in economic and military resources the dictatorships east of the Rhine. It is not in the countries which have had a long experience in democratic rule that the totalitarian tyranny has prevailed, but in lands where the irresponsible autocracy of czars, the stiff politico-military discipline of Hohenzollerns, and the clamorous pseudo-parliamentarianism of an always disunited Italy have kept the people from developing their capacities for self-rule.

Moreover, no country enjoying a fair amount of economic prosperity and security has given itself over to the mercy (or the mercilessness) of dictators. They are the product of misery, jealousy, bankruptcy, and desperation—adventurers whom civil disorder and social confusion have thrown to the top to strut for a brief time as heaven-sent deliverers. If history has any lesson at all, it is that their day will be short. Even wise Thales, more than 25 centuries ago, declared that one sight the world would never see was "a tyrant growing old."

Napoleon, with more political and military genius in his little finger than the "sawdust Caesars" of today have in their whole body, lasted about 20 years. When the first cracks appeared in the edifice of despotism which Napoleon had raised, the people from Spain to Russia rose to demolish that edifice and send its architect to die in exile on the barren island of St. Helena. Drunk with power which breeds ambition for more power, he had dared to challenge the historic process of the emergence of political, religious, and economic liberty out of the bondage of feudal proscription and royal absolutism. For all his great gifts, he failed; and are we to believe that his feeble imitators, fighting with the noble weapons of purges, persecutions, confiscations, concentration camps, and castor oil, will succeed where he failed? Histrionics against the majestic march of history.

Finally, even if the situation were 10 times worse than it is, we should not despair. Defeatism will get us nowhere. To throw in our hand and quit the game is sheer cowardice. "If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars." Who knows how soon the dawn may succeed the dark? At any rate, it will be the sooner the greater the number of courageous souls whose only fear is that fear may seize their people. A Washington and a William the Silent could lose every battle and win the war. If we cannot have the superb courage and endurance of such as these, we at least can have the pluck of Milton's Satan, who surveyed his fallen host and cried, "What if the field be lost, all is not lost."

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

STATEMENTS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two statements on the question of neutrality made by me at different times and published in the press during the time the joint resolution has been pending before the Congress.

The first is entitled "Who Urges Repeal of Our Neutrality Law?" The other is entitled "The Background of Our Neutrality Law."

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO URGES REPEAL OF OUR NEUTRALITY LAW?

The most serious question confronting the United States since our entrance into the World War is now awaiting imminent official action. It is: Shall we repeal the arms embargo provision of the present neutrality law and thus permit the sale, by American manufacturers to the belligerents now engaged in war, of death-dealing materials and instruments of destruction?

I have received thousands of letters from all over the country on this all-important question. The overwhelming portion of them urge me to oppose war and every possibility of war; others urge me to favor the repeal of the present neutrality law.

Those who support the continuance of the present neutrality law and who oppose any change therein insist that we mind our own business, keep aloof from the war in Europe, and avoid every possible contact with the belligerents that even remotely would tend to involve us.

They admit having strong sympathies, but insist that the interest of America and the protection of American youth is paramount to every other consideration. This is my position.

THREE ARGUMENTS

On the other hand, those who urge the repeal of the present neutrality law, invariably give expression to at least one of these reasons for their position.

First, hatred of Hitlerism, the basic practices of which appear to be so abhorrent to believers in the American system.

Second, an obligation upon our part to help England and France—in brief, to stand by the alleged democracies in Europe.

Third, German success in the present conflict might result in Germany waging war against us later.

The first two reasons advanced clearly indicate a state of mind subordinating American interest to prejudices and sympathies, which, in the minds of those urging them, obligate this Government to interfere in the rivalries and hostilities of Europe. The third reason, namely, that we will be forced to fight ultimately is easily answered.

Instead of getting involved in European war, let us build up our Army, Navy, and air force and be fully prepared to defend ourselves against any eventuality that may follow at the end of the European war, or at any other time.

PROFIT VERSUS BLOOD

There is another group, powerful and determined, advocating the repeal of the arms-embargo provision which at present prohibits traffic with belligerents in arms and munitions. It is to be noted that under the present law trade in all supplies and commodities, other than actual weapons and materials of war, is not forbidden.

Their theory (entirely ignoring the certain gains in our trade in South America and many other neutral countries because of the inability of the European belligerents to supply these markets) is that America will profit financially by booming business and stock-market inflation which are certain to follow the lifting of the embargo, and we should do this even though it involves the danger of our getting into war.

This position is best expressed in the phrase, "Let's take a chance." It is clearly playing with fire. It is the tipping of the scales downward that measures the sufferings, sacrifices, and slaughter of Americans as against the lure of profits inuring to American industry from the sufferings, sacrifices, and slaughter in Europe.

ORGANIZED PRESSURE

This organized pressure, already widespread, to repeal the neutrality law which we passed for our peace and protection in 1937 before the present law is not new.

It was strongly urged in order to enable us to assist the Loyalist cause in Spain by those whose sympathies were with the Loyalists. It has been urged during the conflict between Japan and China, though the operation of the neutrality law for some undetermined reason was never invoked in that war.

Who can doubt that repeal is now being urged to take sides in the present war in the same sense that it has been urged in previous wars and revolutions, declared and undeclared?

It is appropriate to point out that the repeal of the arms-embargo clause is not being urged at this time by our youth or their fathers and mothers. For the most part it is being sponsored by persons beyond the war age, who write me fervent pleas to favor the so-called democracies by enacting legislation to permit traffic in death-dealing instruments.

Some of these do not conceal their true intentions by mere professions of sympathy but actually insist that our country enter the war at once to save democracy. We heard these same pleas before, much to the sorrow of the mothers, fathers, sisters, and brothers of more than 50,000 American boys who were butchered in the last European war and hundreds of thousands of others who returned from that holocaust wounded, disabled, and shell-shocked.

The position this group advocates means, if the law is repealed and honestly administered, not only that we are in imminent danger of involvement in this present war, but also that every powerful nation in the world may rely upon our assistance at any future time against the aspirations of the weak in their struggle against the tyranny of the strong. It means that we are willing, for the sake of financial gain or attachments for selected countries in Europe, to participate directly and indirectly in the sale of arms and munitions in every bloody war which henceforth shall be waged in the world.

Apart from the present conflict in Europe, if my views could prevail, I would forbid the sale to any people, any country, at any time, of death-dealing instruments of war. It would be a fine example of peaceful intention and of our concern for world humanity. In other words, our arms and munitions should be solely reserved for our purposes of self-defense, but not available to any power to promote the shedding of blood elsewhere in the world.

VOTE OF CONGRESS

The present neutrality law was enacted by a vote of 63 to 6 in the Senate and 376 to 13 in the House, and was signed by the President.

This was the sentiment of Congress when it was free from propaganda and concerned solely with American interest. I have resisted every attempt to repeal this bill, and repeal has never been sought except when efforts were made to have us take sides in some war which did not concern us.

I shall continue to resist repeal of the arms embargo because I hate war and because I am striving to think more of the happiness of American fathers and mothers and of the lives of their sons and the protection of our democratic institutions than I am of the horrors and sufferings today afflicting Europe, lamentable though they be, or the profits of the industrial and financial interests of America.

INTENSELY OPPOSED TO OUR ENTRANCE

I can conceive of no cause existing now in the world, or likely to arise in the future, except one actually necessary for the protection of our own shores and homes, which warrants the sacrifice of American youth.

I am unalterably opposed to war for any purpose save our own self-defense. If it is an offense for a public official to stand forthright for America first and for the protection of American blood and the preservation of our happiness and freedom above everything in the world, I am prepared to take the responsibility for my avowed and unswervable determination to do all in my power to keep the country out of war.

I am convinced that a vastly overwhelming portion of the American people are intensely opposed to our entrance into the war.

When they come to realize that the repeal of the arms embargo is the first step in our involvement in war, as I sincerely believe it to be, a wave of public opinion will flood Congress with protest.

Only precipitate action by the Congress before this antiwar sentiment is adequately expressed will permit the repeal of the arms embargo.

THE BACKGROUND OF OUR NEUTRALITY LAW

Too little has been said about the background of the present neutrality law. Since 1936, committees of Congress have held hearings for weeks during three different sessions and have consulted the best authorities in the country on international relations.

These hearings largely dealt with the various phases of the risk of involvement in wars between belligerent nations.

This study, it is to be noted, was made when the country was absolutely free from propaganda, and we were interested solely in America avoiding war.

TWO COURSES TO WAR

It was clearly demonstrated that any of two courses of action by our country would certainly lead to war involvement. First, an acceptance by the United States of world moral responsibility; and second, the conviction on the part of the American people that the avoidance of war by us was impossible.

Those who accept either of these views are already advocating our participation in the present war—disregarding the fact that the United States has consistently refused to participate in any international scheme that might lead to the point that war would result as a possible eventuality.

Necessarily serious consideration was given to the European in contrast with America's world position. In Europe, nations invariably claim to enter into war to protect their domestic welfare.

The United States has no European problem such as overpopulation; it has no desire to obtain natural resources necessary for self-sufficiency and national defense; it seeks no colonies; no longing to revenge ancient rivals. None of these European ambitions concern us and that is why our domestic welfare prompts us to avoid war, and by a rigid policy of neutrality avoid involvement.

UNITED STATES FREE FROM COERCION

The United States because of its relative physical security is almost alone among the world powers to keep itself free from coercion to join its foreign policy to that of any other nation. The situation in Europe is very different.

European nations have been forced to make alliances and agreements under special conditions. Not confronted with the pressure that exists in Europe, the United States has avoided international alliances and agreements.

Though European nations may have no choice between war and peace, the United States' geographic position and nonalliance policy protects it from ever going to war except when attacked.

The sole question before Congress during these years was, What should be the conduct of American foreign relations when other nations are fighting?

What course of action should American determine in advance that would best preserve peace for us when other nations were at war? After this study, the Congress decided in the interest of peace to establish a neutrality law with rigid restrictions.

The purpose of the restrictions was solely to reduce the possibility of Americans becoming involved through the growth of commercial and financial ties with belligerents.

CONGRESS PASSES ACT

To accomplish this purpose with scarcely an objection from the country the Congress almost unanimously passed a neutrality act embodying an embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war. It set up a code of regulations on trade, transportation, and financial transaction between the United States and belligerent nations.

The provision of this Neutrality Act, when and if invoked by the President, applies equally to all parties of the conflict.

The temptation to join hands with friendly and favored belligerents was to be avoided and also the temptation to prevent the establishment of a close community of interest with the warring nations.

Congress had fully in mind that one of the greatest tests of our neutrality policy would involve a European war in which nations particularly friendly to us would be engaged.

It has been well known for years that any war of major proportions in Europe would be expected to involve nations with whom America had long established friendly and commercial relations.

It was well understood and known that the maximum pressure for participation of the United States in the European war would be exerted if particularly friendly nations to us became belligerents.

The very situation that exists today was foreseen and understood and seriously considered when we undertook to define our policy of neutrality.

Furthermore, it was well recognized that an effective neutrality policy could not be accomplished by the United States without industrial, commercial, and financial costs. Congress after weighing all costs—the cost of keeping out and the cost of going in—almost unanimously decided the cost of human lives, human suffering, and human sacrifices far outweighed the cost in possible monetary losses.

This is the background of our neutrality law made in anticipation of just what has occurred and to protect us against the present war propaganda.

COST OF WAR

Consider in more detail the cost attached to a policy that will keep us from being drawn into a general war in contrast with the cost of war.

We have seen, due to our own experience in the World War, what the cost is when a nation is drawn into a general war. The spectacle of what is taking place in Poland today demonstrates the suffering entailed by war.

The damage to society because of the loss of human rights, to say nothing of the economic and social maladjustment, is tremendous.

Conscription of men and materials in the event of war would completely change the status of labor and capital; private property rights of every kind would have to be revised; all industry would be nationalized; increased taxation and inflation would be inevitable, both during and after the war.

The realization of these human and inhuman costs is why the people of America were and are determined never to go to war, except for purposes of self-defense.

To avoid this stupendous cost, Congress believes that all possible measures to resist war should be put into effect before a crisis appears.

We are now dealing with a crisis that has actually developed, and it is now proposed that we repeal the measures heretofore made to resist our involvement.

A neutrality policy deals not with impartiality but with a peaceful nation's conduct with belligerents. The present issue, therefore, is whether or not we shall nullify our views and decisions made for our peace in time of peace and embark upon the old and unrestrained course of foreign relations that leads to war, and thereby become an economic basis of supplies for one of the European belligerents?

We seek peace for ourselves and the world. We desire in every possible way to discourage injustices and aggression.

A strong and genuine policy of neutrality, however, prevents any commitment that may in some circumstances lead to war. Unlike European nations, America does not accept war as inevitable.

OF KANSAS

EDITORIAL BY VICTOR MURDOCK

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Victor Murdock in the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle. Mr. Murdock served with distinction in the House of Representatives from Kansas; still later he was a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I believe he states the fundamental things involved in the pending neutrality legislation in a nutshell; and I recommend his editorial to my colleagues.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Morning Eagle]

AMERICA, STAY OUT!

(By Victor Murdock)

Many citizens are now mentally following this formula largely without giving it expression: (1) We must keep out of this war, (2) the way to keep out is to stay out of it completely, (3) inevitably we will find ourselves in it.

How can America deliver itself from this defeat of so evident a desire?

It can do so by keeping itself as remote as possible from the conflict and reducing to a minimum those provocations which can plunge America into it.

America, by its very temperament, cannot be wholly neutral in thought. It never has been that in any contest and it will not be so in this.

But America can insulate itself physically from this conflict and America should.

Threatening the preservation of that insulation there can be one fatal step. It is the first step. That step is in following the fallacy that America can get into the war a little bit and not get in head over heels.

The way to keep out and stay out is to let the existing neutrality law, with its embargo, strictly alone. That law in 1937 passed the Senate 63 to 6. It passed the House 376 to 13. The President signed it. It was not Democratic. It was not Republican. It was American.

It was enacted in the belief that Europe's wars are not our wars. The belief is just as well-grounded today as it was 2 years ago. America won the last war and got the worse of it. It can win this war and again get the worse of it. Good sense, morals, material well-being, and devotion to the principle of democracy all sound the signal: America, Stay Out!

Keep America Out of War by Repealing Arms Embargo and Substituting Cash and Carry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON, OF TEXAS

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my address made over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co., Sunday night, October 29, 1939, from Washington, D. C., as follows:

I am grateful to the National Broadcasting Co. for the privilege of speaking to the people of the United States upon a subject in which they are vitally interested—the preservation of peace and the prevention of our involvement in foreign wars.

The Congress of the United States has been in session since September 21, having been called into extraordinary session on that date by President Roosevelt to enact legislation for this purpose. The Senate has acted. After 5 weeks of debate, during which the subject has been discussed from every angle, every avenue of thought having been explored and every suggestion, fantastic and otherwise, analyzed, debated, and considered, the Senate has, by a vote of 63 to 30, over 2 to 1, passed a measure which, in their deliberate judgment, is best designed to keep our country out of war.

The measure now comes to the House for its consideration. We are hopeful of early action by the House. Under the House rules, which restrict debate while the Senate does not, no bill consumes as much time in the House as it does in the Senate. With a House membership more than four times larger than that of the Senate, if unlimited debate were permitted in that body the enactment of legislation would be almost impossible. Then again the neutrality bill does not come to the House as an original measure. We passed it in the House at the last session of Congress, after a prolonged debate, and the Senate has simply amended the House bill and consideration in the House now will be restricted to a consideration of the changes made in the bill by the Senate.

Furthermore, during this special session of Congress, while the Senate has been debating the bill, speeches have been made almost daily in the House upon the subject, and further prolonged debate there is not required. While the House leadership promises liberal debate, it is our hope that within a week's time the measure may be finally passed and become a law.

It is imperative that early action be taken, since the war is now raging in Europe and we have only a partial neutrality law in effect at this time, for the reason that on May 1 a major portion of our neutrality law expired. We now have no law, such as we did have prior to May 1, regulating the sale and shipment of commodities other than arms and ammunition and implements of war to warring countries; and we have no law now, such as we did have prior to May 1, by which American ships could be regulated and prohibited from carrying goods to nations at war.

If the present partial neutrality law is not changed or amended, the United States is certain to be in this war, and that within a very short time.

President Roosevelt is to be commended for acting promptly on the outbreak of war in Europe by calling Congress into special session to pass an adequate and a complete neutrality law to safeguard in every way our interests and to prevent our involvement in the war. It is not the fault of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull that such legislation was not passed at the last session of Congress. If Congress had passed such a bill at the last session of the Congress, as President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull insisted and urged that they do, there would have been no necessity for this session of Congress, and there is a possibility that there might have been no war in Europe at this time.

The House did pass a neutrality bill on June 30, though in an imperfect form, but the Senate failed to consider it. The bill which passed the Senate Friday night is in many respects an improvement over the House bill. While many of its provisions are identical with the House bill, four material changes were made:

(1) The Senate repealed outright the arms embargo, while the House bill, under the Vorys amendment, only repealed it in part.

(2) The Senate eliminated from the House bill the provision giving the President discretionary authority to except from its operation loans for a period of not more than 90 days, and also the so-called short-time obligations customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions, and prohibited outright, without exception, any person within the United States from purchasing, selling, or exchanging securities or other obligations of a nation at war, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such warring government of any character whatsoever. The 90-day loan feature caused a great deal of adverse criticism, and its complete elimination from the bill will, I am sure, receive public approval.

(3) The House bill had no provision whatever with reference to regulation or control of American ships, while the Senate bill contains a provision making it unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or commodities of any kind to any nation at war.

This provision is most essential, and without it incidents are likely to arise at any time which will involve us in war. The American people are incensed at the recent seizure of the City of Flint, but if the provision I have been discussing had been the law this incident would not have occurred, for the City of Flint was an American vessel carrying cargo to a belligerent country, which is prohibited under the pending bill.

(4) The "combat area" section, authorizing the President, when he finds that the protection of our citizens so requires, to define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful, except under such regulations as may be prescribed, for any citizen of the United States, or any American vessel, to proceed into or through any such combat area.

Our entry into the last World War did not arise from the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, but from the sinking of our ships, causing the death of our citizens and the seizure and confiscation of property of our people upon the high seas, and the law as it now stands makes no provision to prevent a repetition of these happenings.

Before our entry into the World War German submarines sank or attacked 28 American vessels, and 8 other American vessels were sunk by mines, with a loss of 70 lives. Hundreds of other Americans lost their lives while traveling as passengers upon the vessels of belligerent nations, and a vast amount of goods belonging to Americans was sunk upon vessels other than those under the American register. It was the loss of lives upon the sea and the destruction and sinking of our ships and confiscation of the property of American nationals which so inflamed the passions of our people that our Government became a participant in that great war.

Under the pending bill American citizens are prohibited from traveling upon vessels of a belligerent nation, and Americans are prohibited from selling goods of any kind to belligerents, unless the title of all such goods shall have been transferred before their shipment so that if the ship is sunk or the goods are lost no American citizen will suffer any loss or have any claim in the matter, but the loss will be that alone of the foreign countries who bought and paid for the goods.

They talk about the ocean being our defense. It is a barrier and a measure of defense, but it is also the cause of our involvement in European wars, since every foreign war in which we have been a participant, save only the War with Mexico, has arisen due to some incident occurring on the ocean. What we are trying to do in this legislation is to remove the causes by which our citizens may lose their lives, their goods, or their property so that we can keep out of the war.

The Senate bill should also appeal to those who have heretofore opposed neutrality legislation on the ground that it vested too much discretionary authority in the President. No neutrality bill was ever considered by Congress that conferred as little discretion on the President as does the pending bill. To substantiate this statement, I call attention to the following:

(1) Existing law confers upon the President alone the right to determine that a state of war exists before neutrality legislation can be invoked, while under the pending bill either the President or Congress by concurrent resolution may determine that a state of war exists and neutrality legislation be invoked.

(2) Section 2, or the so-called cash-and-carry provision of the law, which expired on May 1, left it discretionary with the President whether or not such provision should be invoked, and this was true both as to regulation of American ships and also the transfer of title, but the pending bill provides that when the President finds that a state of war exists, or Congress so finds, the inhibition against American ships and the transfer of title shall automatically go into effect, and it is not required that the President shall find the need for such restrictions, as was the case in the law which expired.

(3) As I have already pointed out, the Senate bill eliminates the discretion under existing law, and in the House bill, whereby the President, under the credit section, could exempt short-time loans and could permit loans for the period of not more than 90 days under regulations which he might prescribe. The pending Senate bill vests no discretion whatever with the President in regard to loans and credits, but makes same automatically in effect whenever the neutrality law is invoked.

But opponents of the legislation say that it is bad because it repeals the arms embargo. It does. It repeals the embargo on arms and treats all commodities alike. It treats all countries alike. We agree to sell to all countries—to England, to France, to Germany, to Italy, to Russia, and to all countries on the same terms—that is, that they transport their own goods and deliver them themselves. We have no interest in it, and our ships shall not carry such goods, and our people shall have no interest in the goods while they are being transported on the high seas. This is the so-called cash-and-carry plan. It was first suggested many years ago by the lamented Will Rogers, who was not only a great philosopher but one who possessed an abundance of sound common sense.

As he expressed it, "If warring countries want our goods, let them come and get them, put the money on the barrel head, and take them home themselves."

The opponents of the legislation say that you must not repeal the arms embargo, for if you do, it will get us into war, but I have yet to hear any of those who make this assertion give a satisfactory reason why the repeal of the arms embargo will get us into war.

Those who think that an arms embargo alone to belligerent nations will keep us out of war have not given thoughtful consideration to this subject. I assert that the retention of the arms embargo will not keep us out of war, and its repeal will not get us into war. If countries regarded only arms, ammunition, and implements of war as contraband, then there might be some logic in saying that they must be embargoed and treated differently from other commodities. The law of contraband we all know; that is, if a neutral nation ships articles designated as contraband to either belligerent, the right of search and seizure and confiscation rests with the other belligerent. Under the old-time definition contraband was defined as arms, implements of war, and navy supplies. That was absolute contraband. Then there was a conditional contraband, but in time of war we have learned that law does not determine or rather control what is contraband. The nations at war make up their own lists of what they say is contraband, and if they have the power to enforce it, it is effective, regardless of international law. During the World War the countries engaged in that conflict had lists of articles of contraband, which covered practically every commodity, and I have before me a statement which I secured from the State Department, reproducing what was furnished it by the British Government on September 13, 1939, listing what they denominated as contraband in the present war; and I also have a statement issued by our own State Department on September 19, giving a list of articles and commodities that the German Government has said they will regard as contraband. It is not limited in either particular to arms and ammunition and implements of war. They cover almost every commodity; they cover all food, all clothing; they cover the things that go into clothing; they cover tobacco. Cotton, oil, gasoline, wheat, wool, and many other commodities are included under the definitions listed as contraband.

The 28 American merchant ships that were sunk or attacked by German submarines before our entry into the World War, and the 7 American merchant ships that were sunk by mines before our entry into the World War did not carry arms, ammunition, and implements of war, but other commodities. In only one instance do the records show that they contained war supplies. The cargoes on those ships consisted of wheat, oil, flax, rice, copper, pig iron, foodstuffs, and various commodities other than war materials.

If the warring nations do not treat arms, ammunition, and implements of war differently from other commodities but assert the right to seize and sink ships carrying all such commodities, whether they be arms or not, why should our Government place them in a different category?

Opponents of repeal assert that the arms embargo is the heart of our neutrality law. In this they are wholly in error. All legislation passed upon this subject, including the original act of 1935, contained numerous other features, all designed to restrict our citizens in the shipment of goods and the transportation of passengers, so as to avoid circumstances that might involve us in war.

The arms embargo will not tend to keep this country out of war. It is not the sale of arms or other commodities, but rather their transportation and delivery upon the ocean that gets us into war.

It was never claimed for the arms-embargo feature that it would prevent us from becoming involved in war. Its sole purpose was to discourage war on the part of other countries. It was to set an example to other countries which we hoped they would follow, and thereby prevent war; but instead of discouraging them it has encouraged the arming of dictator nations, and in view of present conditions, and of developments that have taken place, I am now constrained to believe that our arms embargo, instead of discouraging, has encouraged other nations to commit aggressions, and instead of promoting peace has encouraged and caused war.

The repeal of the arms embargo is not an unneutral act, because when we do repeal it we conform to international law, which gives us that right which permits all nations to sell arms and commodities of all kinds to belligerent nations, which right we exercised for 150 years, or until 1935, and no one can claim that international law is unneutral, and the exercise of our right thereunder cannot be charged as being unneutral. But some say that since the European war has already begun, it would be unneutral to repeal the arms embargo now. As was said in the House debate, "You cannot change the rules of the game after the whistle blows," to which we reply, "The United States is neither the referee nor a participant in the European war and does not propose to become either, and in amending our neutrality law we are not making any rules for the conduct of the war in Europe but only regulations concerning the conduct of our own citizens." Every country has the right to change its own domestic laws at any time, whether in peacetime or wartime, provided it treats all countries alike, and the proposed law makes no discrimination but treats every country on the same basis. If we do not have the right to repeal the arms-embargo feature of the neutrality law, we have no right to change the neutrality law in any respect. If we cannot take that provision out, we cannot add anything to it. If it is unneutral to repeal the arms embargo because it might hurt Germany, it will be equally unneutral to add a new provision restricting our ships from carrying goods to England and France because it would hurt them. Such is the position assumed by those opposing the repeal and favoring the cash-and-carry plan. It is wholly illogical, inconsistent, and indefensible, and reveals the weakness and the fallacy of their arguments that we cannot change the law since war has begun. If such a position be sound, the United States, with only a partial neutrality law in effect and a major war starting in Europe, must wait until the war ends before we can pass an adequate and complete neutrality law. Surely we cannot afford to take that risk, and under international law we do not have to do so.

A practical reason for the repeal of the arms embargo is that we have found difficulty in its enforcement. It has not worked out in a practical way. We have tried it for 5 years, and only twice has it been invoked—once in the Italian-Ethiopian War, and again in the Spanish Civil War. Those are the only times we have tested it. A representative of the State Department testified before the Foreign Affairs Committee that its enforcement caused much concern and much difficulty even in those two minor wars, since it prohibits the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations, or to neutral nations for reshipment to belligerent nations, and it is always difficult to find out whether a shipment to a neutral nation is to be reshipped to a belligerent or not. Since there was much difficulty, even in those two minor wars, how much more difficulty would we experience in its enforcement in a major war with many countries involved. It is easily conceivable that its retention might involve us in war, since it would afford grounds for belligerents to accuse us of being unneutral in its enforcement.

Another reason for its repeal is that while the arms embargo is neutral in fact, it is unneutral in effect, in that it denies to weaker and unarmed nations the right which they have under international law to buy arms, and penalizes and imperils the safety and preservation of smaller countries that are unarmed and at the mercy of dictator governments.

Surely the United States, always a firm believer in international law, and a friend of the weak and oppressed, does not want to retain upon its statute books any law that will give aid and comfort to aggressor and dictator nations, and that is exactly what the arms embargo has done and is doing.

To those who fear that the repeal of the arms embargo might result in huge profits to the munition makers, let me say that if the arms embargo is repealed, I shall favor, and I am assured that legislation will be enacted to levy such a high tax on munition makers that it will prevent profiteering in those commodities. The munition makers know this to be true, and for that reason there is no active support on their part for the legislation to repeal, and some of them are even opposing its repeal.

But the opponents of repeal say that it is immoral to sell arms. They speak of blood money, and wax eloquent in picturing the death and destruction caused by arms which may be bought in this country. It is just as immoral to sell the materials of which arms are made as it is to sell arms in the finished product. There can be no moral difference.

Morality cannot be predicated on a definition. We cannot salve our conscience when we know that the materials shipped are intended to be converted into arms or weapons of destruction. Some of the opponents of repeal realize that the arms embargo should be modified. The Vorys amendment, adopted in the House, modified the arms embargo by repealing that portion of it relating to munitions of war and left the inhibition against arms and ammunition still in effect. It is just as immoral to sell munitions of war as it is to sell arms and ammunition, and one's conscience cannot be palliated by supporting the Vorys amendment.

Another school of thought, realizing that the Vorys amendment does not meet the requirements of conscience, have suggested that the arms embargo be modified so as to permit the sale of defensive but not offensive weapons, but this suggestion is so fantastic and impracticable that it was not given serious consideration in the Senate and, I predict, will not be considered in the House.

The only practical way, the only logical way, the only sensible way to handle this matter is to treat all commodities alike and to require a transfer of the title here, and the belligerents to do their own carrying. It is easy to enforce such a law, because its enforcement will take place in this country. If the present neutrality law is difficult to enforce, how infinitely more difficult would it be to enforce a law that required our enforcement agencies to determine whether the weapons were for offensive or defensive purpose, and whether they were munitions of war or arms and ammunition.

The embargo on arms should either be retained as it is now written or repealed in its entirety. There is no middle ground.

The Senate's action in repealing outright the arms embargo was the sensible thing to do, and the House should, and I believe will, concur therein.

I have sought in a calm, dispassionate manner, without appealing to your emotions or your prejudice, to discuss this important question. I have not decried the evils of war. You all know that. Those of us who favor the repeal of the arms embargo are just as much opposed to war as those who favor its retention, and we are just as anxious to keep our country out of any foreign war. But we realize that shouting shibboleths of peace or denouncing those who oppose us will not solve the problem, and based upon the experience and history of the past, we are seeking to enact legislation that will safeguard our rights and prevent our involvement, and we have looked at the question solely from the standpoint of America and America alone.

To those who seek to frighten the American people by telling you that we are on the verge of war, let me quote a sentence from the radio address of President Roosevelt, delivered last Thursday night. I quote:

"The fact of the international situation—the simple fact, without any bogey in it, without any appeals to prejudice—is that the United States, as I have said before, is neutral and does not intend to get involved in war."

That is the position of the President of the United States; that is the position of the Secretary of State; that is the position of Congress. America is at peace and will remain at peace, and the enactment of the neutrality bill, in substantially the same form as passed by the overwhelming majority of the Senate last Friday night, will, in my judgment, be the most effective means at our command to preserve our peace and prevent our involvement in any foreign war.

The Senate has spoken; the people have spoken in no uncertain tone in the various polls, all registering their approval, and it only remains for the House to carry out the will of the American people, and that I sincerely expect it to do.

I thank you and good night.

House Joint Resolution 388. To Establish a Joint Committee To Prepare a Revision and Recodification of the Judicial Code and Other Provisions of Law Relating to the Judiciary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER CHANDLER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, permit me to invite the attention of the House to House Joint Resolution 388, introduced on October 5 and referred to the Committee on Rules. Its purpose is to bring about the establishment of a joint committee, consisting of five members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and an equal number from the Judiciary Committee of the House, to prepare a revision and recodification of the Judicial Code and other provisions of law relating to the judiciary; and, in view of its importance, I am sure that the Committee on Rules would appreciate the benefit of such consideration as Members of the House may have the time to give to the subject between now and the next session of Congress.

The Judicial Code was enacted on March 3, 1911, after 2 years' study. Almost 30 years have passed since that study was made. The code which was adopted has been amended about 200 times, but has not been revised or reenacted as a whole. The remainder of title 28 of the Code of the Laws of the United States was enacted at various times from 1874 to 1938. There have been numerous amendments of those provisions, but no revision or reenactment since June 22, 1874. The assembling of all the provisions of title 28 of the United States Code has been of the highest practical value; but, since that is merely prima facie evidence of law, it is not an adequate substitute for a revision and reenactment.

To describe in detail the many questions which naturally will arise in the work of revising, modernizing, and recodifying the Judicial Code and other provisions of law relating to the judiciary would be comparable to doing the work itself; but with the rapid changes which have taken place in the Federal judicial system, a reexamination of the entire subject by a specially selected group of Senators and Rrepresentatives, with the aid of the bench and bar and of experts in the field of codification, and the enactment of a comprehensive, up-to-date code would be a great step forward in the perpetuation of the Federal judicial system.

The new Internal Revenue Code has just been adopted and is the first Federal act of its kind since 1874. The National Bankruptcy Act has been revised after 40 years' operation under the act of 1898 and amendments. The time has come in this year of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789, I submit, to begin to revise, recodify, and bring down to date the basic law forming our Federal judicial system.

The growth of administrative absolutism, as its enemies are encouraged to call it, is proof positive of the necessity for keeping the Federal judicial system as efficient and as effective as legislators, the bench, and the bar can devise. If for no other reason, when conditions change, as they always do, those who would sidestep the courts today will yearn for the fullest judicial control.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has recognized the prime importance of eliminating delays in the trial and disposition of causes by adding to the number of circuit and district judges of the United States courts, by authorizing the Supreme Court to promulgate unified rules of civil procedure, by simplifying appeals, by expediting the proper determination of constitutional questions through the authorizing of three-judge courts, and by the creation of an administrative office for the coordination of the work of the Federal courts; and the House Committee on the Judiciary has been conducting studies relating to the better distribution of the work of the district courts, rearranging the boundaries of the Federal circuits, reducing court costs and fees, expediting patent litigation, speeding up the work of the Court of Claims and the Customs Court, and allied subjects, all designed to popularize, if I may use the word, the Federal courts by guaranteeing speedy trials, inexpensive to poor and rich, and removing a growing desire among certain groups to remake the social order so as to operate outside the law and the courts.

Dean Roscoe Pound, one of the greatest law teachers, said recently that he could hear someone, a modernist, I suppose, saying:

> We are in a different age. The times demand that things be done speedily and efficiently. They call for short cuts to social ends. We can't stop to do equal and exact justice. We can't even stop to hear both sides.

The purpose of those interested in "administrative rule" is to turn over to experts, comprising administrative boards, the final decision of vital questions affecting human and property rights, particularly where speed is an essential factor. One justification for eliminating the courts is that boards and commissions can act promptly, unhampered by rules of evidence and legal procedure. It is unnecessary to pursue the thought further here, and we need merely ask ourselves: Shall we build up this new doctrine and substitute administrative agencies for the courts in the widely expanding fields of governmental regulation, or shall we retain the judicial system, streamline it to meet the demands of present-day haste and impatience, and preserve the original design of those who drafted the Federal Constitution and the Bill of Rights?

Perhaps an extreme question has been stated, but the possibilities have not been overstated, and it is not an exaggeration to say that the Federal courts, except the Supreme Court, have never been popular with the great majority of the people. This is not as it should be, and I submit that the remedy lies in the maintenance of such an efficient judicial system that men and women who find it necessary to resort to the courts for equal and exact justice will enter the Federal courts with confidence in the courts' ability to deal promptly, effectively, and humanly with their legal problems.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean that administrative boards and commissions do not have their indispensable place in government. With the growth of our Nation and the rapidly expanding responsibilities of Congress, delegations must be made of functions which otherwise would be the direct tasks of the legislative branch. However much some of our citizens may regret it, commissions, boards, and bureaus are here to stay, but they are not constructed or intended as substitutes for our courts. Now, let us turn to some of the subjects needing study and revision in the Judicial Code.

In most of the States the work of the United States district courts is unequally divided. Many district judges are overworked, while others have far less than enough to do; and proper realinement of the boundaries of the judicial districts is essential. Obviously this is the work of a code committee.

The Federal circuits should be rearranged so as to equalize the work of the different circuits by relieving those which are overloaded, and probably by creating an additional circuit. The lawyers will not want to change the circuits to which they have been appealing cases, but the interests of litigants and the public are paramount. Some of the Federal judicial circuits are years behind in their dockets, and sessions are held in some circuits more than a thousand miles from the places where the cases have been tried.

Special courts, such as the customs court, should be fitted into the judicial system. Conflicting decisions on questions of jurisdiction can be reconciled by recodification of the Judicial Code, obsolete provisions can be deleted, and appropriate reexamination of the entire subject will reveal opportunities for great improvement in the enactments controlling the jurisdiction and functions of the Federal judiciary.

Turning to the annoying details which perplex the bench and bar, and which illustrate the need of thorough-going revision, there are many provisions relating to the judiciary which never have been expressly repealed, and it is not at all clear that they have been superseded by later legislation;

yet, they are not included in title 28 of the United States Code or in supplement IV. In conjunction with a recognized authority, Mr. W. H. McClenon, of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, the following tabulations have been made to emphasize the importance of immediate attention to this problem by codifiers or appropriate committees of Congress:

PROVISIONS INCLUDED IN TITLE 28 OF THE UNITED STATES CODE WHICH HAVE BEEN AFFECTED BY THE RULES PROMULGATED BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT FOR THE FEDERAL DISTRICT COURTS

The numerous procedural changes which have been brought about through the adoption of the new rules of civil procedure for the United States district courts furnish additional reasons for recodification of the Judicial Code. These rules were authorized by Congress, have the force of law, and the following references will emphasize the extensive bearing which the new rules have on the present Judicial Code. The section numbers in title 28 are given, and the effect of the new rules on those sections is shown:

The foregoing references by no means cover the matters which will require attention in the revision of the Judicial Code. There are provisions relating to the Federal courts in a majority of the titles in the Code of the Laws of the United States, and those provisions should be connected in an appropriate manner with the Judicial Code. In some instances entire titles can be consolidated in a revised Judicial Code. House Joint Resolution 388 is sufficiently expansive to permit the consideration of new matter, and the presentation to Congress of a thorough, concise, and adequate document for enactment as a Judicial Code.

Questions will be raised as to the probable cost of doing this work and as to the preferable manner of its accomplishment. Personally, I hope that the Committee on Revision of the Laws will have a part in the work if the resolution is adopted. That committee has had much experience, is equipped to participate very beneficially, and has jurisdictional connection with work of this character. Very valuable cooperation will be furnished by local, State, and national bar associations, and the facilities of the new administrative office, as well as the Department of Justice and the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, can be utilized advantageously and economically.

While public hearings will be necessary, and should be held, I cannot believe that the cost will be a material item. Certainly, benefits of a most substantial character, far outweighing the expense and extending over a long period of years, are bound to follow the completion of this work, which will represent a landmark and another milestone in the evolution of our Federal judicial system.

When Last We Were Neutral

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN MERCURY

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to insert my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "When Last We Were Neutral," by Harry Elmer Barnes, appearing in the American Mercury of November 1939.

Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing to read an article which gives truthful and unbiased information about conditions as they existed 24 years ago. These conditions, of course, are generally known among certain groups, but withheld from the public. I hope many will read this article and that it will be distributed freely, for nothing will straighten us out sooner than the knowledge of the intrigue and rot which has been and is undermining this Republic.

The article in question qualifies other information that I have inserted in the RECORD, in which the same personalities are involved, as set forth and so ably discussed in this article. The writer brings out clearly and distinctly the fact that we were not neutral during the World War, because we did not have neutral employees in the Government.

It is now high time that we cut adrift from the proforeign groups and replace them with pro-American. If an ordinary citizen engaged in the same activities in which the personalities in this article were engaged, he would be held for treason. It is well for us to bear in mind that we have no more right to be pro-German, pro-English, pro-French than we have to be pro-Ethiopian or pro-Scandinavian. It is difficult to understand what excuse one may find when he deliberately sends our Nation into a destructive war against a friendly nation. The article which I have asked to be inserted gives the inside story as seen by a neutral observer.

[From the American Mercury for November 1939]

WHEN LAST WE WERE NEUTRAL

(By Harry Elmer Barnes)

The United States could not have been more perfectly set up for neutrality than it was in July and August 1914. Woodrow Wilson was a lifelong and conscientious pacifist. His convictions were not emotional and impressionistic but were based on deep study and prolonged reflection. Moreover his wife was noted for her firm convictions on pacifism; she strongly backed up her husband in his pacific beliefs and policies. Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan was one of the outstanding pacifists then alive—courageous and willing to stick to his guns in the face of criticism.

In addition, Mr. Wilson was uniquely well informed on the essentials of the European situation before war broke out in the summer of 1914. He had sent his personal representative, Col. Edward M. House, to Europe to study the situation. Sizing up matters that May, Colonel House concluded his observations with the statement that "whenever England consents, France and Russia will close in on Germany." Years of scholarly investigation of the war origins since 1918 have underlined the sagacity of Colonel House's verdict, whatever his later mistakes.

When war came, the President's statements were a model of neutrality procedure. He issued a formally correct neutrality proclamation and went on to exhort his countrymen to be neutral in thought as well as in action. There is no doubt that he was completely neutral in August 1914. We thus started out most auspiciously along the path of minding our own business. Yet within less than 3 years we had become involved in the war to make the world safe for democracy, with Mr. Wilson proclaiming that we must apply to this crusade "force, force to the uttermost, force without stint or limit." What were the influences and pressures that drove us from that path and enmeshed us in the European carnage?

With another World War—direct offspring of the first—under way, the question is far from academic. It would be banal to insist on absolute parallels; modern history is too complex for such oversimplification. But it would be foolish and cowardly to blur the facts or ignore the lessons of the earlier period. Our transition from perfect neutrality to total immersion in the conflict provides a valuable case study in the A B C's of getting into a European war. Whatever the implications for our own day it is ineffaceable history.

In case we are catapulted into the new war, Americans should realize that there will be costs beyond heaped-up deaths, bereavements, and economic destruction. The moment we join the war the New Deal and all its promises of a "more abundant life" will fold up, as did the new freedom of Woodrow Wilson in 1917. Our civil liberties will be more thoroughly suppressed than in the first World War—there has been immense progress in the technique of bigger and better suppression of the world ever since then. Mobilization plans already drawn up call for a regimentation of American life unmatched by anything that existed in 1917–18. There are reasons for fearing that this regimentation would carry over into peacetime and transform the United States into an American style of totalitarian society. Under these circumstances an open-eyed, realistic understanding of the process of our entry into the first World War seems an irreducible minimum of knowledge for Americans.

I would summarize the forces which pushed us into the trans-Atlantic calamity as follows: First, a violent change in Mr. Wilson's personal attitude toward the merits of the struggle. Second, economic interests which drove us first into unneutrality, then headlong into war. Third, an inconsistent and unneutral line of diplomatic procedure. Fourth, psychological factors that impelled us toward intervention. How far the same factors operate today is not within the scope of this article to explore. Let us turn our attention to the essential facts, considered purely as history.

II

No circumstances could have forced us into the war if the President had not, by the spring of 1917, been favorable to our entry. We must therefore discuss briefly some of the reasons why he altered his point of view.

Primarily we must take into account the fact that Mr. Wilson's intellectual perspective was predominantly Anglo-Saxon. He had little knowledge of, or sympathy with, continental European culture and institutions. His greatest intellectural heroes were such English writers as Milton, John Locke, and Adam Smith. He did graduate work at the Johns Hopkins University Seminar, where the Anglo-Saxon myth reigned supreme. He was a student and admirer of the English Constitution, and frankly regarded the British system of government as superior to ours.

Then Mr. Wilson had in his Cabinet, and among his Cabinet, and among his ambassadors, men who were intensely pro-English or pro-Ally in their sympathies—Secretaries Lindley M. Garrison and David F. Houston, and Walter Hines Page, Ambassador to London, who frequently went to such extremes in his Anglomania as to annoy even the President. When Bryan was succeeded by Lansing, the most crucial post in the Cabinet went to another vehemently pro-English sympathizer. The biases of Page and Lansing made it difficult to pursue forthright diplomacy with Great Britain.

Mr. Wilson was also deeply influenced by the criticisms of prominent Americans sympathetic to the Allies and intervention. He was stung by the speeches of Theodore Roosevelt, and by Mr. Roosevelt's reference to his diplomatic statements as "weasel words." He was especially annoyed by Elihu Root's statement that "first he shakes his fist and then he shakes his finger." On the other hand, he was human enough to take note of the praise which was showered upon him by the press when he made a bellicose statement or led a preparedness parade. This contrasted sharply with the bitter criticism when he made such remarks as that a country might be "too proud to fight," or that the only desirable peace would be "a peace without victory." He was also profoundly moved by the British atrocity propaganda, particularly after James Bryce lent his name to the veracity of the stories. When Bryce sponsored the propaganda lies, Wilson came to believe that they must have a substantial basis in fact, which in turn helped his rationalization that England was fighting for civilization.

Personal matters also played their role in the transformation of the President's attitude. When his first wife died, a strong pacific influence disappeared. Then he married a dashing widow friendly to the Allied cause. Bitterly resentful of the criticism to which her husband was subjected because of his refusal to be stampeded into intervention, the second Mrs. Wilson appears to have wished him to shame his critics by an even stronger stand for intervention. The publication of her memoirs does not make it necessary to modify this statement.

Having been converted to intervention by these various influences, Mr. Wilson rationalized his change of mind in terms of noble moral purpose. As he told Jane Addams in the spring of 1917, he felt that if there was to be any hope of a just and constructive peace, the United States must be represented at the peace conference following the war. Mr. Wilson could only be at the peace conference if the United States had previously entered the conflict.

III

The influence exerted by American finance upon our entry into the World War has been revealed in Ray Stannard Baker's Life and Letters of Woodrow Wilson, in the volumes of the Nye investigation, and in Prof. C. C. Tansil's America Goes to War. At the outset the international bankers were by no means all pro-Ally. Some, like the Morgan firm, were pro-British, and had been for years; others, like Kuhn, Loeb & Co., manned chiefly by men of German derivation, were pro-German. But the financial interests of all of them soon became pro-Ally. Credit and loans to Germany were discouraged, while large loans were made to the Allied Powers.

On August 15, 1914, at the beginning of the war, Mr. Bryan declared against loans to any belligerent on the logical ground that financial credit is the basis of all forms of contraband. President Wilson backed him up firmly for the time being. This decision did not operate seriously against the Allies; the balance of trade and investment was against the United States and the Allied countries could pay for their purchases here by canceling the debts owed abroad by Americans. But Allied war purchases soon became so extensive that by the autumn of 1914 there was a credit crisis. The National City Bank wrote to Robert Lansing, then Counselor of the State Department, on this matter on October 23, 1914, advocating short-term credits to European governments. Lansing immediately talked the matter over with President Wilson, and the latter agreed that the Government would not interfere with such an arrangement. This information was transmitted orally to Willard Straight, of J. P. Morgan & Co., on the same night. Shortly after, H. P. Davidson, of the Morgan firm, went to England and signed a contract to become the British purchasing agent in America. A similar contract was soon made with France.

These short-term credits sufficed for some months. By the summer of 1915, however, Allied purchases had become so extensive that the bankers knew they must float loans here for the Allied countries, if the latter were to continue to buy munitions on a large scale in this country, so they made strong representations to Colonel House and to Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo.

On August 21, 1915, McAdoo wrote to President Wilson pointing out that great prosperity had come to the country from the sale of munitions to the Allies, but that this prosperity could not continue unless we financed it through open loans to the Allies—i. e., by selling Allied bonds in our own financial markets. On September 6 Lansing argued similarly in a letter to the President stressing the crisis that faced American business if the earlier ruling on American loans to belligerents were not rescinded. McAdoo and Lansing won. On September 8, 1915, Wilson assented to the sale of Allied bonds, and the Morgan firm was once more given oral information. Soon the first public loan—the $500,000,000 Anglo-French loan—was floated.

These formal loans, amounting in all to about $2,500,000,000, financed the Allies' purchases for a little over a year, but their buying was so heavy that even the great investment banking houses could not take care of their needs. By January 1917 the Allies had overdrawn their credit by nearly $500,000,000. Only Uncle Sam could save them, and then only if the United States were at war with Germany; we could not, as a nation, lend money to a belligerent unless we were at war with its enemy.

At this time the Germans renewed unrestricted submarine warfare. The United States could now be led into the war, and the bankers would be repaid—as they were to the last cent. When the war was over, Thomas W. Lamont stated with commendable candor the facts relative to the attitude of the firm of Morgan toward the World War and the belligerent powers:

"At the request of certain of the foreign governments the firm of Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. undertook to coordinate the requirements of the Allies, and then to bring about regularity and promptness in fulfilling these requirements. Those were the days when American citizens were being urged to remain neutral in action, in word, and even in thought. But our firm had never for one moment been neutral; we didn't know how to be. From the very start we did everything we could to contribute to the cause of the Allies. And this particular work had two effects—one in assisting the Allies in the production of goods and munitions in America necessary to the Allies' vigorous prosecution of the war; the other in helping to develop the great and profitable export trade that our country has had." (Manchester Guardian, January 27, 1920.)

It is well known that Mr. Wilson was not personally cordial to the bankers before 1917, and that members of the Morgan firm rarely entered the White House until war was declared; hence it has been persistently maintained that the bankers could not have influenced the President. No one, however, should be naive enough to imagine that the bankers walked into Mr. Wilson's office and demanded that he sign on the dotted line. The bankers exerted their pressure on the men sympathetic to them—on House, Lansing, McAdoo, and others. So even if Mr. Wilson did not personally pay attention to the bankers, he was directly and powerfully influenced by those who did.

It has also been asserted that the bankers were not alarmed by the fact that, by the close of 1916, the Allies had overdrawn their account to the tune of $500,000,000. This overdraft, it is said, was covered by securities deposited with the bankers. But it takes considerable simple-mindedness to believe that the bankers would have wished to confiscate these securities, reveal the bankruptcy of their powerful clients, and otherwise embarrass their creditors abroad. Even if the bankers did not have any overt financial worries about getting their money from the Allies, they had psychological and moral worries in this crisis. It is worthy of note that the bankers were paid back every cent, with interest, by the Allies; only Uncle Sam has been compelled to hold the bag.

Some observers have said that the bankers learned their lesson during the World War. The only lesson they learned was that great profits may be realized from financing the right belligerents.

Naturally most American industrialists shared the attitude of the bankers. Since England controlled the seas, sales were mainly to the Allied powers, and industrialists wished to see the Allies continue the war and win it. Upon Allied purchases depended most of our sales and prosperity, and upon Allied success and solvency depended our payment in the end. The vast trade in munitions carried us from depression, in 1914, to boom years in 1915–17.

There has been much dispute as to whether we were forced into war by the loans and sales to the Allies or by the resumption of German submarine warfare early in 1917. In an important article on "Neutrality and Economic Pressures, 1914–17" (Science and Society; Spring 1939), Prof. Paul Birdsall, of Williams College, shows that the two were inseparably involved. By abandoning his neutral financial and industrial policy in favor of the Allies, President Wilson made it possible for the Entente Powers to have an enormous advantage over the Central Powers in getting war supplies. The only way for the Central Powers to overcome this advantage was to resume unlimited submarine warfare and try to sweep from the seas the ships that were carrying these supplies to the Allies. Our financing of the Allies led to the resumption of German submarine warfare, which furnished the "incident" that enabled the war party in this country to put us into the conflict. Thus economic pressure and financial favoritism were the crucial factors which led us into war.

No one need hold that the President was moved primarily by any tender sentiments for the bankers. Both McAdoo and Lansing argued that it was essential to American prosperity as a whole to finance the Allies. It was this broader consideration of continued prosperity in 1915–16, and the relation of this to the prospects of the Democratic Party in the election of 1916, rather than any direct banker pressure on the White House that bore in on Mr. Wilson's consciousness in the late summer of 1915 when he let down the gates to financing the Allies.

But the net result was precisely as though Mr. Morgan had walked into the White House and asked the President to sign on the dotted line. Only the method was more adroit and the approach more indirect.

IV

As a result of personal prejudice, powerful economic factors, and Allied propaganda, President Wilson thus slowly slipped away from the neutrality with which he met the outbreak of the war. This was particularly true after Secretary of State Bryan resigned in protest against the increasing unneutrality of our diplomacy. Thereafter Wilson and Lansing followed one line of diplomatic reasoning and international law for the Allies and quite a different line for Germany. They allowed Great Britain to run wild in the violation of international law and of our neutral rights, while they insisted on holding Germany "to strict accountability" in the literal observance of such law.

England started out in 1914 by making a scrap of paper out of the Declaration of London, governing contraband in wartime. Next it made use of armed belligerent merchantmen as though they were peaceful commercial vessels. England violated our neutral rights far more extensively between 1914 and 1917 than she did before the War of 1812—even to the point of flying the American flag. Mr. Wilson came to believe, however, that Great Britain was fighting for civilization and that international law must not be allowed to stand in her way. His Attorney General, Thomas W. Gregory, tells of the rebuke which Mr. Wilson administered to certain Cabinet members when they protested British violations of our neutral rights:

"After patiently listening, Mr. Wilson said, in that quiet way of his, that the ordinary rules of conduct had no application to the situation; that the Allies were standing with their backs to the wall, fighting wild beasts; that he would permit nothing to be done by our country to hinder or embarrass them in the prosecution of the war unless admitted rights were grossly violated, and that this policy must be understood as settled."

Secretary Lansing, in his Memoirs, admits that he made no real pretense of holding England to the tenets of international law. He tells us that, after the sinking of the Lusitania, he thought we should be fighting on the side of the Allies, and that he was determined to do nothing which would prove embarrassing to us when we took our position as a military comrade of the Allied powers. He persisted in this attitude, even though he was later honest enough to say that in 1917 we had as good, if not better, legal grounds for fighting Britain as for fighting Germany. Ambassador Page even went to the shocking extreme of collaborating with Sir Edward Grey in answering the protests of his own government, a procedure which, when revealed, outraged even so pro-Ally journal as the New York Times. We thus encouraged and perpetuated the illegally extensive British blockade, which in turn provoked German submarine warfare. Further, from the studies of Prof. Charles C. Tansil and others it would seem that on the rare occasions when Wilson and Lansing became outraged over the grossest British violations of our neutrality Colonel House invariably appeared on the spot to prevent any show of American firmness.

The psychological factors which headed us for war were numerous and powerful. The active campaign for preparedness and intervention was engineered by leaders of the war cult in the United States—such men as Theodore Roosevelt, Leonard Wood, Henry Cabot Lodge, Gus Gardiner, and others—who led in steps to stimulate the martial spirit. While there were exceptions, the majority of our newspapers were pro-Ally and prointerventionist. Many were honestly sympathetic with the Allies, others were deeply involved in Allied propaganda, some were heavily subsidized by the Allies, still others were bought outright by Allied interests. The newspapers also had a natural affinity with the bankers and industrialists who were their chief advertising clients.

In the matter of propaganda, the Allies had a notable advantage. They controlled the seas, the cables, and other agencies of communication. The Germans had only a crude and temporary wireless contact with the United States. Further, Allied propaganda was better organized and supported, and was also far more adroit, than the German. Consequently, a majority of Americans were led to believe in the veracity of the mass of anti-German atrocity stories. In a moment of unusual candor, Lord Northcliffe, in charge of British propaganda, stated that the Americans were more gullible than any other people, except the Chinese, and called us a "bunch of sheep."

The net result of all this was that we entered the war in April 1917. Americans went into the war feeling that there was no other course; that our self-respect and national honor demanded it. The fallacy of this was revealed in the investigations and disclosures of the facts of the World War causes in the era of disillusionment after 1918, some of which have been summarized in this article. Our great good fortune in obtaining these facts so quickly should not, it seems to me, be thrown away frivolously in the present critical period. It provides us with a treasure of historical experience that, with the exercise of calm reason, should be useful as a brake on our national conduct in the fateful years just ahead.

Some Factors of the Farm Price Equation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my address before the annual meeting of the Virginia State Grange at Winchester, Va., October 26, 1939, as follows:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is an inspiration to travel through our beautiful Shenandoah Valley at this season of the year when the blue haze of Indian summer has softened the rugged outline of our mountains; when the hardwood trees, yielding to the Midas touch of fall, are saying farewell to summer in a riotous flame of color; when the wheat is in the bin, the corn in the shock, and the apples in the shed—mute evidences of how a beneficent Providence will deal bountifully with a Christian people dedicated to the principles of peace.

Since I have been a member of the National Grange for a number of years and deeply interested in its program to advance the interests of agriculture, the invitation to address your meeting today was greatly appreciated. During my service in the House I have found myself in accord with the legislative program of the Grange and have found it a pleasure to cooperate with Grange officials in pressing forward to the goal. "In the building of a long-time farm program," states the legislative program of the Grange, "we must not lose sight of the fundamental American principles of self-help, equality of opportunity, and independence of thought and action. Agriculture asks for fair treatment rather than special privilege. It seeks economic justice rather than subsidy. The Grange declares for a program in legislation and administration that will establish and maintain prices for agricultural products that will provide for reasonable profits, as determined by farm costs."

I would think that all genuinely interested in the welfare of the farmer could support that type of program. Certainly the splendid district I have the honor to represent does, and hence I feel that the selection of Winchester as your meeting place this year was an appropriate one. Winchester is a city that is progressive and modern in every respect, yet one that is filled with historic memories and one that extends to the visitor within its gates a gracious hospitality that is reminiscent of the best of the Old South.

We celebrate this month the tenth anniversary of the greatest stock-market crash in the history of the exchanges and one of the most trying periods through which agriculture has ever passed. In previous depressions we have liquidated unsound positions and consolidated the economic front on a better fortified line. In the depression that started with the October 1929 market crash we have preferred a lingering illness to heroic medicine, yielding to the delusion that the depression was solely due to the money changers and economic royalists and that they could be made to bear all of its burdens. But we now realize that the distribution of wealth through Government spending means increased taxation for all and not just for the rich and is not God's answer to a farmer's prayer.

There are some occupations involving greater physical hazards than farming, but few greater financial ones. He can sow and yet not reap; he can reap and yet not sell; he can sell and yet not make buckle and tongue meet. And since he sells in an open market and buys in a protected market, he should know something of both to properly chart his course.

It is my purpose today to briefly outline some of the factors of the farm-price equation. Of course, in any discussion of the outlook for American agriculture today it is necessary to take into account the new situation that farmers must face because of the European war. Most people will form their opinions of the probable effects of the present war on the basis of what they remember to have been the effects of the last one. This is only natural. But the trouble is that our memories are short. We remember, first of all, that the last war brought us a boom. We forget too quickly that its real harvest was the depression.

When war came in Europe last month domestic farm prices had been relatively stable, although somewhat below 1938. In September of this year, however, farm prices rose sharply. This rise was due only in part to the war. It reflected in a large measure increased purchases by domestic buyers and speculators, who expect further advances because of wartime demand. Also, the incomes of consumers had been rising for some time previous, and in August the people who buy the things the farmer sells had the biggest volume of purchasing power at their command in 2 years. There was every reason to expect a continuance of the improvement in industrial production and consumer income before the outbreak of war in Europe.

What effect the war in Europe will have on our industry and agriculture remains to be seen. If we look back to the World War and to 1914 we are impressed by the fact that domestic prices did not rise appreciably until in 1916, although we were selling all of our products, including arms and ammunition. But even in the fall of 1916 our exports of arms and ammunition constituted only 1 percent of our commerce. On that phase of the problem Willard L. Thorp, economic adviser to the Secretary of Commerce, wrote me on October 17:

"The retention or repeal of the present embargo on the export of war materials would seem to be a relatively minor factor in the over-all situation, although it is, of course, important to specific industries. The bulk of war exports will undoubtedly be comprised, in this war as in the last, of materials and manufactures not covered by the embargo. Furthermore, while the repeal of the embargo would no doubt result in substantial exports of war materials, its retention would in many cases merely result in the shipment of semifinished goods for final fabrication in Canada or other belligerent countries."

And, if we propose to use 1914 as a basis of prediction for what may happen to our economy this year and next, it will be well to bear in mind the difference that 25 years have wrought.

In 1914 we were in a period of declining business activity. Today every indication points toward recovery, regardless of war. In 1914 we were a debtor country with obligations to meet abroad. Today that position has been reversed. In 1914 the world wheat crop was off 435,000,000 bushels because of short crops in Canada, Australia, and Russia. Today the world has the largest carry-over of wheat on record; by July of next year world stocks of wheat are expected to reach 1,400,000,000 bushels. Today there is a supply of 25,000,000 bales of American cotton which compares with seventeen and four-tenths million bales in 1914. Sugar supplies, both in this country and abroad, are more than ample. There is not likely to be anything like the situation that confronted us with regard to sugar in the last war.

A survey of the Nation's food supplies made by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics indicates that they are ample. The supply of meats through the first half of 1940 will be the largest in 5 years, mostly in pork. Although the beef supply is slightly smaller this year than last it will increase in the next 12 months. There will be no shortage in dairy products although the record productions of last year will be slightly reduced. More poultry and eggs than were available in 1938–39 are indicated for the coming year. An increase of 8 percent in poultry and 2 percent in eggs may be expected.

As far as farm income is concerned, the farmer's cash income increased in August over July, and in August of this year was above the same month in 1938. Income in the first 8 months of this year is only slightly under the same period in 1938. The rise in farm prices which came in September will tend to raise total farm income for the year. Before the September price rise a total farm income of seven and nine-tenths billion dollars was indicated. Last year's income was slightly over eight billion.

One respect in which the farmer's situation differs from recent years is in the stocks of grains now held on farms. In the case of corn on farms October 1, 1939, there were 546,000,000 bushels, the highest since October 1 stocks were first reported in 1926. In the case of wheat 45 percent, or 332,200,000 bushels, was still on the farms. Although this is smaller than last year, it is larger than October 1 farm stocks in any year since 1932 excepting 1938. Eighty-one percent of the 1939 oats crop, or 765,000,000 bushels, is still on the farms.

The significance of this fact is that whatever increase in price takes place in these commodities in the immediate future, a larger proportion of it will go directly into the hands of the farmer who raised the crop. Government loans and the ever-normal granary plan have contributed toward the retention of larger stocks on farms.

The world supply of wheat is the largest on record, but in the case of the United States the domestic supply is 100,000,000 bushels under that of last year. We will have available 990,000,000 bushels of wheat, which is about the same amount we had in 1914. We are likely to consume 695,000,000 bushels, and exports will probably reach 70,000,000 bushels, which will leave a carry-over of 225,000,000 bushels on July 1, 1940. Since world supplies of wheat are 2,000,000,000 bushels larger today than they were in 1914, we cannot expect the same increase in exports to follow the outbreak of war in Europe today as was the case in 1914. Wheat prices remained fairly stable throughout all of 1914. Farm prices of wheat in United States averaged 85 cents in August 1914, the month in which war was declared. In September they averaged 93 cents, 95 cents in October, 92 cents in November, and 97 cents in December. This advance was only partly the result of the war and partly a reflection of the very small crop in Canada that year. Subsequently there was a crop failure in Australia. However, in spite of the higher general price level and the very large United States and Canadian crops, the 1915 domestic crop sold at prices slightly lower than the previous crop. It was not until the latter part of August and September in 1916 that wheat began its steady price advance. The war in Europe had then been going on for 2 full years. Wheat exports were three times as large in 1914 as the pre-war average, and in 1915 they were twice that average. The 1938 wheat exports are slightly over the average of the pre-war period and there is little prospect of an increase in our foreign shipments in the current situation. In considering the probable effect of a European war on wheat exports and agricultural exports in this country generally, there is one important post-war development that should not be overlooked. Virtually every European country has been doing all it could to become economically self-sufficient. England and France are raising more of their own wheat now than they ever did, and Italy is on an export basis for wheat, whereas it used to import wheat. All over Europe this trend toward self-sufficiency has been growing for a decade. This sort of a program makes these countries less dependent on foreign sources of supply for food and other commodities.

Although cattle prices advanced sharply early in September of this year part of the gain was lost as a result of increased marketing and a falling off in the speculative demand. Slaughter supplies of grain-fed cattle will be larger this fall and winter than last. Total cattle slaughter may be smaller, because of smaller slaughter of cows and heifers and grass steers. This in turn will be offset by heavier average weight as a result of the increased proportion of feed cattle.

Supplies of hog products are likely to be increased and consumer demand is expected to improve over the next few months. Exports of hog products were much larger in the marketing year just closing than in 1937–38, and the war in Europe is expected to bring an increase in them.

A large seasonal increase in hog marketings is in prospect for the next few months, reflecting the big pig crop of last spring. Pig production this year has been at pre-drought levels, except in the Corn Belt, where the number raised will be somewhat below the 1929–33 average. Supplies of hogs will be much larger than last. Hog production may be increased in 1940, since feed is abundant in most areas, but the increase probably will not be as large as in 1939.

In the dairy industry prices of fluid milk and butter advanced seasonally and increased consumer demand for dairy products is expected this fall and winter as a result of the anticipated expansion in industrial activity and consumer income. The consumption of dairy products was larger during this summer than last due in part to the distribution of butter for relief, but there has also been a noticeable increase in the trade output of butter through regular commercial channels. As far as war is concerned, its effect on the dairy industry is likely to be felt mostly in an increased demand for concentrated milks. In the World War exports of cheese and concentrated milk increased. Nevertheless the milk equivalent of exports during 1915 and 1916 represented a very small proportion of the total United States production of manufactured dairy products.

The number of layers in farm poultry flocks is greater this fall than last but their number is below the average for the last 10 years. The large increase this year is in the West North Central and South Central States, reflecting recovery from the drought. Fewer layers this fall than last are reported in the highly commercial North Atlantic and far western areas. Egg production per hen continues at a high seasonal rate. In addition to layers the number of pullets not yet of laying age are about the same this September 1 as last in the South Atlantic States. The ratio between feed and egg prices may be less favorable to producers the remainder of this year compared with last. This means that farmers may market a larger proportion of their hens and pullets.

The turkey crop has been estimated at 32,000,000 birds, a 22 percent increase over 1938 output. The largest previous production was 27,700,000 turkeys in 1936. Producers report early marketings—12 percent in October or earlier, compared with 10 percent in 1938. November marketings may be 38 percent against 41 percent in 1938. These figures indicate large quantities for Christmas and later markets.

The most significant current development in tobacco was the announcement by Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace on October 9, 1939, of plans for financing a portion of the remainder of the 1939 crop of flue-cured tobacco.

Under these plans, which have been approved by the President, the Commodity Credit Corporation will make purchases of, or loans on, that portion of the crop normally taken by foreign manufacturers. These foreign concerns, which now have at least 2 years' supply of flue-cured tobacco on hand, are handicapped in making additional purchases this year because of exchange difficulties.

Increased acreage and yields have resulted this year in the largest crop of flue-cured tobacco on Government record. It is slightly more than 1,000,000,000 pounds as compared with 800,000,000 in 1938. The prospective supply of flue-cured tobacco, when carry-over is added to current production, amounts to 2,000,000,000 pounds. August prices were the lowest in 6 years. When British buyers withdrew from the markets following outbreak of European war in September the auctions in flue-cured districts were closed. This greatly reduced the incomes of flue-cured producers, who marketed $46,000,000 worth of this tobacco in September a year ago.

Tobacco is likely to suffer seriously from the drastic restrictions on civilian consumption in the United Kingdom. The price of tobacco to the English consumer has recently been increased 16 percent, his purchasing power has been sharply reduced by tax increases, and the effect of these measures is reinforced by the sharp rise in the price of dollars to English importers. Since in 1938 the English took $110,000,000 worth of our total tobacco exports of $156,000,000 and since exports constitute around 30 percent of the total domestic crop, it is obvious that the export market of the tobacco farmer will be severely curtailed.

Commercial apple production was indicated at about 103,000,000 bushels as of September 1. This is about 25 percent more than the 1938 crop and 7 percent more than the 10-year average. It is expected that exports to Great Britain may be materially reduced this season.

The large supply of apples and other fruits in the United States and in foreign countries are unfavorable factors in the marketing situation for the current season. But an increase in domestic-consumer buying power during the season and the program undertaken by growers, aided by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, to divert apples of less desirable grades for fresh consumption into commercial byproducts or other outlets will tend to offset the unfavorable elements in the situation.

Exports of fresh apples from the United States during the 1939–40 season are expected to be considerably below the 12,000,000 bushels exported during last season. Large fruit crops are expected in most European countries and American apples will meet keener competition from domestic supplies in the important importing markets than obtained last season.

As a result of the war, several new factors are expected to adversely affect the export outlook. Shipping space and the foreign exchange available for fresh fruit are likely to become serious problems, as both tonnage and exchange are expected to be reserved to a considerable extent for the purchase and transportation of commodities that are considered more vital than fresh fruit in the present emergency. Consumer demand in Europe is expected to shift toward foods that are less perishable.

In addition to the factors already mentioned, there are several others which cannot safely be ignored. One of these is taxes. The chart which I hold in my hand, and which I hope all of you will have an opportunity to carefully examine, pictures in a graphic way the flow of Federal, State, and local government funds into the respective treasuries and out again for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938. You will note that the Federal receipts, including pay-roll taxes, totaled $7,691,000,000, State receipts $4,358,000,000, and local receipts $6,150,000,000. All of these sums, plus $2,207,000,000 of borrowed money, or approximately 31 percent of the produced national income of that year, was expended for governmental functions, including education, relief, and social security, agriculture, national defense, police protection, interest, debt retirement, etc. The principal taxes paid by farmers are property taxes, sales taxes, and concealed taxes. For the year in question the property tax raised $4,892,000,000 and sales taxes raised $4,298,000,000.

The other type of tax paid by the farmer is called the concealed tax, meaning the tax that is paid by the manufacturer and passed on to the consumer as an item of the cost of doing business. For the year in question, corporations paid income taxes amounting to $1,762,000,000 and pay-roll taxes amounting to $1,450,000,000. Just what percent of that tax burden was passed on to the consumer in higher costs of the finished product, no one can tell, but I recently saw an estimate from a reliable source that the average man of small income was paying 15 percent of his current income in sales and concealed taxes. The complete tax figures for the fiscal year that ended June 30, 1939, are not yet available, but the principal differences between the figures for 1938 and 1939 are that in 1939 tax receipts were somewhat smaller than in 1938 and expenditures somewhat larger, especially for the Federal Government. The session of the Congress that adjourned on August 5 appropriated over $13,000,000,000, and the Treasury estimated the Federal deficit for the current fiscal year at $3,400,000,000. In recent weeks there has been great rejoicing at the Treasury over the prospect that the deficit will possibly not be that large, but as yet there are no indications that the deficit will be less than $3,000,000,000, which, in my opinion, is not a situation over which we can rejoice. I have already indicated to you my belief, based upon careful estimates of the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, that there will be no major pick-up in farm income for the months that lie immediately ahead. As for industry, increased domestic purchasing power plus a marked increase in exports will be required to sustain the present ratio of industrial production. The cost of living in 1915 was the same as in 1914. In 1917 it was only 27 percent higher. But in 1920 it was approximately double the 1914 level, due to credit inflation arising out of war financing and speculation. Out of that credit inflation developed a land boom which we now know was a great curse to the farmers rather than a blessing. "Too many forgotten yesterdays make a lost tomorrow." Surely we would not rush blindly into another inflationary cycle of that type.

It should therefore be apparent to all that while the terrible holocaust in Europe, which may possibly end in a destruction of democracy in Europe is at the moment our most absorbing interest, we cannot afford to lose sight of domestic factors that may imperil the perpetuity of representative democracy in our own land. In the past it has been the belief of leading economists that taxation that exceeds 20 percent of the produced national income will shortly be reflected in hardships, unemployment, and a lowered standard of living. Our tax rate already exceeds that figure, and we are drawing heavily by means of deficit financing upon the productive labor of the future. On this subject the legislative program of the Grange states:

"It cannot be too strongly emphasized that enormous bond issues and a consequent increase in the national debt, which has attained menacing proportions, mean the same thing as deferred taxation. There must be a limit to investing borrowed money that future generations will have to repay. The Federal Budget should be balanced at the earliest practicable date, primarily by reducing expenditures. As a first step, Congress should refuse to make any further lump-sum appropriations to be expended at the discretion of the Executive."

The economy votes I have cast in the Congress have been in line with that policy. When we say the Federal Budget should be balanced at the earliest practicable date, emphasis of course must be placed on the word "practicable." But equal emphasis must be placed upon the necessity for making a start in that direction, because where we will ultimately land is determined not so much by the speed at which we are going as by the direction in which we are traveling. Pay-roll taxes, which last year produced a billion and a half dollars at a rate of 2 percent for old-age annuities and 3 percent for unemployment compensation, will progressively grow heavier as the 2 percent automatically rises to 3 percent, and ultimately to 6 percent, but having no bearing whatever upon a balanced Budget since every dollar of pay-roll tax is a special allocated fund. As a matter of fact, at the expiration of 20 years, and possibly in less time, a 6-percent pay-roll tax for old-age annuities may be insufficient to meet the scheduled payments by as much as $300,000,000 per year, which of course must be taken from the General Treasury. Old-age annuities are operated on what the Chairman of the Social Security Board calls "an open-end appropriation," meaning of course that the full schedule of benefit payments must be met regardless of what is paid into the earmarked fund. Agricultural workers do not share in the distribution of this enormous annuity fund, though all consumers contribute to the fund by means of concealed taxes.

Another trend that will ultimately make against parity prices for agriculture is the law that proposes to limit the hours of labor in industry to 40 per week and the minimum wage to 40 cents per hour. Such a work and pay schedule is utterly impossible on the farm, and yet the farmer will be required to purchase goods at increased costs manufactured upon those terms.

I am sure you would not wish me to close this discussion of economic factors affecting agriculture without making some reference to our foreign policy. We are determined that our Nation shall stay out of this war, and the pending changes in our present neutrality law are being considered from that standpoint. According to the old adage, "While there is life there is hope," if we can stay out of war, and I firmly believe we can, we should certainly have brains, energy, and patriotism enough to work out our present domestic problems. We have the same natural resources we had in the boom days of 1929. We have more gold, more money in circulation, and more bank credit than we had then. We have learned more about the art of mass production, which means more value for less money, or a greater abundance for the people of the good things of life. What we do need, however, is more courage, more faith, more charity, and more self-denial. And we need more unity of purpose and of action. When I say we need more faith I do not refer solely to faith in the economic soundness of our social system. We must likewise include faith in "a destiny that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we may." The Bible tells us that Asa placed his faith in the doctors, and Asa slept with his fathers. Hitler has placed his faith in his cannon; but Hitler, as Ingersoll said of France's impersonator of imperial force and murder, will go down to the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust.

We, as a representative democracy, inscribe on our coins, "In God we trust." If we treat that motto as the ignorant superstition of an earlier generation, it may some day be said of us as it has been said of the Russian exiles in Siberia:

"Only in after years when their sins have taught them charity, and their despair has taught them hope, and their loneliness has led them to faith, they shall listen again to the sound of bells coming across the field and comprehend and reverence the symbolism of the cross."

Let Us Clean Up Our Domestic Mess and Then Worry About Foreign Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. OLIVER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 30, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES C. OLIVER, OF MAINE

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me to extend my remarks, I am pleased to incorporate herewith a radio broadcast made by me on Saturday, October 21, over station WCSH, of Portland, Maine:

Citizens of the First District, through the courtesy of radio station WCSH, it is again my privilege to speak to you over the air and to discuss national affairs of vital interest to each and every one of you.

As you are aware, the extraordinary session of Congress called by the President to consider neutrality legislation continues, with the House of Representatives compelled to await action upon the part of the Senate before taking any hand in the proceedings. When the Senate will conclude debate and arrive at a decision remains a question. So divergent are the opinions held by the various Senators, it appears the House must continue to mark time for some time to come before reconciliation of Senate differences can be effected and action be taken. On the other hand, it may be but a matter of days before the decision of the Senate is reached and the whole problem passed over to the House for consideration and action. In the meantime, we are prohibited from attacking the many other problems confronting the Nation, denied opportunity to render the service to the Nation which is our duty, and barred from acting upon anything at all. In other words, the hundreds of Members of the House of Representatives might just as well have gone fishing until the gentlemen of the Senate finished with the business for which Mr. Roosevelt hustled us to Washington. It seems, and it unquestionably is, a sad waste of time and opportunity. We could be busy with sorely needed legislation, busy earning our salt, busy doing some of the many, many things we will be called upon to do at the regular session in January. But the opportunity is denied us, and we have no choice but to continue marking time.

I need not dwell upon the activities of the Senate. Your newspapers and radios continuously have supplied such a flood of information concerning the speeches pro and con, the opinions expressed and the activities of this and that Senator as to have your brains wearied and at a loss to determine the meaning of it all. You are being bombarded constantly with propaganda from every conceivable angle and through every conceivable medium, exactly as we of the Congress are being bombarded in greater volume. The tune is not a new tune. Its very discords are reproduced without variation from their clamor of 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917. The same old emotional appeals are being attempted, warmed over and camouflaged with a dressing of fresh hope of befuddlement. Those of us, whose blood inclines sympathy toward one or another of the European belligerents, are being spurred to hearken to the call of that blood and to thrust aside the dictates of common sense and reason and obligation to this, our Nation. Prejudice, ignorance of true facts, racial and religious inclinations, pride, greed, sympathies, all of these are being appealed to with cunning, calculated guile. But the tune is an old tune. A remembered tune. And I sincerely hope a clearly remembered tune. You heard it in 1914. America listened to its piping then and let it lead us into the World War. It came from the same sources as it comes now and for the same purpose. It is a sorry tune—a mortally dangerous tune. But it cannot harm us if we but turn our backs upon the pipers and refuse to be misled; if we but insist upon a return to genuine neutrality instead of wasting breath discussing the pros and cons of a wholly unneutral position, such as the proposed legislation now before the Senate would have us adopt. The sorry old tune that led us into one war cannot lead us into another if we do not listen to it, cannot befuddle us if we refuse to forget the horrible pit into which it beguiled us when last it was sung. It cannot harm us unless we abandon one cardinal truth—that there is just one way to stay out of a war and that is to stay all the way out. Let me repeat that, my friends. Mark it well in your hearts and your brains for future reference. There is just one way to stay out of a war and that is to stay all the way out. All the way out! There stands the keystone of the very foundation of our hope for a continued peaceful existence. That is neutrality.

Woodrow Wilson, before his unfortunate defection from adherence to sound, historic American principles of neutrality, described America's relationship to the European war of 1914 in words equally descriptive of our relationship to the European war of today, words each and everyone of us should repeat to ourselves every time the blast of propaganda assails. Mr. Wilson saw—"the war as a distant event, terrible and tragic, but one which did not concern us closely," and he called upon the United States to be "impartial in thought as well as in action * * * neutral in fact as well as in name."

Neither the millions of words, the mountains of printed propaganda, the fiery speeches, nor all the other efforts now being made to accomplish or prevent the lifting of the arms embargo can have the slightest effect upon the unchangeable definition of genuine neutrality. No nation can remain half neutral and half partisan nor concern itself with the wars of other nations unless it invites war itself. Yet this Congress has been summoned to attempt to provide legislation that will enable America and Americans to be unneutral under the pretense of being neutral. For what sincerely neutral individual can deny the utter hypocrisy of what the administration is attempting to have Congress do?

And so, my friends, the Senators talk on and on and on and the mills of the propagandists roll and the sad and sorry tune of 1914 echoes again throughout our land. Allied propaganda, German propaganda, Russian propaganda, propaganda of all description, lies upon lies upon greater lies, befuddle and irritate and agitate Americans who have no business whatsoever anywhere but in America. Congress wastes millions of words and untold thousands of dollars and week upon week of time desperately needed for the solution of America's own problems, while it debates altering our laws in order to benefit this or that nation abroad; and all the while, all the desperate while, the welfare of our own land, the problems such as those of unemployment, of adequate provision for the care of our aged, of supplying the needy with food and with clothing and with opportunity to rise from destitution and again become self-respecting and self-supporting citizens of a self-respecting land—all these vital problems, ladies and gentlemen, are ignored and thrust aside even as the hapless are forgotten.

What nonsense this, to turn from our own suffering people, from our own economic misery, from our own war against poverty and injustice here at home, to excite ourselves and squander the time of our lawmakers over the self-created plight of people in some foreign land. What folly all this talk of sending war planes and armaments and munitions from a land so pitifully lacking in these very things as to be the laughingstock of the entire world. What madness to propose sending abroad the fruits of our factories and of our fields, the real wealth of our Nation, in return for gold and paper and promises never to be kept—what utter insanity this, when we have no slightest need for gold or paper or worthless promises, but do have such terribly dire need for all the fruits of our factories, all the fruits of our fields, all the wealth of our Nation, all we have with which to care for our own fellow Americans. How can true patriots speak of sending guns abroad when they lack guns for the protection of their own land? How can intelligent citizens consider sending war planes from a land pitifully unable to guard its own skies? How can sensible Americans wax excited over the fate of some distant nation, while their own fellow citizens, millions upon millions of them, face each day, uncertain of their very bread?

No, my friends, do not let the propagandists turn your heads and beguile you into turning your faces from your own land, from your own interests, from your own people, from your honest desire to dwell in peace and decency in a free and better America. Do not let all this furore about what goes on abroad blind you to what goes on at home. Do not forget that the gold now offered for the betrayal of your own national interest is "fool's gold," and we the fools who must pay the horrible penalty for the taking. Forget Europe and its troubles. Let's mind our own business and look about us at the sorry mess at home.

All the oratory streaming from the United States Senate isn't changing the American unemployment picture in the least. All the furore in Washington these days isn't having the slightest effect upon the sorry plight of our millions on relief. All the buzzing of brains and mouths among the big wigs isn't doing one particle of good toward supplying adequate care for the aged and the destitute and the other deserving citizens of America. And all the talk of supplying Europe with everything under the sun hasn't clothed an American back nor fed an American starveling, nor lessened the plight of one American unemployed citizen. There's talk enough of whom we should succor in Europe and how tough it is for the people of European nations, but there's no mention of how tough it is to be hungry and unemployed and destitute or old and penniless and dependent upon public relief right here in the United States of America.

Those are the things to be remembering, my friends—the things that are your business and mine. Let us remember that some 20,000,000 and more of our own people are living off Federal relief-supported jobs right now. Let us remember that millions upon millions of Americans are still waiting for a solution of the unemployment problem. Let us not forget the misery of honorable, self-respecting millions compelled to eat the horrid bread of public support right here within our own borders. Let us not forget that this very administration, now so eager to supply things to Europeans, hasn't been able to supply our own people with anything better than promises and the pap of existence wages for the millions after years of endless experimenting and spending and the saddling of America with a national debt that staggers the very imagination. And let us remember that we are not going to solve any of our own problems by running away from them or by letting ourselves be beguiled into minding somebody else's business while our own goes to pot.

We needn't go to Europe to get into a mess. We have one right here at home. And it's a mess that grows worse with every passing day. Forgetting it while we worry about the messes of England or France or Germany isn't going to improve matters one iota. And you can bet your bottom dollar that neither the people of England, France, Germany, nor any other foreign nation are worrying the least bit about the sad condition of America's unprotected aged, the hunger of American babies, the destitution of American workers, the millions of suits of clothes and tons of food nor the billions of other things Americans could use if American leadership were competent to solve America's own economic problems and find the way to get our idle mills and our idle earthly wealth back to work supplying America.

These are the problems, my fellow Americans, with which to occupy your thoughts—the American problems—this business here at home that affects the well-being and the future and the happiness and the comfort and the security of every one of us. These are the things for Americans to worry and fret and talk about, not the problems of Europe. Making America right, making America safe for ourselves and our loved ones, means keeping America out of war, out of foreign entanglements, out of other peoples' business.

So, as we strive to keep our thoughts American and our attention focused on the real issue presented to us by this foreign war madness, let us remember that every foreign war ever fought has been waged because of the ambition of some ruler, be he dictator or king or leader by any other designation, to secure territorial gains or trade supremacy. There may have been other causes or subterfuges offered but the real basic reason for foreign conflicts wherever and whenever fought has been the hope, the ambition and the aspiration of those in temporary control of governments to obtain material gain. Almost always, the song of idealism has been sung for the purpose of window dressing but back of the gilded front will always be found the sordid, grasping, and self-serving hand of imperialistic greed and avariciousness. Remember that it was only yesterday that France and England were delivering goods and materials of warfare to Germany and it was only a few hours ago that England made her trade agreement with Russia to deliver in return for Russian lumber, ton upon ton of British tin and British rubber, both of which are essential and critical war materials. Now, in the name of sweet reasonableness, what place does the ideology or philosophy of government have in this picture of international intrigue, materialistic selfishness, and double-crossing? Let us be Americans first and then saviors of the world only when the world shows some evidence of wanting to be saved. Let us profit by the example of that great neutral nation, Switzerland, and keep our American nose clean by remaining absolutely neutral and completely out of this foreign embroilment.

In closing, let me repeat again that there is just one way to stay out of a war and that is to stay all the way out. There stands the unalterable truth. With that securely in mind, fear not the poison of the propagandists, for truly the Good Book declares "* * * ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." To stay out of war is to stay all the way out. All the way out!

Until 2 weeks from tonight at the same time over this same station, good wishes and good night.

Let Us Be Genuine Neutrals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. MOUTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. MOUTON. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution No. 306, entitled "Neutrality Act of 1939," is a measure that should command the earnest consideration of all citizens of the Nation. It is of such import as to warrant careful study as well as full and free discussion. No person, whether in public life or otherwise engaged, should hesitate to express honest views that are informative and helpful. We have the good fortune to live in a democracy where liquidation before a firing squad or the terror of a concentration camp are not the consequence of free speech, a situation that, happily, permits presentation of both sides of the issue in detail, without restriction or limitation. As a consequence we have heard or read, over the radio, in legislative debate, or in the press, all of the views for and against the measure. And it is comforting to feel that in this somewhat tense situation, where the future welfare of the Nation may hang in the balance, alinements on both sides of the question are free from political partisanship, and that leaders here and elsewhere have expressed honest views without thought of political gain or loss.

It is my fervent hope that the people of the Nation, before forming definite opinions, will have due regard for the source and the motives behind some of the information being disseminated concerning this legislation. Two classes of individuals are lined up on one side or the other. There are those who are inspired by the loftiest motives and who sincerely and honestly believe that their convictions best serve the interests of their country. And then we find those whose opinions come from interests that are completely alien to the welfare of the Nation. The former are unselfish patriots, regardless of their views; the latter are unscrupulous hirelings, prepared to sell their birthright and their country for a mess of foreign pottage. The auspices under which they speak are most disarming. The organizations they represent, flaunt slogans featuring "peace," "Americanism," "democracy," and other alleged objectives designed to capture the unaware, the gullible, and the uninformed. For this reason it is important to know definitely who and what are behind these individuals and organizations that are busy attempting to mold public opinion one way or the other in connection with the measure.

I think it is important that we who are Members of this great legislative body take a definite stand with respect to the measure, and that our views, whether pro or con, be expressed clearly and without equivocation. This is no time for pussyfooting. The fate of civilization hangs in the balance. The future peace and security of the Western Hemisphere may well be at stake.

The issue involves the degree of our neutrality in the present European war. Most people in the Nation seem to be in accord on the proposition that neutrality must be of such a character as will insure against involvement in the war. Few Americans, in their right senses, could bring themselves to support a policy that would send the youth of the Nation to die on foreign battlefields. And we can be certain that our great President, knowing as he does the horrors of the last war, will not sponsor such a policy. Those who advocate repeal of the present neutrality law are convinced that its continuance on the statute books eventually will involve us in the war, while opponents of repeal—those who are against the measure now before us—are certain that the proposed change will draw us into that conflict. Repealists believe that we should adopt all measures necessary to avoid the possibility of participation in a military sense, but they feel that, as neutrals, our industries have the right and should be free to sell to any warring nation, provided sales are consummated here in the United States, provided merchandise so sold is paid for in cash and transported away from these shores in vessels not of American registry—in other words, picked up here and transported by vessels of the nations making the purchase. Those who think we should stand pat on existing law advocate what amounts to a virtual status of isolation so far as trade relations with the combatants are concerned. Such a course, they believe, is the only means for avoiding involvement.

Those of us who participated in the last war need no reminder of what happens to the youth of the Nation in these senseless conflicts. I served with the Marine Corps during that emergency and still am enrolled in the Marine Reserve. Experience at veterans' hospitals and with veterans' cases stamped indellibly on my memory, the utter horror and futility of it all. And I would be the last person to advocate a measure that in anywise and by any construction could lead our youth into another malestrom of blood and slaughter. And for that reason I have endeavored to examine both sides of the present issue calmly and dispassionately. I have weighed the possibilities of the proposed measure carefully, and I have tried also to view our position with respect to the present European war realistically.

Experience has taught that the nation well prepared—the nation with formidable defensive arms—need have but little fear of molestation by other powers. The present national-defense program makes for our security in that connection. And certainly no sane person in this country would have the temerity to advocate a war of aggression. We cherish no ambition for conquest; and regardless of the rather infantile radio pronouncement of one of our national heroes, we harbor no designs against any territory in this or in any hemisphere of the world's surface. That being the case, how could the occasion arise for the dispatch of our troops to any land beyond the limits of our own country? And is it logical to visualize the aggressor nations of the world—those with the lust of conquest—occupied as they now are, to invade our shores or possessions? And what basis would exist for an act of war against us? We know from what has transpired in Europe and in Asia that aggressor nations need no basis to justify acts of aggression when embarked on a policy of conquest. They make their own. But what, on the basis of international law or the known rules of war, would form the basis for an attack against our security?

I know of no precept of international law, or of any rule or regulation governing the conduct of war, which prohibits a neutral nation from commercial intercourse with combatant nations, provided that such commercial intercourse is strictly impartial and unbiased. Nor do I know of any precedent that enjoins neutral nations from selling merchandise of any type within the confines of their own borders to any nation whether combatant or noncombatant. Is it not a little illogical to argue that because there happens to be a war somewhere, in some part of the globe, nations in another part must immediately dismantle all machinery of commerce so far as that warring power is concerned? And is it not a bit unreasonable to ask that because of such a war neutral nations should stand by and witness the collapse of important export industries, the shutting down of factories, and the augmenting of unemployment rolls? Surely nobody can successfully argue that neutral nations in past wars followed such a course. Have not we had the spectacle, right in our own time, of Germany and Italy supplying nationalistic Spain with munitions and even men, and of Soviet Russia doing likewise for Loyalist Spain? And have not practically all of the nations of Europe supplied arms or other sinews of war to China in the present Asiatic war? And can it be said that any nation in the world has ever had any compunction about selling anything and everything possible to warring powers? Such a contention would fly right in the face of history. And right at the present, are not Germany and the Allied powers purchasing everything possible from the neutral nations of Europe? Apparently we are expected to be a sort of extraordinary suit-the-convenience-of-one-or-the-other-combatants neutral. The proposition that would close the doors to our commerce and industry, while other neutrals benefit by the open door, is so ridiculous as to be untenable not only in logic but in reason. Why should we not sell everything and anything we desire to sell within the limits of our national boundaries, and to all comers who have the wherewithal to lay the purchase price on the line, and the ships to transport it through the blockade or the submarine zones? Since when has any nation, any representative of a nation, or any organization backed by any alien power the right to tell our manufacturers, industrialists, or exporters, and the people of this Nation that because the nation they represent happens to be behind the military "eight ball" we must stifle commerce and industry within our borders, that we must close down manufacturing plants if necessary, and that we must abandon enterprises that give employment to thousands of our citizens?

Two thousand years ago, or more, the Chinese erected a great wall about the ancient kingdom. One thousand four hundred miles of solid masonry, 20 feet in height and with fortified towers every hundred yards, it was the most formidable defensive rampart of its age. No force was thought capable of penetrating it. When it was completed the Chinese sat back and contemplated their future with a sense of complete security. The kingdom, they thought, was safe forevermore. It was secure against assault or penetration by the ruthless, savage, barbarian hordes. But was it? Did isolation—did cutting itself off from the rest of humanity benefit China and the Chinese? The answer that history gives is in the negative. Isolation served neither to protect China from invasion nor to keep it out of war. On the contrary, it brought about a feeling of self-complacency and self-sufficiency that weakened the fiber of the people, lessened military vigilance, made the nation the more vulnerable to attack, and eventually brought the once great kingdom to the lowly status of an impotent power. And for centuries, the heritage of isolation—of the Great Wall—has been economic decay, nationalistic disintegration, and military vulnerability. Let those who would have us erect a figurative Chinese wall about our Nation look to the fate of China. And let them remember, too, that no nation ever was, or ever can be, self-sufficient long; and that especially, in these times of teeming populations in the industrial centers of the Nation, trade with the outside world must prevail and be profitable.

I favor House Joint Resolution 306 for many reasons, and I regard the arguments that it will serve to lead us to war as so much argumentative buncombe. If, as contended, sale of munitions and other sinews of war brought us to the last European conflict—and I do not believe that was as much the cause as the war madness and psychological stupidity of the German war lords—but if, as argued, such transactions did bring us into it, it was because our ships were used to transport the merchandise. The proposed measure would remove any likelihood of such a contingency in the present conflict by specifying that transport must be made by and in ships other than those under American registry. I favor the proposed measure because I feel that, under existing law, we penalize the power than can maintain a successful blockade—and a blockade is one of the recognized instruments of war. In other words, because the Allied Powers happen to have superiority at sea and can block off approaches to Nazi Germany, and because Nazi Germany cannot come here and purchase supplies, we are expected by those opposed to the bill to refuse to sell to the Allies, who are in a position to come and get supplies. Our position is that of a neutral, and a neutral is concerned, and should be concerned, with impartial dealings with all of the warring powers, and such a course, favoring Germany as it does, I submit, is not an impartial act of neutrality. The fact that Germany is blockaded is not our concern, so far as neutrality is concerned. Neither would it be our concern if the reverse were true and the Allies were blockaded.

I favor this measure because, frankly, like approximately 110,000,000 other Americans, I desire the forces of civilization to prevail over those of barbarity, savagery, brutality, and Godlessness. Because I choose to view the present conflict as a show-down between the democracies of the world and totalitarian forms of government—if it may be called government. Because I loathe and detest the type of man or men that crush liberty-loving peoples who are powerless to defend themselves; that advocate the rule of might over right; that take children and plant in their breasts the seeds of racial hatred, of brutality and Godlessness; and that persecute ruthlessly helpless people because they happen to be born of another race or religion.

Why We Must Keep Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, history does not repeat itself. It is we who repeat history. The mistakes, the follies, the absurdities of one generation are not automatic in their recurrence. Men must make the mistakes. They must commit the follies. They must be guilty of the absurdities if they are to occur.

One major truth has been revealed to the people of America by the brilliant neutrality duel in the United States Senate. In our country the spokesmen of our people are unanimously against war. Even those who regard England and France as fighting the battle of civilization and humanity are utterly opposed to military action by our people across the seas. We are united on this issue as we have never been before. And, in the course of the argument, too, it has become clear that neither the proponents of the arms embargo nor the advocates of cash and carry can claim that their position will guarantee the security of America.

What will determine our ability to remain out of this war is the attitude of the American people. Already the propaganda machinery has begun to function. A wave of "incidents" is already beginning to occur. Threats are being broadcast. Tales of sabotage are selling millions of newspapers daily. The campaign to rouse the Nation to fever heat in the American "white war of nerves" has already begun. All of this is designed to sway American public opinion, to prepare our minds to accept a war which is not of our choosing.

We must be on our guard if we are not to fall prey to this second edition of 1914–17. In all the turmoil which war must rouse everywhere, reason, logic, intelligence are the first to flee. Men become maddened by rage and hatreds. They lose sight of reality in a willingness to accept every tale of barbarism. No one denies for a moment that destruction undreamed of in years gone by is being perpetrated from the air. Innocent men, women, and children are being slaughtered in the streets. Yet before we rush hastily into the holocaust we must ask ourselves the vital question, "Will our participation in any way lessen the horrors we see across the ocean? Will we be able to prevent these things from occurring by stepping in ourselves, adding one more potential target to the already long list of eligible victims?"

The struggle of 1914–18 was portrayed to us in America as a battle between the forces of light and those of darkness. Wilhelm was described as a modern Attila. His forces were labeled "Huns." We entered that war to save the world for democracy and peace. The fight was the same, though the "isms" were differently named. We have seen the cost of that war. Our participation achieved nothing, because we refused to impose our will upon the entire European continent. We are still refusing to impose our will across the seas. The only result of this war will be another temporary redrafting of the map of Europe. Peace will not be assured until the power politics of the Old World are replaced by an honest desire for justice and fairness, taught through generations of education.

For our people to rush headlong into this conflict will be to spread the ruin of civilization from the mother countries of the Old World to the New. Our culture must be preserved. It will not be preserved by armed force.

Keep Out of Europe—Let's Solve Our Own Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, there is not a man or woman in America today who does not find himself deeply concerned over the happenings in Europe. War, wherever it may occur, has always called forth the sympathy and charity of our people. The victims, whether they were on the side of those whose cause we supported or on the side of those whose conduct we condemned, were always certain to find us generous and tolerant. In the face of human suffering, the people of our Nation have always responded nobly. To the International Red Cross, to the relief of refugees, the United States has contributed more freely and less questioningly than any people on earth. No one can deny or doubt the motives of this Nation.

In the last great World War we were the only participant whose purposes were entirely free from self-seeking advantage. We sought no territory, no new people to govern, no money, at the conference of Versailles, no matter what naïveté we may have displayed, our representatives worked only to carve out a just peace. That they did not succeed was not their fault. We were innocent lambs at a dinner of wolves.

The world is once more engaged in the process of choosing up sides for another vast conflict. How utterly sordid the nations of Europe have become in their battle for power must be apparent at a glance. Allies are frankly bought up by promises of financial aid, by pledges of territorial acquisitions. Calmly and insolently whole nations are wiped off the map by even the most "civilized" peoples. At Munich, Britain and France agreed to the destruction of Czechoslovakia, the only important democratic state in central Europe. In the nonintervention farce which they played with Spain, the Spanish Republic was equally destroyed. To those who argue that the war today is the battle for the preservation of a democratic principle, these illustrations must constitute a damning exhibit A in rebuttal.

This is clearly not our war. We have ours right here in the United States. It is a war which the President of the United States himself recognized only a few brief years ago as a war whose outcome was vital to the future of our people. For almost 10 years the number of our unemployed has remained constant in the neighborhood of 10,000,000. Ten million wage earners out of a job mean more than 30,000,000 men, women, and children living under desperate circumstances. It means 3,000,000 workers on W. P. A., getting along on a bare subsistence level. It means 7,000,000 families struggling to "get by" on direct relief, meager old-age pensions, or family loans. It means farmers unable to market their products at a fair price, driving them in turn to Federal agencies for the basic necessities of their lives. America has troubles of its own when its farmers must borrow funds to purchase seed for a crop which it may not pay to harvest.

This is our war in the United States. We have unemployment brooding like a vulture over the land, waiting for the weak, the unfortunate to fall by the wayside.

We have, too, a growing menace to the spirit of friendly cooperation which has made possible the American standard of living. Labor and capital are standing at opposite sides of the pit, like gamecocks awaiting their release to spring at each other's throat. The horror of class conflict, with labor suspicious of capital, and capital hostile to labor, is developing before our eyes. We see one branch of labor gathering recruits in an effort to destroy another. We find public officials in this great classless democracy frankly wondering whether or not class warfare is wholly undesirable. There are growing numbers of our people who regard continued economic privation as a sure step toward bitter internal dissension here at home. Millions of men and women, faced by continued difficulties, have come to regard themselves as proletarians, a description packed with the most dangerous social dynamite.

This is our war in the United States, a war on unemployment, a battle to restore peace between industry and labor, to rebuild the feeling of cooperation which made our country's progress possible.

Right here in our great country there are millions of families whose resources are so limited that they cannot face 30 days of unemployment. There are millions more who could manage for 2 to 6 months. Over half our people could not survive for even 1 year if their job holders were suddenly thrown out of work.

Despite our years of prosperity, despite our amazing mechanical achievements, we are still on the border line of national economic collapse. No other term will do. Our people are so far removed from social security that they fall victims to every get-rich-quick proposal. They succumb to the temptation of the New Deal to spend our way back to prosperity. Our vision becomes obscured by one financial mirage after another. Why fight abroad? These are enemies to rout right here.

Statisticians present evidence of sickness, undernourishment, to the American people. We know that there must be more sickness, more undernourishment, in lands not favored as we have been. Yet everyone admits that these are evils which we must eliminate at home before we venture abroad.

These are no more serious than the pestilences of economic disaster. When a mother finds her child ill upon his bed she does not rush to attend the sick neighbor. Her concern is with her own. Europe is sick today; perhaps deathly sick. The contagion is spreading. It is leaping the boundaries of the oceans, infecting our shores as well as its own. We must build for ourselves stout bulwarks against the invader.

There is but one way in which we may resist the plague. We must build up for ourselves an immunity which will repel the poisoned virus. To build this immunity will require the work of every available man, woman, and child in our land. We shall have none to spare for foreign conflicts. We shall require the mobilization of all our people in a vast army of thriving, healthy citizens.

They must be given economic health first. Jobs to keep our people employed are the only assurance we can have of the safety of our Republic. Work to raise the standard of American living is the guaranty of our future civilization. Funds in the husband's bank account to secure the continuity of his family's well-being will do what cannon and bullets can never do. They will make life instead of destroying it.

This is America's war. It is a war of social reconstruction rather than a war of ammunition. It is a war to end uncertainty, to prove to the world that a great nation, devoted to its traditions, can achieve happiness, contentment, and the advancement of civilization. The people of America are ready to fight their own war. They are ready to join forces in the battle to end unemployment, to achieve security, to conquer illness. Europe's misery is a source of the greatest pain and sorrow to us. We have nothing but pity in our hearts for those who must suffer innocently because a handful of men are arrogant and cruel. But our job is here at home. It is our business to solve our own problems before we contemplate solving those of others.

Americans, these are our problems—unemployment, industrial warfare, social insecurity, disease, hopelessness. This is our war. Let us win it on our own soil. Let us demand that our National Government fight America's battles before we fight Europe's.

The Way Out for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ARTICLE BY PAUL C. SMITH, EDITOR OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, during the interim recess of the Congress there appeared in the columns of the San Francisco Chronicle, one of the Nation's greatest newspapers, an article from the capable pen of Paul C. Smith which, I am certain, will excite the interest and engross the attention of the entire country.

Because of the timeliness of that concerning which Mr. Smith wrote, the forcefulness of his comments, and the cogency of his suggestions, I ask the unanimous consent of the membership of the House of Representatives to include Mr. Smith's article which he has entitled "The Way Out for America" in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Smith's article follows:

THE WAY OUT FOR AMERICA

(By Paul C. Smith)

ARTICLE I

America, our America, is the one nation in the world of today with a destiny brimful of hope. It is the one nation of the earth which can preserve the ideals of democracy—we the one people capable of mobilizing our forces in bristling defense of liberty—the one people able to construct a citadel of human progress out of a rickety modern civilization.

To save not only America but the entire world, we but need to captain our soul and master our fate.

We need only to know where we are, realize who we are, and determine where we are going.

The American people have unlimited "guts," intelligence, and imagination. Action and leadership can and must guide this driving power toward a solution of our economic and social problems, and America will not only save herself but will be a symbol of the whole world's hope.

There are omnipotent human forces in America, and raw materials from which those forces may fashion the greatest civilization in the known history of the world. Application and coordinated direction of our inexhaustible supply of spiritual, moral, and intellectual energy will bring America out of the woods under her own power, leading the rest of a confused world by the hand.

At times we do not realize our own strength. I have just examined America, and in every nook and cranny of this great Nation I find the power to fulfill a destiny which is our obligation to modern civilization—a power vested in the whole American people.

I find moral strength, spiritual hunger, humor, tolerance, and fortitude in a youth craving but one thing—leadership.

Fundamentally, there is but one burning desire searing the breasts of the unemployed—the desire for a chance to work as productive units in the reconstruction of America.

Basically, there is but one real yearning in the hearts of the "underprivileged" the yearning for a decent place in a decent society of free men.

Primarily, there is but one basic passion governing the brains of the "privileged" the passion to go over the top for their country, if leadership will but plot an American course across a no man's land pocked and pitted with isms and theories.

Yes, of course, there are exceptions; but they are exceptions which only prove the rule, for these are the true, elemental characteristics of the present American state of mind.

These are the real, deep-rooted feelings of the American people of 1939; these the desires, the yearnings, the hopes. And the desires can be achieved, the yearnings satisfied, the hopes realized.

America has before it an exciting, thrilling chance to lead the world of today and to create the civilization of tomorrow. America can do it, will do it, must do it.

We are a greater people, a better people, a sounder people today than we were 10 years ago. The depression of the past decade has been good for us. It has been hard, but it has kicked the smugness out of us. We are ready now, we are rugged enough now to hit the hard trail out of the wilderness, and we can find that trail; we can blaze it for the entire world to follow.

We can conquer the forces of deep reaction which lie today in ambush of the American people. We can vanquish the despair and chaos of Communist destruction; defeat the oppression and indignities of fascism.

The Roman Empire collapsed because it got pudgy and soft. The French aristocrats lost their heads because they were heedless, lazy, and self-indulgent. Those democracies of the world which have blundered into the limbo of history were lost only because of the pudginess, laziness, and selfishness of their citizens.

It is an axiom of history that a nation will go to pieces every time its citizens lie down and forget what their nation is about. There is no reason to let that happen here. America is too young, too alive, its citizens too alert for our leaders to permit such a disaster to overtake us.

We do not need any new revolution here in America. All we need do is finish the job we started with the American Revolution of 1776. All we need do is remember that the fundamental strength of that revolution is not destruction, but creation.

America has been built by the implements of creation; not by the hammers of destruction.

If we lose sight of that truth, we shall lose both the ideals and material objectives of the American Revolution. But if we keep that truth alight we can win the American fight our fathers began to wage at Lexington a few years back.

Remember Donn Fendler? Donn is a 11-year-old Boy Scout who was a sensation on the east coast 3 weeks ago. Straying from camp, he got lost in the thick woods of Maine. After 6 days the searching parties gave him up for dead. The afternoon of the eighth day Donn stumbled, naked and emaciated, into a summer camp on a remote creek 45 miles from the point of his disappearance.

"I ate wild berries and sometimes found water in stagnant pools. I found a little dry creek on the side of the mountain, and knew it must go somewhere, so I followed it," he said.

Donn was a mass of insect stings, his wiry little legs lacerated by rock and brush cuts. His clothes has been torn completely off as he crawled day after day through thick underbrush. Wild animals howled at him from the pitch blackness of midforest nights.

"Sometimes I got scared and pretty weak, but I guess I'm all right now," Donn told reporters after he had staggered out of the forest under his own power.

"Donn, I love you," was all his choking father could say when the boy was finally returned. Sure. America loves Donn, because Donn is the real America.

And it is because that kid is the real America, that America can fight its way through the woods in which we are lost, even if the searching parties have given up hope.

There is no economic bramble too tough, no social cut too deep, no political sting too poisonous, no wild howl too calamitous to keep us from coming through under our own power, if we but give form and force to our full quota of plain American guts.

But one thing more. Donn came through in the last analysis not only because of his typical American fortitude but because he found a line of direction and followed it.

Remember Donn: "I found a little dry creek on the side of the mountain and knew it must go somewhere, so I followed it."

That was resourcefulness, as well as courage. Donn had a little knowledge. He applied it. He made a decision, and he had the nerve to stick to that decision. He didn't leave his line of direction, once it was established in his mind. He didn't eat a wild berry and sit whimpering by the bush waiting for Providence to grow another.

Parched and dry, he didn't lie by the first stagnant pool he found, afraid to leave for fear he would never find another.

The howls of the wild animals scared Donn, yes; but there can be no courage where there is no fear. He overcame his fear and fought his way back to civilization.

America will do that, too. America can do it and will do it.

America is ready for the solution. Americans are prepared for any supreme sacrifice, any effort that will transform the abstractions of today's democracy into a concrete fortress of liberty and human dignity.

And there is a solution. A visionary solution, yes; but a practical, workable solution which the American people themselves have the power to unfold.

ARTICLE II

From the American people—from you and you and you—can come the will and the plan by which America may be saved from the false things which menace the existence of our Nation.

The class conflict, the hate, the strife, the intolerance, the demagogy which have become a part of American life during the past 10 years are not representative of the spirit of America today.

The real America is sick of all those false and malicious forces, tired of their destructive handiwork. America is prepared to take up the implements of creation, and work and fight toward a better civilization.

The first step in development of the will and the plan is for the people to demand that certain leaders of American group, class, and partisan opinion gather together round a conference table with this express intention.

First. To establish a national unity of purpose by reaching agreement upon a clear, comprehensible definition of the principles and objectives of present-day American democracy, which definition shall be called the doctrine of American democracy, or simply the doctrine.

Second. To solve the problem of mass unemployment within the framework of the doctrine.

The first will give the American people a clear understanding of the high purpose for which they live. The second will build a sound material foundation for the spiritual quality of the doctrine.

This can be done and shall be done if the people themselves—and, to repeat, that means you and you—will put their unlimited moral strength behind a simple but specific movement to set up the machinery necessary to accomplish the job practically and realistically.

That specific movement begins with a request to the President of the United States to initiate one simple, unselfish, nonpartisan action; simple, unselfish, nonpartisan, and so high-purposed as to make for him a permanent place in the all-enduring honor roll of world history.

The request will be that the President shall appoint, at the earliest possible date, a 25-member advisory commission which will be called the "all-American council."

The membership of the all-American council shall be as follows:

Council chairman, Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, Chief Justice, United States Supreme Court.

Herbert Hoover, former President of the United States.

John L. Lewis, president, Congress of Industrial Organizations.

William Green, president, American Federation of Labor.

Eleanor Roosevelt.

Robert Gordon Sproul, president, University of California.

William Gibson Carey, Jr., president, United States Chamber of Commerce.

Howard Coonley, president, National Association of Manufacturers.

Harry L. Hopkins, United States Secretary of Commerce.

Robert M. Hutchins, president, University of Chicago.

Roy W. Howard, publisher, Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Owen D. Young, chairman of board, General Electric Co.

Harper Sibley, agriculturist and industrialist.

Thomas J. Watson, president, International Chamber of Commerce.

Jesse H. Jones, Federal Loan Administrator.
Morris Fishbein, editor, American Medical Association Journal.
Nicholas Murray Butler, president, Columbia University.
Charles A. Beardsley, president, American Bar Association.
Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., chairman of the board, United States Steel Corporation.
Wetmore Hodges, rancher, industrialist, former Harvard professor.
William S. Knudsen, president, General Motors Corporation.
J. J. Pelley, president, Association of American Railroads.
George McGregor Harrison, chairman, Railway Labor Executives' Association.
Edward A. O'Neal, director, American Farm Bureau Federation.
Stephen F. Chadwick, national commander, American Legion.

This commission, immediately after its appointment, shall meet at Philadelphia where, on September 5, 1774, the First Continental Congress met to breathe the life of liberty and independence into the twitching body of an infant nation.

Its members shall be guided by the same unselfish wisdom and tolerance that led the founding fathers to resolve their differences to a common purpose that America might become a nation of freemen.

The members of the all-American council shall not surround themselves with batteries of secretaries, body servants, or personal entourages. They shall meet simply as great Americans with the unlimited power of the American people behind them.

They shall meet because they have recognized the President's appointment as a command from the whole American people. The President himself shall have made the appointments regardless of superficial personal feelings and at the command of the people.

Thus will be assembled the leaders of the most influential economic and social groups in the Nation, the leaders of great spheres of class and factional thought. They can and will weld conflicting views into a unified American philosophy of action.

Without tolerance, without understanding, without unity, these 25 Americans represent battle commanders in the destructive war of American against American. With tolerance, understanding, and unity they represent the general staff of an invincible American army prepared to grapple with any destroyer of modern civilization.

There is nothing remotely impossible of achievement about the vision of these Americans sitting together around a table. Of course, seated together for the first time, some at first will be embarrassed by the record of bitter public opposition to each other.

But the embarrassment will soon pass, for within the heart of each is honesty of purpose, within the brain of each the capacity to create—and creation is the first principle of the American Revolution.

Each is a hard fighter for what he believes to be right, each able and tough like the vast majority of the American people.

That is why each has risen to his present position of group leadership. Now, guided always by tolerant understanding of the true spirit of America, each may rise with the help of the others to new pinnacles of national leadership.

Each, being of the American people, is fundamentally fair and square. And most important of all, any close study of the great public records of all will reveal that common denominators of understanding already exist among them.

There is plenty of ground, both philosophic and material, upon which these leaders of American factional opinion may meet at once for the common good of the whole American people. More ground will be discovered as soon as they come together in their first session.

Perhaps some change in the list of proposed members is possible, but no change should be made which would menace the theory of representation for the socially and economically important elements of the American struggle.

In the initial stages of the work of the all-American council, superficial differences shall be put aside in the approach to all questions entering into development of the doctrine. However, the council need not be asked to pass any judgment to the American people which does not meet with the approval of the whole council. Force and form still can be given to American life by a doctrine developed even under these human limitations.

Now is the time to weld the works of 10 years of class struggle into a solid structure of national unity, and this all-American council can accomplish the job. It can and will be done by unselfish effort, and with the American people behind the council, the destructive conflict of American against American shall be brought to an end, and the new spirit of unity and creation will drive our people onward to a new place in the history of civilization.

Is this not better, is this not wiser, than having our childish class struggles brought to an end by some one man on horseback, who even now may be lurking in an obscure corner of the wilderness through which we wander so aimlessly?

By raising themselves above partisan politics and restricted class consciousness, the American people can, through the machinery of this all-American council, unseat any of the little men who might attempt to "ride horseback" into the American scene of today and tomorrow.

The will and the power of the people can create the all-American council, and with the moral support of the people of the council can materialize America's innate power to stop class conflict, arrest the forces of degradation, and demonstrate to the world how a great Nation can be made greater without hate and intolerance, oppression, and bloodshed.

Shall we call these leaders to the supreme service of America?

ARTICLE III

Meeting primarily to establish a national unity of purpose by agreeing upon a modern doctrine of American democracy and to solve the problem of mass unemployment within the framework of the doctrine, our all-American council, named yesterday in these articles, should hold its first session in Philadelphia, near the site of old Carpenters' Hall, where, on September 5, 1774, the founding fathers met as delegates to the First Continental Congress.

Hovering over the council table, as Chairman Charles Evans Hughes calls the meeting to order, will be the spirits of George Washington, Patrick Henry, John and Samuel Adams, John Dickinson, Roger Sherman, Christopher Gadsden, the Rutledges, and the others who modified their personal views and subdued their factional animosities, that the raw Colonies might be assembled into a strong young nation.

The fathers will be thinking of that nation, still young and strong, when they murmur into the ears of the all-American council of 1939: "We met here at the birth of the United States of America. There were personal and class disagreements among us, too, but we laid down the foundations for the great nation with whose very life you now are concerned. We laid the cornerstone of the great structure it is your duty to complete. Put your disagreements aside and go about the job of fulfilling the hopes of our day and the fervent prayer of yours."

The chairman of the all-American council, Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, a great judicial statesman, will at once realize his responsibility. He will be self-effacing, tolerant, strong, will seek no publicity and no glory.

Under his leadership the discussion will begin, at first uneasily, then more intently, but with increasing ease. Warm courtesy, and again tolerance, will be the governing spirit from the very beginning of the deliberations.

There will be no gallery to play to, no inclination to play to it were there one.

The press, in a spirit of cooperation, will wait outside for jointly issued announcements of progress.

The initial meeting will not break up at lunch. Trays will be brought in, from which the members of the all-American council will eat lightly that first noon, preoccupied with sudden realization of the full power of joint discussion of problems with which, till now, most had been concerned only as leaders of factional thought.

Late that first night the members will emerge from the council room, not tired and haggard, but brightened and stimulated by the day's discussion.

A brief written statement will be handed the waiting press, and no individual member will make any additional comments. The statement probably will say: "We have uncovered many points of common understanding. We believe we can announce an agreed formula for American progress some time within the next few days."

There will be no additional comment, but the country will need none, for John L. Lewis, William Green, Herbert Hoover, and Owen D. Young, by coincidence perhaps, emerge from the council room together. They stand for the photographers and, though silent for the moment, the very pictures, distributed throughout the Nation, broadcast a mute but eloquent message to a waiting, hopeful people.

The all-American council convenes again next day and plods through the whole maze of group and factional opinion, on to a definition of national purpose. After a few days the press is called in for a momentous announcement. The all-American council has developed a doctrine of American democracy, to which each of its members subscribes.

The doctrine is released to the press and broadcast to the American people.

Copies are transmitted immediately to the President of the United States, who orders the doctrine telegraphed to every Member of Congress and conveyed to every member of Federal, State, county, and municipal governments in the United States.

"This is the code by which we shall live," John L. Lewis telegraphs as he dispatches the doctrine to his regional C. I. O. leaders for distribution to the membership.

"This is the philosophy of our lives as American citizens," wires William Green as he hastens to inform the officials of A. F. of L. labor councils of the new guide to American order.

The Republican Party and the Democratic Party immediately arrange to insert the doctrine into their platforms.

The United States Chamber of Commerce broadcasts the doctrine to their hundreds of units throughout the Nation, and local chambers of commerce meet by the thousands to set up the doctrine as a living, vital force in the conduct of local business affairs.

The Manufacturers' Association spreads the word throughout its membership, and a new tone immediately vibrates throughout the vast industrial machinery of the Nation. The economic heartbeat of America paces up.

All organizations not directly represented on the all-American council meet to embrace the doctrine and affiliate themselves in spirit with the work of the council.

The school children and university students of the Nation absorb the doctrine as the philosophic formula for modern American citizenship.

Labor, capital, the arts and crafts, Republicans, Democrats, farm and city, rich and poor, rally round the doctrine as the guiding principles of American democracy, the blueprint for a new and greater Nation.

And from this rallying point, in this high-spirited, hopeful atmosphere the all-American council proceeds to the job of solving American democracy's No. 1 social and economic problem—mass unemployment.

Relief of the unemployed continues, of course; but it is no longer approached as a hopeless, perpetual, national handicap.

The captains of industry and finance, the leaders of labor, working within the spirit of the doctrine and through the machinery of the all-American council, go about releasing the unlimited stores of economic energy lying latent within the borders of the now greatest and most high-spirited democracy within the known history of the world.

Problems are met head-on as problems and not as questions of partisan prejudice. Only honest information is dealt with, honest and complete.

Congress is called back into session by the President as the all-American council reaches agreement on necessary legislative reforms. Congress, working within the spirit of the doctrine, effects the legislative changes advised by the council free from the myopic interferences of regional pressure groups.

The great obsolescence in the vast American industrial plant is to be restored through cooperation among the potent group forces now welded together into an omnipotent national power.

The rich store of new inventions banked in the technical laboratories of the Nation is released under the impetus of a revived spirit of confidence and mutual understanding.

The whole system of production and distribution is given a thorough overhauling by the great experts on the all-American council, who seek and get the advice of many of the other great experts of the Nation.

This phase of the work of the council will take time, but piece by piece the national economy is studied, and recommendations are made to the legislative and administrative divisions of government, to industry and science, and from it all emerges an American chart for the contemporary road to a better future.

The all-American council continues to function as an advisory board; government, agriculture, business, and labor go about executing the proposals of the council under the guiding principles of the doctrine of American democracy, and a new day dawns.

The Nation forges ahead, its boundless energies directed by a unified consciousness of destiny. There is employment for all employables, liberty for all men within the democratic framework of the doctrine.

America marches on, and the oppressive, despotic dictatorships of the world crumble before its shining brilliance.

Armageddon is averted without bloodshed, and the dignity of the human race is restored, bringing with it a new and greater civilization.

Through it all looms America, an example to the brotherhood of nations approaching in importance the example of Jesus to the brotherhood of man.

Visionary? Yes; of course.

But America must do it, will do it, can do it.

The whole thing is largely up to you—you as an individual and as an American.

ARTICLE IV

Where are we, who are we, where are we going?

If America is to achieve her destiny, preserve the ideals of democracy, mobilize in defense of liberty, construct a citadel of human progress out of a rickety modern civilization, that question must be answered.

The answer must put before the American people a national unity of purpose, the vision of a goal to be achieved. And from the vision and the will shall come the energy and the fortitude to evolve a social and economic order based upon the principles of creation and equality of opportunity.

These articles, of which this is the fourth and final for the time being, have not attempted to give that answer. They merely have suggested a method by which the answer can be found. This fourth article is a frank talk with you about that method.

Probably the suggestion is not perfect in detail. Human ideas, human methods, human institutions seldom are. But is it a better method, is it a better way to find the trail out of the wilderness than any methods now being pursued?

Is it better to exhaust our energies and our resources in a senseless struggle with each other, ignoring the real forces progressively attacking our institutions, or is it better to combine our energies and our resources in protection from the forces of destruction?

Is it not better to create than to destroy? Is it not better to displace a weak institution with something stronger and better, rather than to exhaust our national energies in destruction without replacement?

Is it not better to live in peace and amity than in strife and hate?

Is it not healthier to live dynamically and purposefully, rather than statically and without purpose?

Each of us will answer these questions but one way, of course. Our aims, our ideals, our hopes, our desires are the same, generally speaking.

Then what is all the shouting about?

The shouting usually is about methods, only rarely about fundamental differences in objectives.

The fundamental goal of most Americans is to preserve and improve the capitalistic economic order and the democratic political order. It is a twofold job, but it is one job, with one purpose—a better ordered civilization.

That is why this method, the machinery of an all-American council, has been suggested.

That is what is behind the selection of personnel for the proposed council.

Many will object to some of the selections. Perhaps the council should be larger. Perhaps it should be smaller. Perhaps there should be substitutions made for some of the names suggested. Perhaps women should have more representation. Certainly some method should be evolved for giving the youth of the country a better representation.

But it should be remembered above all that the primary aim is to bring the giants of industry, agriculture, labor, and government together, in the belief that a definition of common purpose and a modern doctrine of democracy will emerge.

The primary aim is to find the way to end the class struggle, uncover the unquestionable facts of a complex, modern life, and drive that spirit of tolerance and mutually accepted truth forward to the common good.

The professional little mercenaries of the class war will not like it, of course. Where are they if class war is stamped out of American life?

The small-minded, predatory, stuffed shirts will not like it, of course. Where are they in an order where ability is rewarded and equality of opportunity prevails?

The intellectually dishonest political demagogue will not like it, naturally. Where is he in an America of high moral tone, unlimited spiritual quality, and mental honesty? Where is he in an America whose works are inspired by a single, high democratic purpose?

But those people are few and far between in America. Most difference of opinion in this country is honest difference of opinion; most opponents sincere in their opposition to each other.

There are common denominators of understanding, however, which may be realized by such men when they get together. That is why the all-American council need not be balanced perfectly in its numerical representation of group opinion, for it will not be necessary for the council to codify principles which are not acceptable unanimously to the council.

Even under this limitation, such a council will be capable of giving form and force and purpose to American life.

Even under this limitation, such a council can do much to find the answer to the question, "Where are we; who are we; where are we going?"

Would it not be better, for example, for such a council to spend a few millions for jointly directed research to get the facts, instead of the Nation continuing to dissipate billions in response to factional pressures stemming from no factual knowledge?

These things can be done. This series of articles, representing but a suggestion from one humble American, barely has scratched the surface of possibilities.

Let skepticism and cynicism be thrust aside for one brief hour of our lives while each of us explores the possibilities with his own mind.

There has been much discussion of moral rearmament. This is one way to implement the purposes of moral rearmament. And the crisis in America is primarily moral.

There is hate and intolerance abroad in the world. Not one of us but all of us like to think we would make most any sacrifice to rid the world of hate and intolerance and oppression.

This is our chance to make of America a brilliant example to the world, a world which wants to live without hate and intolerance and oppression, but doesn't know how. This is our chance really to avert war.

But these things cannot be done without the spiritual force and the moral energy of the American people behind the effort.

The first step is for all of us, each of us, to rally round the general idea.

The second step is for all of us, each of us, to make his hope and his desire known to the President of the United States, for he is the man with the power to bring American group leadership together in this great common effort. And American group leadership cannot and will not let the American people down.

Write it, think it, talk it, live it, and some such program will become a vital force in the direction of American life.

It is through your energy that the all-American council can be put to the job of finding the answer to the question, "Who are we; where are we; where are we going?"

If you act now and don't give up, America can do it, will do it, must do it!

The Revenue Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERE COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. HANES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by Hon. John W. Hanes, Under Secretary of the Treasury:

In the fiscal year 1939 the Federal Government spent $9,268,000,000 and collected in total revenues $5,668,000,000, leaving an excess of expenditures of $3,600,000,000. The 1939 situation was not unique. There had been similar years in the past and we may face similar ones in the future.

I am going to pass over many important questions: to assume without argument the present level of expenditures, and also without argument the necessity over the long run of meeting expenditures with equal revenues.

There have been many periods before in our history when our Government faced serious financial problems. In fact, our first Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, faced the task of bringing the public credit out of chaos and of providing a revenue system which would produce sufficient funds to pay operating expenses, and interest on the debt, and to retire that debt systematically. The picture today is greatly enlarged. But it is the same kind of problem. The annual revenues for the first 10 years of our national life averaged only about $6,000,000. The problem was met successfully then, as is shown by the fact that there were times before the Civil War and in the 1880's when the revenues were more than adequate to meet the needs and when fiscal policies were adopted to dispose of surplus revenues rather than to secure new ones.

The prospect of greatly increasing our revenue appears more difficult today. The functions and cost of government have increased both absolutely and also relatively to our national income. We no longer rely merely on customs duties as we did before the Civil War or on customs and taxes on tobacco and liquor, as we did for several decades after the Civil War. Our taxes have reached out in many directions.

If the present cost of government is to be maintained at present national income levels, the problem is to get an additional three or four billion dollars without regard to the need for funds to retire outstanding debt. In order to answer the question—How are we going to raise the additional money?—it is necessary to look first at existing taxes from which we received approximately five and one-half billion dollars in 1939.

One great source of revenue has been the personal income tax which produced about $1,000,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939. A second is the corporation taxes which produced approximately $1,277,000,000. A third source is the estate tax with its related gift tax, which brought in $361,000,000.

The remainder of Federal revenues, exclusive of pay-roll taxes, amounted to $2,094,000,000 in 1939, deriving from excise taxes on sales and other transactions, most important of which were liquor, $588,000,000; tobacco, $580,000,000, or about the same amount; sales taxes on other manufactured products, $397,000,000; miscellaneous taxes, $210,000,000; and customs duties, $319,000,000. But suppose we tried raising existing rates sufficiently to produce the additional amount. The personal income tax is often suggested as the method. In recent months many have said that the way to increase our revenue is to broaden the income-tax base by lowering personal exemptions. As a matter of taxation principle, I subscribe to that for two reasons: First, the added revenue; second, the tax consciousness that would result. We might be able to substitute direct for indirect taxation. If and when the tax is made visible, the citizen starts challenging the disposition of his money. That is all to the good. Broadening of the base might operate as a brake on the ever-upward tendency which even in peacetime has brought us to where 22 cents out of every dollar of national income is needed to pay for government—Federal, State, and local; 9 cents being strictly Federal.

Various exemption levels have been suggested; among them perhaps most frequently, $800 for single persons and $2,000 for married couples. Quite aside from the advantages which might flow from bringing into our income system approximately 1,500,000 new taxpayers, it should be pointed out that this will not produce very much additional revenue. Perhaps $60,000,000, of which less than one-fourth would come from the new taxpayers. If all of a widely discussed group of amendments were enacted, we would increase the revenue by less than $250,000,000. That would certainly be something. But not enough.

Substantial increases in income-tax revenues might be produced by increasing the rates, which now range from 4 to 79 percent. Any increases would have to be in the middle and lower brackets since the upper brackets are perhaps already too high for the production of maximum revenue. In my opinion, they have passed the point of diminishing returns. That involves the matter of tax-exempt securities and other elements which I should like to discuss at length but cannot in the time allotted. Thus, if we try to collect twice the present amount from the personal income tax, the middle, and especially the lower brackets, would need to be more than doubled and in some cases much more than trebled. It would require a brutal increase in rates to produce as much as $1,000,000,000 additional revenue at the national income level for 1939.

The corporation income rate, except on the smaller corporations, is 18 percent, an all-time high. Even if we doubled that rate, and if, for purposes of argument, no diminution resulted in tax base or revenue elsewhere, the increase would be only $1,125,000,000.

Estate and gift taxes run as high as 70 percent. Here again an enormous rise in rates, especially in the middle and lower brackets, would produce not more than $400,000,000.

Thus, outside the sales or excise taxes, we cannot hope to raise more than about $2,500,000,000, even with rates more drastic than have ever been seriously contemplated. To bring in that much at present national income levels would require really shocking tax increases and would, I believe, defeat the object sought.

No matter how heavily we tax we cannot raise three or four billion dollars from present sources unless we get more on which to levy. That means more business, more employment, more national income; and I am convinced that this is the only logical way to improve our financial situation if we are to maintain our present economic system.

We now have the most powerful tax system in our history. If we could put substantially all our present unemployed back to work, the accompanying increase in national income would go far toward solving the problem. If, for example, the national income should rise to $80,000,000,000, the revenue would be about $8,000,000,000 instead of $5,000,000,000. Such an income would automatically decrease the necessity for many types of public expenditures, such as, for example, unemployment relief, which should decrease as national income increases.

All of us in government and in private life must put our emphasis on adding to the national income. We must realize that since we live in a capitalistic system the healthy business of the country is our business; that without volume we go broke because of the overhead, whether the business be private or public.

After taking all possible precautions and setting up all possible regulations against bad and crooked business, let us find every means we can devise to encourage honest business.

I contend it is equally to the interest of every private citizen and every official in every branch of our Government—Federal, State, and local—to add the weight of his influence to the recovery of business in every legitimate line.

You, the American public, have the final control. Demands from back home upon the Congress for more and more Federal expenditures, for less and less needed projects, are at least a partial source of our difficulties.

We have developed in our country a $10,000,000,000 appetite with a $5,000,000,000 pocketbook. I think our problem is not so much when we balance the Budget as where. In other words, how much Federal expenditure are you going to demand and how do you propose that the Government raise the funds? In the Treasury we can only deal with the problem after appropriations have been made.

Remember that the Members of Congress have been elected by you. They are the servants of their constituents. Every effort on your part to put your shoulder to the administration of your local affairs and your intelligence to their direction will most certainly clarify your collective opinions to your representatives in government. Every effort to take up the enormous slack of unemployment through enterprising expansion of your personal affairs will inevitably have cumulative effect toward increasing the national income, and it cannot fail to diminish proportionately the direct financial burdens which must of necessity now be levied upon you by your Government.

A True Neutrality

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

ADDRESS BY HENRY S. FRASER

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the following address by Henry S. Fraser before the Association of New York State Republican Clubs, Inc., at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., on October 28, 1939, contains enlightening information to those who are about to vote on the proposed repeal of the arms embargo. Mr. Fraser is known the world over as an outstanding authority on international law.

If the present European war is "our war," and if one set of belligerents is "fighting our battles," the United States should no longer hesitate to declare war and to take its place at the side of its Allies. For the United States to stand by while other people fight its battles, while other people bleed and die in its cause, would justly bring upon us the charge of cowardice and the contempt of history. Moreover, if the battle be ours and we do not take up arms, then what still greater shame would be our portion if we place a cash box at the shore line to receive the profits from the sale of the guns, which should be upon our shoulders.

If, on the other hand, the present European war is not "our war," and if one set of belligerents is not "fighting our battles," then the duty of the United States, and of those responsible for its policies, is to maintain the neutrality of this country. No middle course is possible. A neutral government cannot remain neutral and at the same time give aid to one set of belligerents. If, nevertheless, the foolhardy neutral deliberately does give such aid, at that moment the neutral intervenes in the war. By its own act the so-called neutral has thus produced a casus belli, and whether the neutral is thereafter to be subjected to force of arms by the offended belligerent is a question to be determined only by the offended belligerent. Perhaps the belligerent which has been discriminated against will not declare war against the government guilty of violating its neutral duties—perhaps the offended belligerent will be content with the reprisals which it may legitimately take in retaliation. Or perhaps the only harm resulting to the guilty neutral will be the infamy which it has earned. But such a neutral should not be blind to the risks it runs; it should not be unmindful of past wars caused under circumstances such as these.

What is the meaning of neutrality? The essence of neutrality is impartiality. When a neutral government ceases to be impartial—when, for example, it enacts or repeals laws for the purpose of aiding one set of belligerents—then it forfeits its status as a neutral and its right to the privileges and immunities of a neutral. It has departed from the impartiality which constitutes the cornerstone of neutrality.

At the present time a bill is pending in Congress to repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. This raises the issue whether, or to what extent, a neutral government may, after the outbreak of war, adopt new measures or alter measures previously adopted. Of course, a sovereign state has the power to enact or repeal any law. This is not to say, however, that such state will not be answerable under international law for such action. A neutral state may choose to exercise its municipal powers, but if its acts violate the rights of other sovereign states under international law, the guilty state may have to account on the field of battle.

There is no doubt that under international law a neutral state may, during the course of a war, adopt new measures or alter old measures, provided that the motive for such action is not to assist one belligerent against another. Hence it would be justifiable for a neutral state, after the outbreak of war, to pass a new law forbidding all belligerent warships to enter its territorial waters, where it was found that belligerent warships had engaged in hostilities within its coastal waters. Obviously such new law would be for the purpose of better safeguarding the neutral's rights or of better enabling it to fulfill its duties as a neutral. On the other hand, would it be justifiable for a neutral to relax its statutes or regulations existing at the outbreak of war? To be specific, would it be justifiable under international law for the United States now to repeal the arms embargo which has been on the statute books since 1935?

It seems clear to me that the lifting today of such embargo would be an unneutral act and would constitute intervention in the war. Indeed, the supporters of the bill have, for the most part, long ago ceased to deny that its object is to make possible a supply of arms to one set of belligerents only. It has been repeatedly said on the floor of Congress that it is necessary for this country's welfare that the Allies "win" and that the purpose of the bill is to assist England and France to an early victory. Such affirmations at least have the virtue of candidness, although exhibiting an alarming readiness in their authors to speculate as to the repercussions consequent upon repeal. At least, such individuals do not pretend that a present relaxation of our statutes through repeal of the embargo would be a notable contribution to neutrality.

As recently as the Second Hague Peace Conference, in 1907, when the thirteenth convention, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war, was under discussion, the British declared that an instance where neutrality would be served by the relaxation of a neutral's legislation after the outbreak of war was "inconceivable." At that meeting Sir Ernest Satow, the British delegate, requested that specific mention be made of the fact "that, in his opinion, it is inconceivable that a neutral state would ever be obliged to adopt less stringent measures in the course of a war in order to protect its rights, but that English doctrine has always recognized the fact that neutrals have the right to enact stricter measures for this purpose."

The above British view, which is in accord with international law, was recently referred to by Dr. Van Eysinga in a paper read in 1933 before the Grotius Society on the subject of Dutch neutrality during the World War. Dr. Van Eysinga mentioned the case of the Princess Melita, an armed British merchantman, which had twice been refused access to the Hook van Holland on the ground that she was assimilated to a warship and hence, under Dutch law, to be excluded from Dutch ports. "A sharp exchange of views ensued," said Dr. Van Eysinga, "in which the Netherlands took up a very strong position inter alia by appealing to the point of view of the British Government at the Second Peace Conference, namely, that a neutral state may only tighten and not relax its neutrality regulations during a war. We did not give in, and on September 13, 1917, the British Minister informed the Dutch Government again that his Government did not wish to continue the discussion."

The pending bill to lift the arms embargo is a self-evident proposal to relax our legislation after the outbreak of war. That the purpose of the executive branch, as well as of the administration supporters in the legislative branch, is assistance to the predominant sea power engaged in the war does not admit of successful contradiction. Not only is such purpose implicit in the nature of the bill itself, but such purpose is open and notorious and has found expression from the mouth of the President himself. The President's aim was foreshadowed last January in his message to Congress, when he asserted that there are many methods "short of war" in dealing with an aggressor; he again foreshadowed it in his radio address of September 3, after the war had begun, when he referred to "the invasion of Poland by Germany" and stated that he could not ask Americans to remain neutral in thought; he indicated it in press conferences wherein he did not disguise his dislike for the manner in which the statute operated; and he revealed his heart's desire over and over again in his last message to Congress on September 21.

How otherwise are to be interpreted the passages in his message referring to "further acts of military conquest"; "an ordering of society which relegates religion, democracy, and good faith among nations to the background. * * * The United States rejects such an ordering and retains its ancient faith, we know what might happen to us of the United States if the new philosophies of force were to encompass the other continents and invade our own. We, no more than other nations, can afford to be surrounded by the enemies of our faith and our humanity."

Was he speaking of England and France in these passages? Was Canada the enemy of our faith seeking to encompass us? Obviously, Germany is intended. Indeed, the President could not have been more outspoken if he had been urging a declaration of war itself. His purpose is manifest. If anything further were needed to prove his object, it is his statement in the same message to Congress that, "We have learned that when we deliberately try to legislate neutrality, our neutrality laws may operate unevenly and unfairly—may actually give aid to an aggressor and deny it to the victim." And, finally, only last Thursday evening the President, speaking on the radio, expressly condemned nazism as an oligarchic form of government and a danger to democracy.

Ladies and gentlemen, we must not forget that however our sympathies may be aroused by the unhappy struggle abroad, our intellects should warn us of the danger of involvement if those sympathies are translated into political action. We must not forget that the repeal of the arms embargo requires an act of Congress. This affirmative action of government, taken for the purpose of enabling private individuals to sell arms to the belligerents, becomes a Government act to aid that belligerent which controls the sea, namely, Great Britain. By repealing the embargo the United States Government would in law make itself a party to the contemplated sale of arms by its citizens. The sale of arms by a neutral government to a belligerent is universally condemned as constituting participation in the hostilities. The sale of arms by a citizen of a neutral country, which sale could not take place except for an explicit enabling statute enacted by government, is the exact equivalent of a sale of arms sponsored by government itself.

The converse of the present situation arose during the World War when, in December 1914, after the outbreak of war, bills were introduced in Congress to place an embargo on the exportation of munitions. Sir Edward Grey thereupon indicated to our Government that he considered the adoption of such a law would be "special legislation passed while war is in progress" and, therefore, would constitute "an unneutral act toward the belligerents that can profit by it." President Wilson and Mr. Lansing, then Counsellor of the Department of State, agreed with the British view. The German Government urged that such legislation ought to be adopted, but Secretary Bryan replied in a note of April 21, 1915, to the German Ambassador in the following words:

"This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions. * * * The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States. It will, I feel assured, be clear to Your Excellency that, holding this view and considering itself in honor bound by it, it is out of the question for this Government to consider such a course."

Thus, in 1915, when no arms embargo was in effect, our Government rightfully refused to permit one to be imposed. The State Department at that time adhered to the established principle that a neutral government is not required by international law to prevent the shipment of arms and other contraband by private traders.

But it is claimed today, in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations accompanying the bill now pending, that the precepts of international law "prescribe that any belligerent may purchase any articles or materials in any neutral country," and that the enactment of the original arms embargo was "a voluntary departure from international law by the United States Government." In making this amazing claim the administration supporters turn from the sound rule of law that a neutral government is not under duty to forbid the private sale of contraband, to the fantastic notion that a belligerent has a right to make such purchases and that the neutral government is under duty to allow such sales.

In point of fact, however, the trade in contraband is unlawful from the international point of view, since the goods are liable to seizure and confiscation by belligerents. Such business is undertaken wholly at the risk of the trader, and if his cargo is seized he has no redress, nor may his government give him protection without becoming associated with him in an effort to supply contraband to a belligerent.

Contrary, however, to the claims of the Senate committee, it is not a departure from international law for a state to forbid private traders from selling arms or other contraband to nations at war, where such embargo is laid for the purpose either of conserving its own supplies or of safeguarding the state's neutrality. If, as claimed by the Senate committee, international law denied to the United States the right under proper circumstances to impose an embargo on the shipment of arms, the result would be absurd since it would mean that even reasons of national defense would be insufficient to sustain such an embargo.

Modern history is replete with instances of arms embargoes laid not for the illicit purpose of aiding a belligerent, but for the permissible object of conserving the supplies of the neutral or of safeguarding the rights of the neutral. One historical example, selected from many, was the Belgian prohibition on the export of arms during the Franco-Prussian War in 1870. More recent instances were similar embargoes in effect during the World War in Italy, The Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland, and so forth. If there were any lingering doubt as to the right under international law of a neutral state to embargo the export of arms in order to avoid controversies that might impair its peace, the answer would be found in the declaration of the legal adviser of our Department of State at a hearing conducted during the Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, on the subject of the general right of a neutral government to lay embargoes. He said: "Arguments against the right of a sovereign state to control the export of commodities either in peacetime or in time of war would seem to fall of their own weight." Also pertinent is the statement set forth in 1933 in a memorandum submitted by the State Department to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, then considering a resolution for an arms embargo in view of the Sino-Japanese struggle, in which memorandum the Department expressly held: "There never was a right in the belligerent to buy arms." The same memorandum closed with a citation from Oppenheim to the effect that the sale of arms is dictated by greed and will disappear with better standards of public morality.

But, some Members of Congress have recently said, all these points are today legalistic and unreal—there are higher considerations. An aggressor is loose in the world. We should do everything in our power to help in putting him down.

To those gentlemen in Congress I answer this:

1. The saddest tragedies of history mark attempts to justify the means because of the end sought. Today we behold on every side, in this country and abroad, the spectacle of officials of government breaking their word at will, scorning their written pledges, violating statutory and customary law—all in the name of the higher justice and manifest destiny. Shall we point our finger while we ourselves burst the bonds of law? Can we remain the champion of international law if we ourselves vote to set it at naught?

2. The United States, as a neutral nation, should refrain from acts based upon the designation of one belligerent as an "aggressor." By what right does our Government sit in judgment while the Nation is at peace with all belligerents? Upon what basis do we in our ivory tower hold one nation an aggressor while absolving its opponents which even now are seeking an understanding with Russia? The recognition of the Russian occupation would be a small price to pay, says a member of the House of Commons, for the support of a major nation in the current attempt to maintain the European balance of power. Europe is under no delusion as to the underlying base upon which has been erected the picturesque scaffolding labeled "collective security," "sanctions," and "aggression." The United States likewise should not be the last to realize that the drumming up of a posse to put down a European aggressor is an invitation to dine at the table of Mars. More than one foreign government can play at Machtpolitik. Let the United States, I say, have no part of it.

Finally I would quote from the Farewell Address of the Father of our Country. The years have only served to magnify the greatness of George Washington. His words are those of a statesman for the ages. He speaks to us at this hour. I read:

"So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement of justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions—by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity—gilding, with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation."

For Cash and Carry and the Embargo

OF

HON. BRUCE BARTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. BRUCE BARTON, OF NEW YORK

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by myself last evening over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. urging that the neutrality measure as passed by the Senate be amended to retain the arms embargo, as follows:

Some editorial writers and commentators have expressed impatience at the length of the Senate debate. Such comment seems to me to reflect a lack of appreciation of the unique significance of this discussion. Ours is the only great country in the whole world where representative government still functions unimpaired. The Parliaments of England and France convene, but only to register the decrees of war governments clothed with dictatorial powers. In Washington alone can the freely chosen representatives of a free people meet and present the arguments from both sides, and repeat those arguments, if necessary, until the minds of the people understand and are ready to decide. The debate has gone on not only in the Halls of Congress; it has gone on in every city, hamlet, and crossroads; in country stores and filling stations; in clubs and lodges; on railroad trains; and in front of the open fires of millions of homes. What we have been witnessing is the spectacle of a mighty people coming gradually to a vital decision. This is democracy at its best. Thank God that here, at least, it dares to be unfettered and unhurried.

The Senate has rendered its part of the decision. The obligation now comes to us Members of the House of Representatives—a body closer to the electorate and in recent years more independent of administration pressure. We now must decide how best to carry out the people's mandate to keep them out of war.

TWO CONTRADICTORY PROPOSITIONS

Some of the people understand, though many do not, even yet, that the bill as passed by the Senate presents two contradictory propositions. It is first a neutrality or "keep us out of war" bill, placing certain restrictions on our citizens and our own shipping and reenacting the cash-and-carry sections which expired on April 30. This part of the bill could pass both Houses immediately. No authority on international law disputes our right to pass it, or contends that in so doing we would commit an unneutral act or involve ourselves in any danger. We would incur some sacrifices, but that is a decision any people have a right to make at any time.

The second part of the Senate proposal is the "lift the embargo" or the "we must help beat Hitler" provision. And here we face a very different problem. When the bill was before the House in June, I spoke and voted against the embargo. I said on June 28:

"* * * Why is it not wiser to effect the repeal now before any hostilities begin and while our action may perhaps serve in some small measure to prevent their beginning? If we wait until the war has started, our action becomes an act of war. Will that not more seriously threaten our peace than as though we face the facts and act now?"

Perhaps the words "act of war" were too strong. But distinguished Members on both sides argued that to lift the embargo after the outbreak of European war would be an unneutral act. Among those supporting this argument were some of the House's ablest authorities on international law.

TWO DEMOCRATIC SECRETARIES OF STATE

They had strong ground for their position. Our own State Department in the World War left no doubt as to what is and is not neutrality. Germany and Austro-Hungary protested to our Government in 1914 and 1915 that our shipments of munitions to the Allies were in such quantities as to make us practically a belligerent. They proposed that we do something about stopping that flow of shells and guns to Europe.

Replying to Germany on April 21, 1915, Secretary Bryan held that "any change in its (the United States) own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality." He added that "the placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States."

Some 4 months later another Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, reiterated this position in replying to a protest from the Austro-Hungarian Government. These were not paid or prejudiced opinions. They came from two Democratic Secretaries of State who were seeking patriotically to follow the best course for their country. The bearing of these precedents on the present issue is positive and specific. If "the placing of an embargo" after war has started is a "direct violation of the neutrality of the United States," then the lifting of an embargo after war has started must be also. To argue otherwise is a plain denial of the facts.

SHOULD HAVE A SEPARATE VOTE ON EMBARGO

My first point, therefore, is that the lifting of the embargo is a decision separate and apart from the decision in respect to the other sections of the bill. The other sections deal with American neutrality; lifting the embargo is an announcement to the nations of the world that we have abandoned neutrality. These two sections are mutually contradictory, and should be debated and voted on separately. Members of the Senate sought for an opportunity to debate and vote on them separately, but the administration denied that right. The administration denied it because the administration knows that, while the neutrality sections have almost unanimous support, the lifting of the embargo cannot pass if the House is given a chance to debate and vote on it alone.

If we had lifted the embargo last summer it might or might not have prevented the war. Arthur Krock wrote in the New York Times on August 31:

"It cannot be proved that the act of the Senate committee was a factor of any size, or was at all an element in bringing about the crisis in Europe. Only Hitler can testify in chief whether it was or not and until and unless he does so it would seem wiser for the President to abandon this speculation."

I agree with Mr. Krock. But last summer I was ready to do almost anything short of war to prevent the outbreak of war. And, since the President held that Hitler might be halted by our action, I was willing to give his argument the benefit of the doubt.

Now, however, we are asked to commit a palpably unneutral act. We are told that this involves us in no danger; with impatient vehemence the supporters of the administration deny that it can be a first step toward war.

SUPPLYING ARMS WAS THE FIRST STEP TOWARD WAR

To this I answer that we cannot possibly know whether in 1939 the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war will be a first step toward war. But we do know positively, in the light of history, that in 1914 the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war was the first step toward war.

We Americans, being somewhat childlike in international affairs, did not then realize that we were taking the first step. But the shrewd, sophisticated statesmen of Europe realized it. Says David Lloyd George in his memoirs: "Thus by the end of the year 1914 the traffic in war materials with the Allies had become deeply entrenched in America's economic organization and the possibility of keeping out of the war by the diplomacy of neutrality, no matter how skillfully conducted, had reached the vanishing point."

Mark the date, "the end of the year 1914." We did not enter the war until 1917. But by the end of 1914 Lloyd George and other calculating Europeans knew that our entry was inevitable; that by engaging to provide arms and ammunition to the Allies we had so far committed ourselves that our chance of staying out had already, in his words, "reached the vanishing point."

EUROPEANS BELIEVE WE WILL ENTER WAR

Whatever we may say now about our determination to keep out of war, Europe will believe that the lifting of the embargo makes our protestations meaningless.

News Week, in reporting the session of Congress of September 21, 1939, when the President delivered his neutrality message, said: "As Mr. Roosevelt walked from the room the Members stood, cheering. And the cheers echoed across a troubled world. In London and Paris, Englishmen and Frenchmen heard that stabbing thunder of applause during their radio dinner hour, and officials privately congratulated each other on what the majority of them regarded as the first step toward bringing America in."

Those of you who have friends abroad and are receiving letters from them are left in no doubt as to their conviction: The people of the Allied countries fully expect that we shall be in the war within a year, or perhaps 6 months, and are assured that our action in lifting the embargo is an implied promise.

As for the German people, there can be no doubt about how they will interpret our action. They will regard it as an act of war. We shall be inviting the same ruthless sinking of our ships and sabotage of our arms and ammunition factories that constituted Germany's reprisals in the months before our entry into the World War.

WHY ARMS ARE DIFFERENT FROM OTHER MATERIALS

Those who argue that there is no distinction between the furnishing of arms and ammunition and the furnishing of other commodities and articles essential to a nation at war are seeking to set up a disastrous confusion in the public mind. All history cries out against this sophistry. It was not our shipments of cotton and petroleum, of wheat, and copper that enraged the Kaiser to such a degree that he refused for months even to receive James Gerard, our Ambassador. Wrote Colonel House to President Wilson from Berlin on March 20, 1915:

"The Chancelor is out of town for a few days, but Zimmerman is to arrange a meeting as soon as he returns. He also suggested that the Emperor might want to see me. Gerard says this is impossible, that he has not seen him for months because of his intense feeling against us on account of our shipment of munitions of war to the Allies."

And again from Berlin to the President, on March 26, 1915:

"The bitterness of their (the German people's) resentment toward us for this (supplying arms) is almost beyond belief. It seems that every German that is being killed or wounded is being killed or wounded by an American rifle, bullet, or shell. I never dreamed before of the extraordinary excellence of our guns and ammunition. They are the only ones that explode or are so manufactured that their results are deadly."

WHY OUR SHIPS WERE SUNK

Read that extract from our own diplomatic history, and do not let your minds be confused by specious argument. It was not our shipments of food, materials, and commodities which fanned the flames of Germany's hatred. Our ships were sunk, our sailors drowned or slaughtered, and 53 of our munitions and airplane plants sabotaged for just one reason—the German people had been made insane with anger because it was our guns, our shells, our gas, and our airplanes that were murdering their sons.

There can be no question of the sequence. German hatred gave birth to unrestricted submarine warfare and wholesale sabotage. And the hatred was born on the day when we began to provide arms, ammunition, and implements of war to the Allies. This was the first step. It is this first step which the administration, in spite of its public protests to the contrary, is asking the American Congress to take now.

WE HAVE NOT BEEN FRANK WITH THE PEOPLE

The time may come when the Members of the House would be willing to take this first step. If so, let the decision be made, and the American people informed, with unqualified frankness. Let them be told that we are taking this unneutral step because only by so doing can we preserve our own peace and security. Let us warn the people solemnly that this is the same first step along the same road that led us into war in 1917, and that by taking it again we are definitely incurring the kind of retaliation which may move us toward war again. Let us tell the people, when the time comes to cast that vote, just what the objectives of the warring nations are. No one of us now knows what those objectives are. What are the secret agreements? What sort of peace is it planned to establish if and when Hitler is defeated? How can we be sure that it will not be merely another Versailles Treaty, lasting only until another crop of baby boys has grown up to the age of cannon fodder?

If the time comes when we are persuaded that America must underwrite the victory of France and England, as a matter of self-protection, let the question be put squarely to the American people: Are you ready to ship arms and ammunition, with the full understanding that in 1914 this was the first step toward war? That is the only honest way to phrase the issue. It is not being honest with the American people to wrap up in a so-called Neutrality Act a section admittedly unneutral, with all the tragic possibilities that unneutrality involved before.

THIS DEBATE MAY HAVE SAVED THOUSANDS OF LIVES

I have said that I doubt if the decision of the Senate committee on this measure last summer had any effect on Hitler's attitude or decision. But it seems very probable that the debate in the Senate this fall may have had a profound effect on the conduct of the war thus far. The Allies and Germany both give the appearance of waiting for our decision. If this be true, then the debate in our Congress may temporarily have halted the bombing of cities and saved thousands of lives. If the Allies and Germany both are waiting to see what we shall do about this embargo, I say let them wait—the longer the better. I say let us pass that part of this bill which has to do with neutrality, and keep that part which has to do with unneutrality—the lifting of the embargo—suspended like a sword over the belligerents' heads. The longer they hesitate, the more their people will be asking: What is the purpose of this war? What are its objectives? Why can we not make as good a peace right now as we can after millions have been slain and our cities crumbled into ruins? The more they question, the better the chance for peace, and in an early peace of some sort lies the only hope of European civilization.

EUROPE HAS ALWAYS HAD HITLERS

I say European civilization, not American civilization. For I resent with all my soul the repeated argument that we are only a tail to Europe's kite, that what happens to Europe must necessarily happen to us. The other night I took down from the shelves the little old history of the world which we studied when I was a boy in grammar school. It is long since out of date, and even out of print, but the maps are still good and profoundly interesting. There was a map of the Holy Roman Empire, and a map of Charlemagne's empire; there was a map of Europe when the Spanish were dominant; a map of Napoleon's empire, and of Europe under the unholy "Holy Alliance"; there was a map of Frederick the Great's empire, and a map of Europe as it was before the World War.

For 2,000 years there has usually been a Hitler in Europe, trampling upon the rights of minorities, inflicting his will on small countries by means of murder and pillage. Sometimes it has been an Italian Hitler, sometime an Austrian Hitler, sometimes a French Hitler, sometimes a Prussian Hitler. But the game of reshuffling the boundaries of Europe has gone on and on. Only once did we allow ourselves to be drawn in. In 1914 our feelings were so aroused, our fears so played upon, that we were induced to take a hand. It might have happened before. If there had been the cable and newspapers and radio in those days, we might have been called upon to stop Napoleon. I say it might conceivably have happened before. But never with my vote will it happen again.

THE FRIEND WHO MAKES PEACE

If we are to be of any service at all to Europe, that service cannot be in making ourselves a factory for bombing planes and poison gas and the instruments of war. It can be only to remain so correct in our conduct, so neutral in our official acts, that when the day comes we shall be able to bring together for peace and friendship people who now must hate each other. If America has any role in Europe it must be the role of the beloved friend, the friend of all peoples, the friend who makes peace.

To vote today for a repeal of the embargo would not end or shorten the European war. Nor would it result in a just peace. It would only increase the bitter despair of the German people. It would only strengthen them in their conviction that they must fight to a finish—whose finish? It would drive them closer to the cynical and sinister Stalin. It would lessen the restraint of the Allies and divert them from a war for principle to a war for victory—and again, I ask, whose victory?

I am thinking far beyond this bill. I am thinking of the headlines in newspapers, of the blaring voices on the radio, of the pontifications of writers. I am thinking of the hundreds of millions of simple folk in Europe who must believe what they are told because they hear nothing else. I am thinking of the despair and hopelessness of that great mass of humanity who want only to live their few years in this vale of tears with as little misery as possible. I am thinking not of experts in international law and learned pundits in universities; nor of general staffs nor of foreign office officials. To all of these repeal of the embargo is a technical question without a soul.

HOW WE CAN BEST SERVE THE ALLIES

But to the masses of England, France, Germany, and Russia repeal means that we have already entered the war; it will mean that when the war ends we shall stand not as a friend of all mankind, but as a partisan shackled by the agreements and trades and deals of partisans.

America can better aid mankind by making no move at this point which can be used by either side to fan the propaganda of hate. By adhering to strict neutrality we not only serve our own national interest, but make ourselves most serviceable to the Allies. We keep ourselves in a position to work for peace. Any other vote may weaken or stifle the growing demand of the people of all Europe for a clearer statement of the war's objectives; it may tend to prolong the war and so increase immensely the risk of our eventual participation in it.

Why Be Foolish Again?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 27, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this House is faced with as grave a responsibility as any in its history. The action we take this week on the administration unneutral neutrality bill will govern to a very large degree whether we are to repeat the ghastly mistake of 22 years ago.

The administration, in its demand that the Congress now repudiate a position it has twice taken, and which has been twice approved by the President himself, and repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war in the present Neutrality Act, is guilty of unneutrality, and it is so recognized by every nation in the world. The proposed action fools nobody—not even those who claim they will vote for the bill on the grounds that by so doing they are voting to keep this country neutral during the war in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows—and some few are frank enough and fair enough to acknowledge—that this bill is proposed for the sole purpose of aiding Britain and France as against Germany. These few frankly concede that keeping the country neutral carries no weight with them. They propose that we shall take a part in this war by providing one side of the controversy with war supplies of every character. I maintain it is an insult to the intelligence of the American people to attempt to make them believe we can be more neutral by supplying one side with everything it needs than we can by doing as the law now provides—refusing to sell either side these war supplies.

Mr. Speaker, the American people do not want war. They want this country to remain at peace with all nations. All we have to do to completely meet their wishes is to keep our collective noses out of other people's business. We cannot do it by injecting ourselves into a war which, contrary to the arguments of the proponents of this bill, does not and cannot concern us unless we ourselves decide otherwise by taking affirmative action on the bill before us.

Mr. Speaker, I say that if the Members of this House will rise to their responsibilities and confirm their former action and put back into this bill the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and if the administration will do its utmost to keep this country neutral instead of unneutral, as is proposed by this bill, we will have peace. If these things are not done I shall be gravely apprehensive as to what the near future shall hold for us.

Under permission to extend my remarks I offer the following editorial from the Detroit Free Press of Sunday, September 24, 1939:

[From the Detroit Free Press of September 24, 1939]

WHY BE FOOLISH AGAIN?

We in America separated from Europe and put an ocean between ourselves and that continent because we wanted to live more free, more wholesome, more comfortable, and saner lives than could be lived there.

We came to America because we wanted to get away from the silly, festering quarrels and enmities of the Old World, from its barbarous wars, and from its miasmic morals.

We came to America because we didn't want to be ruled by an overlord or a military caste, or by autocratic fiat, but wanted to rule ourselves.

Then in 1917 we found ourselves inveigled and bullied into going back and wallowing in the old mess.

This was in part because we listened to seductive propaganda, and in part because we had neglected to maintain a power of self-defense which would have made even reckless belligerents respect our rights.

The rewards for our foolishness were the lives and limbs of thousands upon thousands of the best of our youth, a war debt of billions of dollars, a moral and economic upset from which we have not yet recovered, and flagrant, and in some cases abusive, ingratitude from those we had aided.

And all we did was a total loss. We did not help Europe, and we hurt ourselves grievously and dangerously.

Now efforts are being made by all sorts of propagandists to induce us to do the same foolish thing a second time.

These propagandists try to appeal to our sympathies and to our sentimentality, to our prejudices, and to our hates. They undertake to flatter and scare us. They try to tempt us with promises of gain and to intimidate us with threats of loss.

We are told by people who wag their heads mournfully that we "can't stay out."

But all this is just the old gold-brick game, whether it is run from Washington or London or Paris or by whisperers in parlors and clubs and on street corners.

Twenty-two years ago we allowed ourselves to be led across the ocean by the nose to grovel in the chronic slaughterhouse which is Europe. We know what the reward was. Why in the name of common human intelligence should we fall for that sort of thing again?

America Must Stay Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, in the light of history it is fairly well acknowledged by authorities that, in addition to emotional pressure and financial involvement, one of the motivating forces which drove us into the last war was our futile attempt to maintain certain neutral rights. America was neutral from 1914 until 1917, and during that period the President announced a policy of maintaining all American commercial rights accorded to us under international law. In our endeavor to maintain commerce on the high seas throughout the war area we were subjected to bad treatment by both the Allies and Germany. The belligerent nations were challenged and condemned by America for violating our neutral rights. They destroyed our ships, captured our vessels in midocean, torpedoed our merchant marine without warning, and forced our ships and mails into belligerent ports. Our neutral rights established under international law were not recognized by the great powers at war.

Today not one of our neutral rights is recognized or will be recognized to any greater extent than between 1914 and 1917. Just a short time ago we read that Great Britain had taken our mails and that both Germany and England had seized our ships. Outside of protesting and sending bitter notes to the government that injures us, there is no way we can defend our neutral rights except by going to war.

We realize that during the last war financial entanglements resulted from the sale of arms to belligerents. In that connection let me quote from a letter I received from eight organizations who have made a study of our entrance into the World War:

> Arms were sold, at first for cash, loans having been held to be "unneutral." To meet the demand for arms, munitions plants were rapidly expanded, Du Pont stock rising from $20 to $1,000 a share. When the expanded munitions industry was threatened with collapse, because cash for purchases had given out, our policy in regard to loans was reversed. (In any future war it is unlikely that, once sale of arms is permitted, a prohibition on loans would be retained.) The steps by which our policy was changed in 1914–16 were as follows: Reversing his refusal under the influence of Secretary Bryan, to permit loans, the President authorized Secretary Lansing to give bankers the "impression" they were free to extend credits; when credits were exhausted, Secretary McAdoo wrote the President, "to maintain our prosperity we must finance it." The President then authorized Lansing to convey "orally" to the bankers the opinion that the Government would take no action if loans were extended.

In 1916, when the Allies were hard-pressed, our Ambassador to England sent a cablegram to President Wilson which contained the following:

> Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our present preeminent trade position can be maintained and a panic averted.

That the selling of arms to belligerents drew America into the last war is stated in Baker's life of Woodrow Wilson. There we read:

> Thus, by the end of the year 1914, the traffic in war materials with the Allies had become deeply entrenched in America's economic organization, and the possibility of keeping out of the war, by the diplomacy of neutrality, no matter how skillfully conducted, had reached the vanishing point. By October, perhaps earlier, our case was lost. While British diplomacy maneuvered with skill to involve American industry and finance in the munitions traffic, it is certain that American business needed no compulsion to take war orders.

In view of what took place in 1914–17, is it not reasonable to say that, if we repeal the arms embargo, we will, in all probability, be taking a step in the direction of war; that by lifting the arms embargo we will change our economic set-up so severely that our industry will be geared to supplying war materials for European countries; that our internal economy will then be tied up with the fortunes of Europe; that, when those who are buying war materials from us on a cash basis, run out of cash, we will virtually be forced into granting them credit so that an economic depression will not strike this country. When the belligerents no longer have cash, think of the thousands of men employed in the booming munitions and related industries who will then beseech Congress to extend credit so they might keep their jobs.

Practically all articles and materials are listed by both the Allies and Germany as either contraband or conditional contraband. Under these circumstances it would be foolhardy to send our ships with such materials to belligerents and risk those incidents which paved the way for our entrance into the last war. We must be willing to take the loss in trade and investments resulting from a wartime restriction in order to escape the greater economic loss which follows in the wake of war.

In addition to sacrificing profits, Americans, if they want to remain neutral, must be willing to forego the personal desire to make justice triumph all over the world. Whether the present war in Europe is one to promote principles of justice or whether it is one to gain or protect empires is not agreed upon by authorities. Suffice it to say that the war is not of our own making. We won the last war, but had practically nothing to say concerning the peace terms. In fact, the Balfour document showed us that before we went into the war on the side of the Allies they had divided the spoils of war. Nobody knows what arrangements they have made to parcel out conquered lands after a victory in the present war. That the Allies will again be victorious is the opinion of most Americans. Germany has few resources and about 86,000,000 people. Great Britain has vast resources and an empire consisting of about 500,000,000 people. France, with its great Army, will be a tremendous factor in the war. All three nations are well prepared to carry out a long fight, and if the war continues for 2 years or longer, those nations will end up prostrate. They will be wrecks morally, physically, and financially. It is then that America can be of aid in rehabilitating those lands and peoples.

No one can deny that the American people detest unjust aggression, as well as those foreign "isms"—communism, fascism, and nazi-ism—which are contrary to our ideals and form of government. My heart bleeds for the people of Poland, who so valiantly defended their homeland against the attacks of Hitler's armies on one side and Stalin's hordes on the other. After Poland was conquered, the dictators divided their bloody booty. But this division will not last for long. The world is too small for both Hitler and Stalin. Russia wants to communize the world. I now make the prediction that "red" Russia and Nazi Germany cannot live in peace side by side. Sooner or later these two ideologies will engage in a death struggle. After the ravages of that war have taken their toll, I fervently believe that freedom of speech, of the press, and of religion will become the law of those lands.

At this stage in our national development America is not powerful enough to rule the world and enforce principles of justice therein. We learned through sad experience during the last war that we cannot make the world "safe for democracy."

The lack of democracy in Europe, the diabolical war now raging there, our thousands of war dead, our crippled soldiers, and billions of dollars in war debts still unpaid, tell us stronger than words that our idealistic efforts 22 years ago were in vain, and that we should stay out of the present war. No doubt those who want us to get into the European fight will stamp and ridicule us as cowardly. They will appeal to our sympathies by strong emotional tales of oppression and war horrors. Propaganda will be unloosed, as it was during the last war, in order to sway public opinion in America. Atrocity stories will gain credence, even though they are manufactured in the propaganda laboratories of foreign belligerent powers. We know that tall tales were printed in the American newspapers during the last war, which told us that French civilians had had their ears and tongues cut off and that women and children were inhumanly treated. Arguments will again be raised to have America enter the war for humanity's sake or to stop foreign doctrines. Americans must guard themselves against this vicious propaganda, and they must actively and energetically participate in a campaign to keep this country at peace. They must talk to their relatives and talk to their friends with firm conviction and urge them to maintain a peace attitude in spite of those incidents which might arise and bring about the cry for war. They should lay emphasis on the fact that they can stay out, that they should stay out, and that they must stay out of war. Americans can perform a more noble task, can be heroes to civilization, by making democracy work here.

If war should come to America, it would set in motion those processes which give rise to dictatorships. Legislation now sponsored by the New Dealers is a step toward totalitarianism. On May 17, 1939, Senate bill 1650 was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. This bill, if passed, will require everyone to file a sworn declaration detailing his gross wealth and financial obligations. This wealth can then be borrowed by the United States as it sees fit. During wartime, by successive drafts, the Government can take all of this wealth by giving you bonds bearing 1 percent interest payable in 50 years. Under the terms of this bill, if it is impossible for you to raise cash, the Government will seize your goods, take your services, or force you to give a mortgage on your property plus a note on which you must pay 6-percent interest per annum. This is dictatorship at its worst. Some of my friends were startled to hear of this legislation. "That won't pass," they said. It will not? The bill has come out of the Senate Military Affairs Committee with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Many of those who favor repeal of the arms embargo believe that it will create tremendous war profits. What fools they are. Drastic legislation is now being prepared, and some has been drafted to take the profits out of war and to regiment industry. A short time ago House Resolution 7545 was introduced, and this bill proposes to tax net profits 80 percent. War profiteering should be stopped, but to do this by socialization of industry and destruction of private enterprise will ruin our country and our form of government.

On May 31, 1939, House Resolution 6572 was introduced in the House of Representatives. Under the terms of that bill, billions of dollars of the American taxpayer might be taken to finance marine insurance for other nations. If enacted into law, this bill would, to a great extent, make the United States the insurance banker of warring nations in Europe. It would present the American Government with a new international policy of financing the shipment of munitions to foreigners and would almost inevitably lead to war.

Even now plans are on foot to put through a plan which is astounding to every American. It is called the industrial mobilization plan. Under it, it is proposed that the War and Navy Departments take over not only all material resources but the control of all industry, trade, and commerce. This country is not at war, and if my voice and efforts will count for anything, it will never become embroiled in the present European war.

Why did the President on September 8 proclaim that a national emergency exists? By declaring an emergency exists, the President can take advantage of a clause in the Federal Communications Act of June 1934 and he can stop free speech over the radio; he can suppress public discussion by radio of views which he does not like; he can take over broadcasting stations and turn them over to any department of the Government. Equally strong powers over the radio are held by Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin, and in those countries the people get only the news the government wants them to receive. I pray that the President will never use this power over radio, because America is practically the last refuge for democracy and free speech.

Many Americans do not realize that under emergency powers the President can close all banks in the Nation, can close every stock exchange, can prohibit the export of coal or other war materials, can restrict travel between the United States and foreign countries, and can suspend the 8-hour law on Federal contracts.

The tide toward dictatorship is running strong. If war comes to America, it will be prosecuted with dictatorial powers; we will be regimented; we will be socialized; we will surrender our liberties, perhaps never to see them again. May God forbid that to happen.

Navy Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my Navy Day address over station WFBG, Altoona, October 26, 1939, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, since the World War, when I served in the Navy as an enlisted man, Navy Day always gives me a glow of patriotic pride. No matter how modest your place may be, the Navy gets under your skin. There never was a sailor, from "gob" to admiral, who failed to take pride in his service.

Navy Day, 1939, however, brings something beside patriotic pride and sentimental recollections to me and to every thoughtful American. Once more the awful word "war" is on every American lip. Again, the wishful word "neutrality" twists every American tongue. I call neutrality a "wishful word" because it merely holds the promise of peace. We must have a will and a way to maintain our neutrality in a world at war if we are to have peace.

The words "war" and "neutrality" are stern reminders of the real purpose behind Navy Day. Of course, Navy Day is the traditional day of open house to the American public, when the Navy is glad to welcome the people of the country to board their own ships and to visit their shore stations. But Navy Day has a far deeper significance than just a pleasant custom.

Navy Day was not set aside as a social occasion or to satisfy idle curiosity. It was intended to give all Americans an opportunity not only to inspect their fleet but to really learn something about their first line of national defense. It also was designed to assure the American people they are getting their money's worth—that their Navy can and will preserve the peace they desire, guarantee the security they demand.

Even with 3,000 miles of ocean between us and the European battle front, every gale that sweeps across the Atlantic scatters sparks from the war flames among us. That is enough to make us truly thankful we are at peace. We may be truly thankful we have a Navy to keep that war away from our shores. For the American people intend to remain at peace.

Navy Day naturally reminds us of our naval history, and that history teaches us the most valuable lessons on how to keep out of war. History is our safest guide for the present and the future. It is when we forget the lessons of the past that we begin to gamble with the future.

No more profitable lesson can be learned from our naval history than this—naval weakness has been one of the chief reasons for getting us into war in the past. On the other hand, naval strength has favored our ability to remain at peace in the few instances it has been available. And, when we have been unable to avoid war, the Navy has been a vital factor in bringing victory to American arms.

By sad experience we have learned the only way to enforce our neutrality is through naval strength. We know now that we must keep the Navy strong if we hope to safeguard our essential interests and at the same time keep out of war. Let us pray our Navy will prove equal to that test now.

Without detracting one whit from the valor and glory that belong to John Paul Jones and other gallant commanders of the little Continental Navy, it was the victory of the French fleet off the capes of the Chesapeake that forced the surrender of the British Army at Yorktown and won independence for the Colonies. That fact was recognized by George Washington and in a letter to Lafayette, in 1781, he stated:

"No land force can act decisively, unless it is accompanied by a maritime superiority."

Soon after the Revolution, our little Navy vanished and for 14 years we indulged in a noble experiment of complete naval disarmament. It was a sad failure. England, France, Spain, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli preyed upon our thriving ocean commerce.

Much has been written about our traditional friendship with France, but little is said now about the 3 years of naval warfare against France, in which we captured about 85 French armed ships. We started that war without a man-o-war on the sea. Our Navy was composed of armed merchant vessels. Our naval weakness was a prime factor in that war and we paid a heavy price for it. French privateers were active even on our home coast.

The folly of our naval weakness was proven again when we tried the futile expedient of paying tribute to the Barbary Coast states of northern Africa, to protect our rich Mediterranean trade. When we stopped paying tribute Tripoli declared war on us. We found it an economy to equip a Navy and taught Tripoli a lesson. Algiers, Morocco, and Tunis took the hint and left our ships alone.

The Napoleonic wars brought about a situation similar to the present relations between Europe and the United States. Then, as now, Europe looked to America for products essential to the conduct of the wars. We were eager to keep out of the wars, but we were glad to reap the short harvests and high prices for war supplies. The warring European powers naturally resented supplies being sent from America to their enemies. From 1803 to 1807, the British seized 528 American ships and the French seized 389 of our vessels. That is another example of a neutral with a weak navy.

Despite our naval weakness, but as a consequence of it, we reached the limit of our endurance of high-handed British methods and went to war with England again in 1812. In that war Commodore Perry's victory on Lake Erie prevented a large part of what is now our Middle West from becoming permanent British territory. Commodore Macdonough's squadron on Lake Champlain saved New York from a crippling invasion. Commodore Patterson's ships at New Orleans contributed to Andy Jackson's brilliant victory. But because of our naval weakness we suffered the humiliation of having the British sack the Capitol and burn the White House.

While we were in the throes of the Civil War, France seized Mexico, in violation of the Monroe Doctrine. At the end of that unhappy internal strife we had the strongest navy in the world. That was sufficient to get France out of Mexico without war. Thus did naval strength prevent war while securing our interests.

If our Navy had commanded more respect, we might have avoided war with Spain in 1898. It was a great surprise to European authorities—especially in Spain—when America's Navy proved superior in that test.

That brings us down to the World War. Our sad experience in that war should be a more valuable lesson in every way right now. We strove for more than 2 years to remain neutral. In the end we got into that war principally because we lacked an adequate navy to back up our diplomatic efforts to stay out of it.

The history of the World War is still fresh in our minds. We all remember, or we have read, how the German high command blew hot and cold on ruthless submarine warfare. We all know how the Kaiser gambled on American naval weakness. General Ludendorff, in his memoirs, tells how it was carefully calculated that the combined efforts of the British and American Navies could not cope with the ruthless submarine warfare. It was upon that erroneous assumption that Germany resumed unrestricted submarine warfare in January 1917.

It is apparent that if the German high command had believed the American Navy, in cooperation with the Allied Navies, was strong enough to nullify and defeat their submarines, as subsequent events proved, ruthless submarine warfare never would have been renewed, and in all probability America would have remained at peace. Our Navy was weak, indeed, at that time, for a first-class power. That is one of the most glaring instances in our history when a strong navy might have kept us out of war and saved hundreds of thousands of lives, billions in money, untold grief, and an economic depression that has harassed us virtually since the World War ended.

As we observe this eighteenth annual Navy Day—the eighty-first anniversary of the birth of that great and far-sighted American and advocate of a strong Navy—Theodore Roosevelt—with the great European powers at war, we well may heed his solemn warning to keep our Navy strong. As Theodore Roosevelt so aptly said, "The Navy of the United States is the right arm of the United States and is emphatically the peacemaker. Woe to our country if we permit that right arm to become palsied or even to become flabby and inefficient."

I always have been content to accept the word of military and naval authorities on what constitutes an adequate national defense. However, I do venture to say that with the eastern world at war, and with our commitments to defend the territorial integrity of the western world, it would be wise for the United States to start now to build the strongest navy in the world. No matter how high the cost might be, any price would be worth the preservation of our neutrality and peace, the protection of the heritage of America, the only real democracy on the face of the earth.

Fire All Communists From United States Pay Roll

EDITORIAL FROM THE WICHITA (KANS.) BEACON

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Wichita Beacon of Thursday, October 26, 1939, as follows:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of October 26, 1939]

FIRE ALL COMMUNISTS FROM UNITED STATES PAY ROLL

The names of 563 men on the Government pay roll have been made public by the Dies committee as men who were members of, or sympathetic enough to, the American League for Peace and Democracy to be placed on that organization's mailing list. Considerable indignation has been voiced at the action of the committee in making public these names, charging that some innocent men have been injured.

That may be true in some cases but it should be a small minority for the nature of the organization, its communistic origin and support, have been a matter of public record, and should have been apparent to these men after only a short study of the literature sent them.

The Dies committee did the right thing in making public the names. It did not go far enough and make public the names, of the other Communists and Communist sympathizers who are on Government pay rolls, taking money drawn from the taxpayers of this country at the very time their sympathies and actions are directed toward tearing down the Government that is providing them with a livelihood.

No other nation on the face of the globe would permit such national treachery as is permitted in the United States. We do not mean that all nations would go to the extreme measures that have been adopted in Germany or in Russia. Even tolerant Netherlands has seen fit to protect itself from Nazi attempts to undermine the Dutch Government by strict measures against Nazi agents. Communists have been dealt with severely in every country, with the lone exception of this Nation, except in those countries that have distinct communistic leanings.

Resignation of every man who is an avowed Communist or sympathetic to the Communist movement should be only the first step. The second step should be definite action that will effectively prevent them from any further actions detrimental to democracy in the United States. Our forefathers, at the time they founded this Government, never had the idea that freedom of speech should be stretched to include men and women engaged in destructive action against the Government that is giving them this protection.

The time for a general house cleaning of all Communists, of all Nazis, and of all Fascists, along with their sympathetic friends, is long past due. No government can operate efficiently when its functions are placed in the hands of men bent on its impairment or destruction. There is room here only for loyal Americans.

Would Be Unneutral

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

LETTER FROM SECRETARY HULL

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission generously granted me by the House, I submit for incorporation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter written by Secretary of State Cordell Hull, on May 12, 1938, setting forth his views on a proposal to lift the embargo on arms to the Loyalist faction in the Spanish civil war.

The views so ably set forth by Mr. Hull as being applicable at that time are equally applicable today, when it is again proposed that we take part in the quarrels and hates of old Europe. Especially, do I commend to my colleagues a careful reading of the second, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of the Hull letter. If what Mr. Hull declared was true, as it applied to a small restricted civil war, how much more true is it now, when there is being waged a war between three of Europe's great powers.

My colleagues, I appeal to you not to take a step that surely will force us into a situation that may destroy democracy at home. Of one and all I urge a careful reading of Secretary Hull's letter to Senator PITTMAN.

This is a good time for Congress to consider the present and future. Let us not be swept off our feet by propaganda, prejudice, and misrepresentation. Rather, let us keep ever before us our plain duty to the American people. They insist that we stay out of the European war and commit no overt act that may draw us into that war. To change our neutrality law while a war is on, especially where it will favor one side to the injury of the other, would be an overt act. If we lift the arms embargo, we will be drawn into the European war as surely as the rising of tomorrow's sun.

At this point it may be timely for me to remind the membership of the House that the mothers of America now have the ballot—something they did not have back in 1917, when Congress voted to cast our lot with the Allies, an act we now regret most bitterly. To our participation in the war we may blame the present depression; also the millions of home and farm foreclosures, the thousands of bank failures that swept away the life savings of millions of our people. In fact, nearly all the political and economic ills that now beset us may be traced to our participation in the World War. Let us not repeat our folly of 1917.

Mr. Hull's letter follows:

MAY 12, 1938.

MY DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: I have received your letter of May 3, 1938, enclosing a copy of Senate Joint Resolution 288 "repealing the joint resolution to prohibit the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to Spain, approved January 8, 1937, and conditionally raising the embargo against the Government of Spain," and requesting my comment.

In recent years this Government has consistently pursued a course calculated to prevent our becoming involved in war situations. In August 1936, shortly after the beginning of the civil strife in Spain, it became evident that several of the great powers were projecting themselves into the struggle through the furnishing of arms and war materials and other aid to the contending sides, thus creating a real danger of a spread of the conflict into a European war with the possible involvement of the United States. That there was such a real danger was realized by every thoughtful observer the world over.

Twenty-seven governments of Europe took special cognizance of that fact in setting up a committee designed to carry out a concerted policy of nonintervention in the conflict. In view of all those special and usual circumstances, this Government declared its policy of strict noninterference in the struggle and at the same time announced that export of arms from the United States to Spain would be contrary to such policy.

The fundamental reason for the enactment of the joint resolution of January 8, 1937, was to implement this policy by legislation. This joint resolution was passed in the Senate unanimously and in the House of Representatives by a vote of 406 to 1.

In the form in which it is presented the proposed legislation, if enacted, would lift the embargo which is now being applied against both parties to the conflict in Spain, in respect to shipments of arms to one party while leaving in effect the embargo in respect to shipments to the other party. Even if the legislation applied to both parties, its enactment would still subject us to unnecessary risks we have so far avoided.

We do not know what lies ahead in the Spanish situation. The original danger still exists. In view of the continued danger of international conflict arising from the circumstances of the struggle, any proposal which at this juncture contemplates a reversal of our policy of strict noninterference, which we have thus far so scrupulously followed and under the operation of which we have kept out of involvements, would offer a real possibility of complications. From the standpoint of the best interests of the United States in the circumstances which now prevail, I would not feel justified in recommending affirmative action on the resolution under consideration.

Our first solicitude should be the peace and welfare of this country, and the real test of the advisability of making any changes in the statutes now in effect should be whether such changes would further tend to keep us from becoming involved directly or indirectly in a dangerous European situation.

Furthermore, if reconsideration is to be given to a revision of our neutrality legislation, it would be more useful to reconsider it in its broader aspects in the light of the practical experience gained during the past 2 or 3 years rather than to rewrite it piecemeal in relation to a particular situation. It is evident that there is not sufficient time to give study to such questions in the closing days of this Congress.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

COLUMN BY ED SULLIVAN IN THE NEW YORK DAILY NEWS OF SEPTEMBER 5, 1939

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a column entitled "Soliloquy," by Ed Sullivan, which appeared in the New York Daily News under date of September 5. I trust every Member of Congress will avail himself of the opportunity of reading the very timely expression of Mr. Sullivan.

[From the New York Daily News of September 5, 1939]

SOLILOQUY

SEPTEMBER 5.

I talked about the war to a man in front of the Palace Theater last midnight because, alone of the crowds on Broadway, he knew something about it. * * * I had to tilt up my head to carry on a conversation with him, because the man was Father Francis P. Duffy, chaplain of the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry, and he stands on a slab of marble in the little triangle where Broadway and Seventh Avenue meet and break apart.

"Do you be hearin' the sound of marching feet in Europe, father?" I asked him * * * He nodded, or so it seemed to me, and there was pain in his eyes. * * * "When the noise of the subways under your statue dies away, father, can you hear on the Atlantic breezes the thunder of bombs and guns and planes—and the thin wailing laments of the women?" * * * He said he could hear all of it, and he motioned me to come closer to him so that he could speak.

"Do our boys have to go again?" he whispered. * * * I told him that Roosevelt had said over the radio that he was going to try to keep us out of it. * * * "Pray to God that he can," he said. * * * "War is dirty stuff, dirty stuff, I know. The Sixty-ninth had more than a taste of it. I'm here, but too many of the boys of the Sixty-ninth are in foreign graves—and to no avail, because I can hear the troops marching again to new graves."

A moon was riding in the sky, just peering over the top of the Empire State Building. * * * "I'm thinking of a moon that was just as bright as that," he said. "The boys of the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth were going up to the front lines for the first time, and just outside of Noyamont we met another New York regiment, the Seventy-seventh. It was a wonderful thing to be sure, these New York regiments meeting on a silvered road in France and they called out to each other as they passed. A boy in the Seventy-seventh called, 'Anybody in your outfit from the Bronx?' And boys from the Bronx called back. But I remember best when two brothers, one in the Seventy-seventh and one in the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth, discovered each other. They were very young, but they were soldiers and they didn't want to cry. One of them said, 'Ma told me to tell you be sure to keep your chest covered, Tom.' For 30 seconds they stood together, outlined in the moonlight, and then they had to march along."

"War is dirty stuff," he repeated. * * * "Like that morning when Hunt, of Company E, was killed by a hand grenade. We took him into the first-aid dugout and we stripped off his jacket and a piece of paper fell out. It was a cablegram from home that his young wife had just given birth to a 7-pound boy—whose father had just been killed.

"I can see Almendinger, a fine lad, going off to the hospital to have his eye taken out; I remember Joe Miller, his leg blown off by a shell, coming back to the lines on the shoulders of Lieutenant Bootz; I can see Harry McCoun holding up the stump of his left arm, after a shell had landed in our midst, and calling out, 'Well, boys, there goes my left wing.'

"At Camp Mills, before we sailed, quite a few of the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth married the girls they were leaving behind. One of the bridegrooms was Corporal Dunnigan, a fine, decent, likeable lad. In a few short months, I was to officiate at his funeral in France."

"Joyce Kilmer, too. The bayonets and the bullets had enough to feed upon without destroying a great poet like Joyce. I'm remembering the first March 17 in France, a St. Patrick's Day celebration at Recroi. I read Kilmer's 'Rouge Bouquet,' and at the end of each stanza, which is arranged for the notes of 'Taps,' Sgt. Pat Stokes blew the notes tenderly. But Kilmer was killed, too, because there is no reason to a bullet, no appreciation of beauty in the tip of a bayonet."

"But, Father Duffy," I broke in, "you picture war in terms of men who were killed, in numbers of legs blown off and eyes gouged out, in terms of weeping women. Isn't war actually gay—what about the parades and the bands playing and the lively music, and the crowds cheering along the sidewalk? That's pretty exciting, isn't it?"

"Parades are nice enough," he agreed. "I remember when the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth paraded to the ferry that was to take us to Camp Mills. Alongside of me was 17-year-old Eddie Kelly. A few rows away were Norman, Ahearn, Britt, Sullivan, Adkins, Meagher, Moylan, and Leffey. They looked grand in their uniforms. I saw them in France—all dead. Parades are fine enough, but death comes without any flags flying or crowds cheering or bands playing."

There was the ringing noise of a bell that grew louder and louder. With a start, I woke from a sound slumber. A bellboy had a telegram. I took it from him and walked to the window of the Hotel Astor room. Below on Broadway was the statue of Father Duffy, outlined in the clear moonlight. On the chair was the copy of his book I'd been reading when I dozed off.

What War Means to Animals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS H. CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 30, 1939

STATEMENT PREPARED BY THE AMERICAN HUMANE ASSOCIATION, 135 WASHINGTON AVENUE, ALBANY, N. Y.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, to me war is man's greatest inhumanity to man; but in a picture of war's full meaning it seems that a statement of its meaning to animals is not out of place. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement prepared by the American Humane Association:

WHAT WAR REALLY MEANS TO ANIMALS

While many painters have pictured the panoply of war in a spirit of glorification, a few have shown it as it really is. Landseer gave a remorseless rendering of the horrors of war, dead troopers, dying frantic horses, flames, and smoke, all bearing eloquent testimony to the havoc and madness of battle. There are others, such as Schreyer's Abandoned and Barker's painting of Napoleon at Bassano, with death all around and one lone dog watching over its dead soldier master.

War cannot be made humane to animals or men. Clara Barton wrote in 1900:

"Among the shocking and heartrending scenes of the battlefield the screams of the wounded horses lingered more painfully in my ears, if possible, than the moans of the wounded men. * * * They die slow and hard if left to themselves, and I myself have seen the vultures hovering and tearing at them while life yet remained."

In the Crimean War horses died of starvation, fatigue, and exposure. In the Franco-German War (1870–71), following the surrender of Sedan:

"The starving horses had gnawed off everything, even the bark of trees. Many * * * were in a piteous condition between the houses and walls, motionless, awaiting death by hunger; half broken down, some sat on their haunches, others licked the slime at their feet, and many had sunk down in harness by the carts. * * * Carcasses of horses lay in the morass. * * * It was hell on earth." (Major General Maurice, C. B.)

If that be viewed as ancient history, being seventy years ago, let us come to the beginning of the present century—the Boer War. Here is what a soldier in a hospital told a London reporter, as published at the time.

"I think I pity the horses more than I do the men. Poor beggars! You see 'em all gashed and torn and reeking with blood and staggering as though they can hardly carry their riders; but you know a man ain't going to part with his horse while the horse can carry him and he's under fire."

And here is a horrible recital concerning the horses in General French's forced march to Kimberley:

"Had you seen those bags of bones looming through the twilight it would have startled you no less than it did me, and would have brought before you * * * the horrors of war. * * * The less decrepit among this awful band of skeletons had been back from the front about a month. * * * If it be true that for fifty hours the horses of the force had to continue their march without nourishment, no wonder they fell down to die by the roadside in hundreds, or that the great deed of the relief of Kimberley was costly to a degree that makes one shudder for very pity for the poor animals that had to be sacrificed. * * * I care not to call up the remembrance of those angular, almost transparent frames and tottering limbs. Of the whole six hundred only four could be found against whose hoof-numbers one could write 'fit for service.'"

Julian Ralph, Daily Mail war correspondent, wrote these passages:

"In battle their legs are snapped off, their bodies torn, and their heads shattered—and there is nothing to do but to leave them to the aasvogels, as the vultures are called. There is no time in battle to shoot them. * * * Of all the pitiful, heart-rending scenes I have ever seen, none had compared to this view of hundreds upon hundreds of dead and dying horses on this hundred miles of war's promenade * * * to see them shattered by shell and then ripped open by vultures, often before they were dead, was enough to snap the tenderest chords in one's breast.

"But the worst horror was to come * * * only 24 hours after the fight at Driefontein. On this field not nearly all the horses were yet dead. As I came up beside the prostrate body of a beautiful steed it would slowly and painfully lift its head and turn upon me a pair of the most pleading, woe-stricken eyes, full of a hunger to know what I could do for it. And all I could do was to drive on, for I had no firearms, even for my own protection, deep in an enemy's country."

Another brilliant war correspondent, Charles E. Hands, presented this picture:

"More pathetic than the sight of the dead horses was the sight of the living ones. There were horses that had been hit, horses that had been broken down with overwork and underfeeding, horses with hideous saddle sores hidden by clustering mounds of flies, horses abandoned for every conceivable defect; some horses for whom death had loosened their riders' control, big English horses, unshod Boer ponies, most of them with hip bones that projected so far as to suggest dislocation; and all along by the side of the river where they found grazing and water, they were wandering about helpless, forlorn, abandoned creatures, who looked at you dubiously, as though they feared you were bringing them more of glorious warfare; and then, seeing you pass, turn listlessly away, and hanging down their heads, went on with their dejected grazing."

The war correspondent of another London newspaper has written:

"Do not look at the horses as you go to the front. They rarely unsaddle even a cavalry horse; but if you see one with bare back, it is invariably covered with festering sores 6 inches square.

"Both the horses pulling the heavy artillery pieces through all sorts of impossible places, beaten, clubbed, cursed, and those dying, lacerated, dismembered by the bursting shells, as well as the wretched survivors, ruined by the desperate service, call for infinite pity."

The most graphic and the most horrifying picture of horses on the battlefield is that of Erich Maria Remarque in All Quiet on the Western Front. Here are some extracts:

"The cries continue. It is not men; they could not cry so terribly.

" 'Wounded horses,' says Kat.

"It's unendurable. It is the moaning of the world, the martyred creation, filled with terror and groaning.

"We are pale. Detering stands up.

" 'God! For God's sake, shoot them!'

"He is a farmer and very fond of horses. It gets under his skin. The screaming of the beasts becomes louder and louder. * * * Detering raves and yells out:

" 'Shoot them! Shoot them, can't you? Damn you again.'

"We see a dark group, bearers with stretchers, and larger black clumps moving about. Those are the wounded horses. Some gallop away in the distance, fall down, and then run on farther. The belly of one is ripped open. * * * The men cannot overtake the wounded beasts, which fly in their pain, their wide-open mouths full of anguish. One of the men goes down on his knee; a shot—one horse drops; another. The last one props himself on his forelegs and drags himself around in a circle like a merry-go-round; squatting, it drags itself around in circles on its stiffened forelegs; apparently its back is broken. The soldier runs up and shoots it. Slowly, humbly, it sinks to the ground."

All this is terrible reading. But, no matter what precautions may be attempted, all war is hell for animals, too. Build all the hospitals you like, provide all the ambulances that can be used, send a thousand veterinarians to the scene of every battle, and you have today far worse war conditions than in 1900. Today with death-dealing air bombs, perfected cannon, and armies shorn of pity and unmindful of blood, war is worse for humans and animals than it ever was.

Accursed be he who brings war to the world.

Navy Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES EDISON

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech of the Honorable Charles Edison, the Acting Secretary of the Navy, over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Navy Day, October 27, 1939:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, today we celebrate Navy Day as sponsored by the Navy League of the United States. Throughout all States of the Union there have been school exercises, speeches, and patriotic tribute paid to the sea heroes of the Nation and the achievements of the Navy, as well as factual presentations of the strength of our sea power. These exercises have aided in familiarizing our people with the mission of the Navy, its far-flung duties, and its importance to our citizens at this crucial hour of history. There has been nothing bellicose in the celebration, no taunts to other powers, and no boasting of the might of the United States. Rather has the tone been that of a Navy to preserve the peace—a Navy so strong and so efficient that no foreign power would deliberately and premeditatedly attack the United States. We shall bend every effort to keep out of the conflict. We shall concentrate our efforts on the preservation of American neutrality.

We also celebrate today the eighty-first anniversary of the birth of Theodore Roosevelt, who did so much for the Nation and the Navy. This distinguished American said: "The United States Navy is the surest guarantor of peace which this country possesses." And he added, "It is earnestly to be wished that we would profit by the teachings of history in the matter." I feel that as never before in our history, Americans are becoming deeply conscious of the effect of sea power, and, in particular, of what a major factor it is—in insuring the peace, the safety, and the mental ease of the citizens of this country.

This interest in the Navy has quickened since the outbreak of the holocaust in Europe and continues to grow. Free men are determined that this country will never be invaded by a foreign foe. If such a threat comes, the well informed realize that the speed of surface ships and airships compel the Navy to meet a foe on far-sea frontiers—there an enemy must be stopped and defeated.

The personal pride that our citizens take in the Navy has been a source of profound satisfaction to me and to those in authority.

It is truly a Navy of the people and for the people. The officers and men of the fleet comprise one of the most accurate cross sections of our population. All the races that merge into the great American racial stream are represented. There is no monopoly by race, class, or creed. They rightly believe that they are the defenders of the American way and the American tradition. That is why they have no interest in foreign philosophies of government. And because of the treatment received, the advantages offered, the cause believed in, it is often remarked that the morale is unsurpassed by any military organization in the world. It is a volunteer Navy, after all; no impressments and no conscripts.

But it must never be thought that life in the Navy is one of ease. It is a life of work and discipline. The training of officers and men is never relaxed. Drill, tactical exercises, and war games are carefully planned and regularly executed in order that the great team of the Navy may be kept in a high state of training and discipline. The fleet must be ready to move on short notice. Time is a vital element in a national emergency; therefore every effort must be made to have sufficient ships in full commission and with well-trained complements ready to take the initial shock of the emergency which may come without warning. The Navy would be derelict in its duty if it did not do its level best with what it has.

We realize keenly that we can never attain adequate preparedness until sufficient reserves are trained to take their proper places in the Navy.

At the present time we are giving all the training and the instruction to the Reserve Force that is possible with the funds allotted. It is our hope to bring the efficiency of the Reserves to such a state that they may take their place in the Regular Navy with dispatch and maximum preparation for the duties assigned. The time that the Reserve officers and men give up to their naval work is appreciated. This means considerable sacrifice on the part of many.

Few citizens realize that about 82 cents of every dollar that goes into shipbuilding is returned to the taxpayers in labor or personal services. Modern shipbuilding with the material needed for the construction and maintenance of our fleet requires products of every description drawn from every State in the Union. I wish that I had the time to give the products drawn from the various States, for the Navy provides work for agriculture, mines, and factories, and is ever absorbing from the American market its surplus products.

Economy is a watchword in the Navy. This is, among other reasons, caused by endeavoring to keep as many ships in operation and as many men in training as possible on the funds allotted. It has been the policy for many years to operate the fleet on fuel allowances carefully calculated to give minimum cost. Ships of the Navy are on a strictly competitive basis; standings are accurately computed, with awards of distinctions and commendations for officers and men who excel in saving expenditures and operating with maximum efficiency. Superior performances in gunnery are always rewarded. It is well to point out that keen and strict competitive operation of naval ships in order to emphasize that those who direct the policies of the Navy strive to gain maximum efficiency with the funds provided. Every check and every means of supervision and inspection is devised to insure that every dollar we spend will give a full and efficient account of its aid to preparedness.

When the present administration began to build up the Navy in 1933, the United States was dwindling as a naval power. We had tried disarmament by treaty and disarmament by example. This country alone of all the major naval powers had a naval-building holiday from 1922 to 1933. The shipbuilding industry had deteriorated from disuse for 11 years. There was little opportunity for the naval architect in those years; expert technicians or ships constructors had gone into other fields; shipwrights and skilled labor had turned to industry. All of these handicaps had to be overcome. This we have accomplished and are now commissioning our ships on time; many ahead of time. They are unsurpassed by any warships in the world and are adapted to fulfill their mission in the American plan of sea defense.

We are observing as closely as possible all phases of naval action in the present conflict. We shall make a meticulous examination of each type, on the surface, under the surface, and in the air. This study and evaluation will be made with an open mind. For the officers who may fight our ships want the best in types and design. To date nothing has happened abroad to change our minds as to the policy that we have pursued, namely, a homogeneous surface fleet, with battleships as its backbone, supported and defended by a strong sea air arm. Should time and actual results alter this conception of a well-balanced fleet, then the Navy will hasten to conform to the lessons of experience.

In 1934 the President of the United States said:

"From the very beginning of our national life, the Navy has always been, and justly deserves to be, an object of special pride to the American people. Its record is indeed one to inspire such sentiments. I am glad to say both Congress and the country understand what we are doing in building up the Navy and about its use. The Navy is not only the first line of defense but it is the most important line of defense."

I am pleased to report that the cooperation between the Army and Navy is highly satisfactory. As never before in history, the two services through the media of the joint board, joint planning committee, and personal liaison are discussing and studying all mutual problems. All questions of possible conflict of authority are resolved by amicable joint agreement. We are very proud of the shoulder-to-shoulder effort of the Army and Navy. I shall make every effort to insure that it continues.

The Navy—and that includes the country's efficient Marine Corps—is fully aware of the trust reposed in it by the Commander in Chief and the people. It is a heritage that involves grave and arduous responsibilities. The task that may confront the United States Fleet in this hemisphere is formidable. The building up of the fleet will continue as an expressed wish of Congress. There will be no cessation in the training and the exercises necessary to keep our fleet in a ready condition. To preserve the peace requires preparedness. That means a navy adequate and competent to secure and defend the blessings of liberty and peace to ourselves and our posterity.

The Month in the Orient

OF CALIFORNIA

ARTICLE FROM ASIA

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the November issue of Asia:

[From Asia for November 1939]

THE MONTH IN THE ORIENT

One month after the war began in Europe (and 1 year after Munich) the "peace offensive" was afoot both in Europe and in Asia, with Soviet Russia the dominant factor on both continents, but with the latent power of the United States looming large in the background.

The "red" army marched into Poland at dawn on September 17, Moscow declaring that the Polish state had virtually ceased to exist. The next day the German and Russian invaders met at Brest-Litovsk. On the 20th the German commander told his army that operations in Poland were completed, and on the 27th Warsaw surrendered, after heroic defense. Ribbentrop flew to Moscow again, and after a stiff negotiation a "pact of friendship" was announced on September 29. Poland was partitioned, with Germany getting the richer slice but the one peopled by the most rebellious Poles, while Russia took the area in which are the white Russian and Ukrainian population and the wheat, oil, and timber—and the border that blocks the east.

The pact also called for peace, on the grounds that Poland was gone and that Britain and France would be to blame if the war went on. And it pledged the German and Soviet Governments to consult about "necessary measures" in the war. But in the hours just before, Russia had also signed up little Estonia in a pact under which the Soviets will have naval and air bases on the Baltic, and a standing Red army on Estonian soil. "Russia has pursued a cold policy of self-interest," said Winston Churchill. "When Herr von Ribbentrop was summoned to Moscow last week, it was to learn the fact, and to accept the fact, that Nazi designs upon the Baltic states and upon the Ukraine must come to a dead stop. * * * Russia has warned Hitler off his eastern dreams."

Meanwhile the Turkish Foreign Minister was waiting in Moscow, not too patiently, for an understanding about the Black Sea and the Balkans, and working for a pact that would strengthen Turkey's grip on the Dardanelles, would not conflict with her alliance with Britain and France, and would "prevent the war from spreading into a world war." A Turkish military mission arrived in London. Istanbul reported that Turkey was resisting demands that would lead to a Russian hold on the Balkans.

Italy's role—whether as spearhead of the "peace front" or as Germany's ally in a war spread to the eastern Mediterranean—was still in doubt. Count Ciano, Italian Foreign Minister, arrived in Berlin on October 1 and left the next day bearing Hitler's message to Mussolini.

Japan's unlucky military and financial mission sailed home from Italy, although General Terauchi went on to Germany for sightseeing on both fronts. In her isolation, Japan talked largely of devoting all her energies to cleaning up the China affair. On September 15 the hostilities between Japan and Russia on the Mongolian border were stopped by agreement. Reports that this was the prelude to a nonaggression pact were denied at Tokyo as "nonsense" and the Japanese Ambassador at Washington said, "There is no reason to regard it as preliminary to a nonaggression pact or to any move toward a close association of Soviet Russia and Japan." Belatedly the Japanese admitted that they had had heavy casualties in a "disastrous big battle" with a superior mechanized Soviet-Mongol force.

The Japanese also denied that the terms included a promise that the Soviet would stop giving aid to China.

But the armistice enabled Japan to withdraw from Manchoukuo troops which had been sent north from China. A drive in China began at once—the first major attack in many months—with Changsha as the objective, and Japanese planes fiercely bombed many cities with the idea of terrorizing the Chinese into swallowing peace terms. The fall of Changsha was predicted, although the city was no great prize, having been mostly burned by the Chinese themselves months ago. As a diversion, the Chinese attacked Japanese garrisons in the vicinity of Hong Kong. One of the greatest battles of the entire war—according to the Japanese—was being fought along the Hankow-Canton Railway. Chinese planes bombed the Japanese airfield at Hankow for the first time.

Chiang Kai-shek, speaking before the People's Political Council at Chungking, declared: "The European war will make us fight Japan with greater vigor. * * * Our present military strength, compared with that at the outbreak of the war, is more than doubled. * * * Japan has exhausted her manpower and is already defeated."

The council called upon the government to convene the national assembly and set up a constitutional regime and to safeguard the rights of free speech, free press, and assembly. Chou En-lai, the Communist leader, flew to Moscow to confer with Soviet officials after a long series of party discussions at the Communist center in Yenan. There were reports that large bodies of Soviet troops had entered the far western province of Sinkiang, and that great quanties of Russian war supplies were reaching the Chinese Communist forces. It was also implied that Moscow might be seeking a foothold in Afghanistan to extend Soviet influence in the middle east and on the northern frontier of India.

Floods in the Yellow River Basin and drought in Shantung caused crop losses and threatened 25,000,000 people with bitter suffering this winter.

The former Premier of China, Wang Ching-wei, formed a "shadow cabinet" and went on arguing with his lesser rivals, the puppets of the Peiping and Nanking regimes. Once again the Japanese hopefully said that the shrewd old war lord Wu Pei-fu was about to come out of retirement and lend his aid.

On September 27 the Chinese Foreign Minister, Wang Chung-hui, suggested that the United States persuade Japan to accept President Roosevelt as mediator, "because it is to Japan's own interest to terminate an unprofitable war and let her industries enjoy the benefit which the European war will yield to every neutral in a position to supply European belligerents."

In Japan the national mobilization act, under which the government has complete power over the economic life of the nation, was removed from the partial control of the army and put under the Premier. and a trade ministry was created to expand exports and increased foreign exchange holdings through a unified policy. Admiral Nomura was appointed Foreign Minister. He is regarded as pro-American and the choice was taken as an effort to better relations with Washington. The British military attaché, Colonel Spear, who had been held by the Japanese at Kalgan since May 25, was released at Peiping on September 8. Toward the end of the month reports went out from Tokyo that the Anglo-Japanese talks, interrupted in August, would soon be resumed, and that Japan thought Britain was now more ready to make concessions.

The British Empire stood at bay. "We have," said Winston Churchill, "the freely given, ardent support of the 20,000,000 of British citizens in the self-governing dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. We have the heart and moral convictions of India on our side." Australia and New Zealand called up troops. The entire Australian wool clip was taken by England for the duration of the war, as well as all surpluses of Australian dairy products, eggs, meat, and canned fruit, and a substantial part of the wheat surplus. Palestine Jews volunteered for war service in large numbers. Egypt went on a full war footing. Iraq broke off relations with Germany. Amir Abdullah of Transjordania pledged his support.

India was obviously torn between hatred of fascism and the recent vote of the congress not to support Britain in a war. Many of the Indian princes offered their loyalty and their resources to the King-Emperor. Gandhi on September 5 expressed sympathy with Britain and France "from a purely humanitarian standpoint." On the 26th, Gandhi was called in by the viceroy for a long conference, on which he reported to the war committee of the congress on October 2. Jawaharlal Nehru and Rajendra Prasad, president of the congress, visited the viceroy on October 3 to ask for a declaration of Britain's war aims.

One reading between the lines of carefully censored despatches could discern that a momentous struggle was going on. It was apparent that the working committee of the congress, in a manifesto, had stressed the internal issues and domestic difficulties of India, and that "an appeal had been made for the immediate creation of a federal organization consisting of the Princes, Moslems, and the congress."

The Philippine Assembly was called into special session to adopt emergency war measures. In a heated debate, José Romero proposed postponement of independence. The majority attacked this view as "moral cowardice," and the assembly voted by 53 to 7 to reaffirm the stand for independence in 1946.

A fleet of American patrol planes and the carrier Langley were shifted from Honolulu to Manila, and more planes and ships of the Pacific Fleet moved from the California coast to the base at Pearl Harbor.

The conference of cotton-exporting countries, called at Washington to devise control of world production and distribution, was a failure because of the abnormal conditions produced by the war.

An elaborately prepared expedition for scientific research in the waters of the south Pacific was abandoned, postponing indefinitely the gaining of useful knowledge of magnetism, weather, ocean currents, marine biology, earthquakes, and geology.

Neutrality was proclaimed by the United States on September 5, and Congress was called into special session to consider revision of the neutrality law, and particularly repeal of the embargo on shipment of war supplies to belligerents, and reinstatement of the cash-and-carry requirement which lapsed in May. What may prove to be one of the greatest debates in American history began in the Senate on October 2, with the veteran Senator BORAH insisting: "Let's stay out of this war. It is not our war."

Twenty-one foreign ministers of the American republic met at Panama to plan protection against the European war. They agreed to ask belligerents not to perform hostile acts or to search or seize neutral vessels within "the continental American seas," a safety zone around both continents up to the Canadian border, covering the steamship lanes used in inter-American commerce and reaching out as far in one place as the Galapagos Islands, 730 miles off the coast of Ecuador.

It is the major task of American statesmanship to keep the war away from this hemisphere. The United States particularly is the only English-speaking nation and the only great influential nation that is still free of censorship and of wartime prejudices. It must remain neutral and strong and clear-headed, because only here can the aims of peace be openly discussed, only here can the work of making peace begin.

Clothes Make the Soldier

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON POST

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Sunday Post of October 29:

[From the Boston Sunday Post of October 29, 1939]

CLOTHES MAKE THE SOLDIER

There was a time, and it seems long ago now, when to be a soldier was to be a grand and heroic figure. The spirit of courage and sacrifice which is the common characteristic of all soldiers, was then reflected in the uniform a man wore. From the horse-haired helmets of the Roman legionnaires to the dress uniforms of European régiments, each article of military attire through the centuries has been designed to emphasize and to articulate the impression that here is a man set apart from the ordinary walks of life, to serve a cause so high that either death or glory is its reward.

During the World War man went to live in ravines of his own making, amid the mud floods of Flanders, and there were thrown away the gleaming helmets, the busbys, the sabers, and the trappings of 5,000 years of war.

The bands put away their instruments and took up stretchers for the wounded. The flags were furled. The color of that tawny, glutinous mud was used for the uniforms of ours and others of the contending armies. The mud was glorified by draping it over the bodies of heroes; a dank, mud-colored sheen permeated the landscape and the massive lines of marching troops.

The experts of the armies tested the colors for camouflage value. The Germans, forever attacking out of the east, found best protective coloring in the hue of the dead gray dawns that lightened the horizons at their rear, during the mad zero hours.

The French, most of them, used horizon blue, for the mud color was a dismal touch to the fervent Gallic soul. The Foreign Legion used the color of mud. Many French regiments gradually changed to mud color as the war went on. The British and the Canadians and the Australians were all dressed like mud; the mud which seemed to crawl out of the trenches, back through the waste areas which quivered with the impact of the shells, back across the still inhabited fields, to the mills where it was dyed in the fibers of the wool.

Dun and drab, it sapped the brilliance of human nature and the glory that once was a soldier's. It brutalized the already inhuman character of the whole insane scheme of war. The rough texture, the depressing color, the aura of common ugliness, and the misshapen fit of the shoddy attire sank into the despairing souls of the men who wore the uniforms. Not one soldier out of 20 was fitted correctly, not one out of 50 felt the mighty lift to the spirit that dashing appearance can give.

The uniform finally achieved a sanctity in the minds of all of us, because we made it golden with the ardor of our admiration and appreciation. But when the Army later gathered as veterans and formed the American Legion, it went back to the neat blue which is the traditional uniform of the American soldier. The marines returned to their flashing colors. The French returned to the clean, sweet horizon blue. The Germans held to their field-gray, but a lighter, shining gray. The British regiments restored their kilts and bright coats and metals.

But the American soldier still struggled with the color of mud. The men who wore, loved, and were proud of the uniform tailored it with infinite care; they rubbed regulations raw as they skirted the uncompromising details, they made the dark buttons gleam like gems.

A couple of years ago, feeling that the Army should dress up again, the men in command ordered a gradual return to blue. People began to see certain regulars who were not engaged in repairing leaky barracks roofs on work details, or who were not in the woods perfecting the C. C. C. wearing the dark blue blouses and light blue trousers. But this idea has not lasted.

Officers who studied the war conditions in Spain and China found that the men at the front are content in baggy suits, looking for all the world like the overalls worn by men who spend their days working under automobiles, an ideal coverage for hard, greasy work. But these mechanics change their attire at 5 o'clock. Not so the soldier.

As a concession to something of the former glory of arms, the brass hats in Washington decided that even if they were to make a soldier a more shapeless mass than ever before, they would change the color. So they had the new suits made up in dark blue. They experimented with them at various posts. The other day they sent word to the Army that blue would not do. It was too easily discerned by enemy eyes. So the color of mud is back, staining in drab the new uniform. New, but old.

There is no question that the best minds of our military tradition are in that establishment. The opinions of the sidewalk generals count for little. When fighting is the program, or when, as now, the development of a powerful army is good insurance against trouble, inevitably the Army furnishes the leadership and the science which is needed to guide it.

These leaders in peace must be guided by practical and utilitarian motives. But if there must ever and forever be soldiers, why must it be that the brief moments of glory and adulation—before horror and death—cannot be clothed in the traditional military manner, with the brightness that matches the courage that America expects in every soldier son?

In asking for permission to extend my remarks by inserting the above editorial, I find myself greatly disturbed, because the War Department has changed its mind about putting the Army into peacetime blues. At this time such a move is very significant. There seems to be no danger of this country having an internal war; there seems not the slightest chance of any foreign country invading our shores. Thus the only interpretation that can be placed upon the action is that our soldiers are being dressed for overseas duty. I have followed the matter very closely, for I felt for a long time our Army should be taken out of the wartime uniforms. The men in the service wanted it. There is an Army fort in my own district, and I have heard men ask if they might buy their own blue uniforms in order to get out of the belligerent khaki. I was told by the War Department that the decision had been made to put the men into blues. Now that this has been changed it is most frightening.

TELEGRAM FROM R. P. HARMON

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram from R. P. Harmon, department commander of the American Legion, relative to the work of the Dies committee in their endeavor to suppress un-American activities:

WATERTOWN, S. DAK., October 26, 1939.

Hon. FRANCIS CASE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Associated Press reports that the Dies committee is being criticized for publishing names of those on Government pay roll who hold membership in communistic and affiliate organizations.

If these organizations are aggressively American as claimed, why are they not proud of such membership as are members of the American Legion and other patriotic and benevolent organizations? We feel the Dies committee should have fullest support from our representatives in Congress in their endeavor to suppress un-American activities.

R. P. HARMON,
Department Commander, American Legion of South Dakota.

Housewives and Commercial Users Get Department of Agriculture Assurance of Unexcelled Quality of Beet Sugar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 30, 1939

LETTER FROM D. E. MONTGOMERY

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the high quality of beet sugar, long acknowledged in the sugar-beet-producing areas throughout the whole world has been publicly and definitely confirmed suitable for the housewife and commercial sugar users by the consumers' counsel of the Department of Agriculture.

Through years of scientific progress in the processing and refining of beet sugar by those who operate the sugar-beet plants of the United States, a degree of purity of product has been attained which is so satisfactory and which so completely meets the requirements of technical uses as well as for home cooking purposes that the latest statement of the Department of Agriculture is conclusive.

In an effort to further erase from the minds of the people the stigma placed on beet sugar by interests unfriendly to the industry, I took occasion on October 13 this year to present Members of the House of Representatives with the facts, and at that time I quoted from Farmers Bulletin No. 1637, which opens with the very positive statement that—

Sucrose, the sugar of commerce and kitchen, is extracted from the tissues of the sugar beet and the sugarcane. Whichever plant it comes from, the product, when pure, is identical in all properties and for all purposes.

I am now in possession of a letter from Mr. D. E. Montgomery, Consumers' Counsel of the Department of Agriculture, which confirms what I have previously said about the high quality of beet sugar, and in his letter he includes such an authoritative statement as—

When both cane and beet sugar are properly refined, there is no need for any distinction.

And still another statement that—

Cane and beet sugar are chemically identical except for traces of impurities * * * in both cases the impurities amount to a small fraction of 1 percent.

In my October 13 speech here in the House of Representatives I pointed out that a serious false statement appeared in the June issue of Consumers' Guide, in which the claim was made that Federal specifications for ice cream required cane sugar. At that time I pointed out by reading to you and submitting as evidence a copy of the Government's ice-cream specifications, which make no reference whatever to either beet or cane sugar, but merely use the word "sugar."

This letter I hold here from Mr. Montgomery admits the incorrectness of that printed statement. I am glad to have his frank admission of error in order that the record may be kept straight and that housewives and commercial sugar users may know the truth.

Mr. Montgomery states that "the Consumers' Guide erred in implying that only cane sugar is sucrose. Actually, both cane and beet sugars are sucrose."

He has termed the false statement in the article I have condemned as an "accidental mistake" and has assured me that the forthcoming issue of his publication, which is a Government periodical, will carry a statement of correction.

I am pleased to submit at this time this letter from Mr. Montgomery, which not only verifies what I have previously said about the high quality of beet sugar, but admits the incorrectness of the article which I criticized. His letter follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., October 17, 1939.

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CRAWFORD: A most unfortunate and regrettable error which appeared in the June issue of the Consumers' Guide, a publication of this Office, has led you and others to believe that there is intent on the part of this Office to injure the beet-sugar industry of the United States and to propagandize on behalf of competitive cane-sugar interests.

I am writing to assure you personally and, I hope, through you those interested in the beet-sugar industry that there is absolutely no foundation for such a belief.

This charge of intentional misrepresentation rests solely on an error of fact contained in two paragraphs appearing in an article entitled "A Quiz on Ice Cream." The paragraphs read:

"The Federal Government's buying specifications require that ice cream contain at least 12 percent butterfat, at least 16 percent of sucrose (cane sugar), and not more than one-half of 1 percent high-grade gelatin.

"The insistence on cane sugar is aimed at the possible substitution of other kinds of sugar for cane. The other varieties are less sweet than sucrose and therefore must be used in larger amounts. Ice cream made from these other sugars must be kept at lower temperatures."

I want to make clear, first of all, that the Federal Government's ice-cream specification does not, as our parenthetical insertion of "cane sugar" implies, define sucrose as cane sugar. Nor does it define sucrose in any way. Our insertion of "cane sugar" was incorrect. The second paragraph should be rephrased to read:

"Sugars which are less sweet than sucrose obviously must be used in larger amounts, and ice cream made from such sugars must be kept at lower temperatures."

The Federal specification for ice cream, effective as of the date this article was published, and still in effect, calls for "sugar solids (sucrose)." I am informed that a revision of this specification has been drawn up but not yet officially promulgated, and that it modifies the sugar requirements for frozen desserts. In the case of ice creams, the proposed specification will call merely for a certain percentage of "sugar"; in the case of sherbets and ices, it will call for "sucrose and/or other approved edible sugars." As to what are "other approved edible sugars," the Federal specification does not say. The usual practice is for the Federal Specifications Executive Committee to accept the judgment of the Food and Drug Administration in such matters. This Administration has always taken the position that beet and cane sugars alike qualify for ice-cream standards and also other edible sugars may be desirable sweetening agents.

The article appearing in the Consumers' Guide erred in implying that only cane sugar is sucrose. Actually both cane and beet sugars are sucrose. As one well-recognized authority states: "Cane and beet sugar are chemically identical, except for traces of impurities * * * in both cases the impurities amount to a small fraction of 1 percent." He goes on to say: "When both cane and beet sugar are properly refined, there is no need for any distinction." The same authority reemphasizes the interchangeability of these sugars by saying an ice-cream manufacturer may use beet sugar "with the positive assurance that his ice cream will not be inferior in any way." (See Theory and Practice of Ice-Cream Making, by Hugo S. Somner, 2d ed., 1935, p. 399.)

We claim no infallibility, but we do make a strenuous effort to check and countercheck the accuracy of statements appearing in the Consumers' Guide in advance of publication. On the whole, I feel that the staff of Consumers' Guide does a remarkably good job of translating technical material into interesting and accurate reading matter for consumers. Our aim is to provide consumers with unbiased and objective information which will enable them to buy wisely, economically, and intelligently. Since this is the case we can have no interest whatsoever in promoting the sale of one product over another.

I am aware, as, of course, you are, that unintentional errors of fact may do as much injury as intentional deception. When they occur the remedy is to make frank admission of error. This the Consumers' Guide will do. A forthcoming issue will carry a statement of correction. A copy of this will be sent you.

Since the accidental mistake in the Consumers' Guide was made an occasion for criticism on the floor of the House, I shall appreciate it if you will do me the courtesy of inserting this letter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very truly yours,

D. E. MONTGOMERY,
Consumers' Counsel.

This should conclusively prove to the American housewife and to those using sugar commercially that we have here in America an industry of which we may be proud and a branch of farming producing beets for sugar and greatly contributing to our national defense.

As the farmer prospers, so tends the Nation to prosper, and Americans interested in our national well-being will act wisely in giving due consideration to the domestic beet-sugar industry.

Peace Assured Through Senate Neutrality Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, October 31, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. KEY PITTMAN, OF NEVADA

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered last evening over the National Broadcasting System by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], on pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience of America, through the invitation and courtesy of the Washington Evening Star, I have this opportunity of submitting to you my opinion as to the character and effect of the peace legislation just passed by the United States Senate, and which I have no doubt will pass the House of Representatives this week and be signed by the President.

Sixty-three Senators voted for the passage of the act, while 30 Senators voted against its passage. The act, in my opinion, eliminates every reasonable possibility of a recurrence in this war and in future wars of incidents and controversies which forced us into the World War. It enables our Government to safeguard the lives of our citizens and the peace of our country. This opinion is concurred in by at least 63 peace-loving, patriotic Senators. I say "by at least 63" because I believe that all, or nearly all, of the 30 Senators who voted against the act realize that the cash-and-carry provisions will do more to keep us out of this and future wars than any legislation we could possibly enact, and that they would have voted for the act but for the fact that in their public speeches and statements they had consciously or unconsciously greatly exaggerated the importance of the embargo law and its necessity to the peace of our country.

When the former cash-and-carry law was before the Senate in 1937, 63 Senators voted for its passage, while only 6 voted in the negative. The law expired by its own terms May 1 of this year. There is today no cash-and-carry law upon our statute books.

The cash-and-carry law of 1937, while requiring belligerents to pay in cash as a general proposition, contained a proviso which granted to the President the discretion to permit short-time credits to belligerents. The act that passed the Senate on Friday strikes out that provision and makes the cash requirement mandatory. The cash-and-carry law of 1937 made it lawful for our American vessels to engage in commerce with belligerents. It is true that under such law there were restrictions as to the carrying of certain kinds of goods. The fact remains, however, that under such old law our vessels were permitted to carry goods to the belligerents of the character that caused the submarining of our merchant vessels in 1917 with the loss of the lives of our seamen.

The carry provisions of the cash-and-carry law as enacted last Friday by the Senate absolutely make it unlawful for our American vessels to engage in commerce with belligerents wherever war exists, or wherever there is any danger of the destruction of the lives of our citizens on board our merchant vessels. The act passed by the Senate imposes heavy penalties for the violation of the cash-and-carry provisions. Such penalties not only apply to the vessel but to the owners of the vessel and the officers and directors of any corporation that owns or operates the vessel. The penalty provision provides for a fine of not exceeding $50,000 or incarceration in the penitentiary for not exceeding 5 years. The penalty in the old law was merely nominal and was an inducement to its violation.

You must remember that the embargo provisions of the law of 1937, now existing, and the cash-and-carry provisions of the old law, which expired on May 1, 1939, apply and applied only to warring powers. It is true that the cash-and-carry provisions of the act passed by the Senate also deal with belligerents alone. It was obviously necessary, therefore, to protect the lives of our seamen on our merchant vessels even in carrying on commerce with neutrals, if the warring powers should proceed to destroy such merchant vessels without notice and the lives of the seamen on board, even though such merchant vessels were engaging in commerce with neutrals.

So, therefore, a provision was included in the act passed by the Senate entitled "Combat Areas." It directs that when the President shall "find that the protection of citizens of the United States so requires, he shall, by proclamation, define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful * * * for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area."

That is one of the most important provisions incorporated in the law. It was not incorporated in the act of 1937 and is not the law today. This provision may not have to be used. Its use would have been necessary, however, during the submarining of our merchant vessels by Germany in 1917, because most of such vessels so destroyed were not engaged in commerce with belligerents but with neutrals. If the same situation should arise in this war as arose in March 1917, there would be only one way to protect the lives of our seamen against destruction, and that would be by designating such areas of destruction as combat areas and prohibiting our merchant vessels from entering such areas.

As I said before, it may not be necessary to establish combat areas. The old law—which is the existing law—prohibits our merchant vessels from arming if engaged in commerce with belligerents. That law was not sufficient. A submarine could not know whether our merchant vessel was carrying goods to a belligerent or a neutral until it searched the ship. The submarine claimed it could not search a ship that might be armed for defense because the danger of the destruction of the submarine was too great. The law passed by the Senate makes it unlawful for our merchant vessels to arm at all if engaged in foreign commerce. That includes commerce with neutrals as well as belligerents. Every American vessel that departs for any of our ports can be identified so that the belligerent powers will know that it is an American vessel; that it is not armed; and that it will submit to visit, search, and, if necessary, seizure in accordance with international law.
